"Tasso" is full of romantic pomps. A bitter pomp of lamentation begins it, as though there was no pain like the poet's pain; a chivalric pomp of the proud poet continues it; a courtly pomp, yet graceful withal, ensues; and the final "triumph" is a very bombastic pomp indeed. Not all of "Tasso" wears well; the end is already ringing hollow; but the music of the poet is still graphic, chivalric, romantic while the accents of his woe still keep their pang. Anyhow, the whole "symphonic poem" is wrought so musically, with such economy of well-imagined material, with such careful unity, with such assimilation of the musical and the poetic development, that the piece is still a little epitome of Liszt in his chosen form. "Les Préludes" seems common in invention, easy in structure, a ready-made "symphonic poem" beside it. Yet there and only there did the programme yesterday strike the martial note of which Liszt was romantically fond. True, there is an "allegro marziale animato" in the concerto, the beginning of the conclusion of the whole, the concentrated summary of which Liszt, who overvalued his constructive skill, wrote proudly. He believed it music by deliberate intellectual process. It sounds, as does all the rest of the concerto, like passionate and magnificent rhapsody in tones. With the piano Liszt had no need to take thought of means. He could strike as he would and it answered him. It kindled him too, and there, in spite of his "Dantes" and "Fausts" and "Tassos," his "St. Elizabeths" and his cathedral masses, is his most untrammeled, his most natural voice. Perhaps, it will prove also the most enduring. For him, in wildness—and in rhetoric—there is life.

H. T. P.

TIMES,
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 21 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Estal 884

The general sale of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts to be glevn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House during the coming winter will open on next Friday, October 27, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The seats that are put on sale on Friday are those unclaimed by former subscribers.

The season is particularly interesting for Brooklyn in that it will be the last year in which Mr. Fiedler is connected with the great Boston Orchestra, his engagement ending next spring. Of all the conductors that the orchestra has brought to Brooklyn—which includes all except Henschel, the first conductor—none has made more friends and obtained more solid favor with the Brooklyn public than this modest, enthusiastic man, who came from Europe practically unheralded and has made such a profound impression upon the musical life of this country.

The concerts this year as for the last several years will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23, and March 22. The list of soloists is most distinguished. In November, Madame Schumann-Heink will appear; in December, Kathleen Par[illegible]low; in January, Jos[illegible]

HERALD, BOSTON, OCTOBER 22, 1911.

...of Major Henry Lee Higginson, by Bea Pratt, placed at the entrance to Symphony Hall. Architectural setting by A. W. Longfellow.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1911.

SYMPHONY OBSERVES THE LISZT CENTENARY

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The programme of the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was made up entirely of Liszt numbers, commemorative of the Liszt centenary, which falls on Oct. 22, Sunday. The great composer-poet was represented by two symphonic poems, "Les Preludes" and "asso," the Dante symphony and the concerto No. 1, E flat major.

The symphonic poems of Liszt are free, spontaneous expressions of a tone-poet; color and emotion play across them as naturally as across the features of a highly sensitive person, voices speak in them with the distinctness of human begins giving utterance to the depest thoughts of mind and heart, emotions too great for words sometimes grip and torture them, despair rocks them, then joy bursts through them, sweeping away everything before it, and the path of music is strewn with pearls of great price, rare, delicate flowers such as one expects to find hidden in nature's dearest spots, and sounds such as one expects to hear alone in nature's silences, where nothing human ever was.

"Les Preludes" is a poem that sweetly and sadly asks the question, "What is life but a great beginning for something beyond?" And the very beauty of the poem itself answers the question—such music could not be if there were no "beyond"; for the reflective, creative power of man as revealed in this symphonic poem necessitates a something out of which he came and a something to which he goes.

The "Tasso," symphonic poem is written around the life of the sad-fated poet Tasso, and is full of ehe deep melancholy of Byron's poem on Tasso. But, more than this, it breathes Liszt's own quiet sorrow of his lack of recognicion as a composer.

The Dante symphony is a great example of Liszt's power of expressing the subjective struggle of man through the medium of tone, tone so delicately shaded, so tremendously expanded to the very limit of its possibilitis that the entire gamut of man's existence is sounded in the space of a bare half hour.

The Magnificat at the close of the Purgatorio, however, expresses more than did Dante himself of the soul that stands o nthe mountain top of its existence, all its dross cast off in the seething darkness beneath, the eternal paradise of spirit-being ahead and beyond. A ladies' chorus of the Musica Art Club, with Mrs. Sundelius as soloist, sang the Magnificat, and Mr. Marshall was at the organ. The choru at time obstruded in the orchestration instead of completing the ensemble—it sometimes sang with loudness and not bigness.

Rudolph Ganz played the concerto with nervous energy instead of emo[illegible] brilliant moments. He was [illegible] the delicate, reflective passa[illegible] were full of tenderness and [illegible]ght.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the [illegible]

From

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date OCT 22 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HONORS FOUNDER

BOSTON, Oct. 21.—Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of H. L. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of the Boston sculptress, Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Sienna marble designed by A. W. Longfellow. The donors are friends of Higginson, who have elected to remain anonymous. There were no ceremonies attending the presentation of the bust, but it was first seen at the time of the thirtieth anniversay of the first concert of the orchestra.

The first pair of concerts in New York on Thursday evening, November 9 and Saturday afternoon, November 11, will present as soloist the noted contralto, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

Estk, 1884

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 21 1911

MUSICAL NOTES.

At the Academy of Music next Friday, Oct. 27, at 4 P. M., the sale of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming winter.

Est, 1884

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 22 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, has just been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of H. L. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of the Boston sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Sienna marble, designed by A. W. Longfellow. The donors are friends of Mr. Higginson, who have elected to remain anonymous. There were no ceremonies attending the presentation of the bust, but it was first seen at the time of the thirtieth anniversary of the first concert of the orchestra.

Esta 84

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 22 1911

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date [illegible]

Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, has just been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of H. L. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of the eminent Boston sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Sienna marble designed by A. W. Longfellow. The donors are friends of Mr. Higginson, who have elected to remain anonymous. There were no ceremonies attending the presentation of the bust, but it was first seen at the time of the thirtieth anniversary of the first concert of the orchestra. The first pair of concerts in New York on Thursday evening, Nov. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11, will present as soloist the eminent contralto, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

1884

From [illegible]AMERICAN

Address [illegible]arm

Date OCT 22 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of concerts promised for this season in this city by the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11. The soloist on both occasions will be Ernestine Schumann-Heink. In this connection it may be mentioned that Symphony Hall, the Boston headquarters of the organization, has been enriched by the placing in the foyer of that building of a bronze bust of Mr. N. L. Higginson, the intelligent founder and supporter of the orchestra. This tribute, which is more than well deserved, was made by friends of Mr. Higginson who insist on remaining anonymous.

Establi

[49]

The general sale of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House during the coming winter will open on Friday afternoon, October 27, at 4 o'clock p.m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music building, the sale to continue when the Institute ticket offices are open. The seats for sale on Friday are those unclaimed by former subscribers. Mr. Fiedler's engagement with the great Boston Orchestra ends next spring; no conductor of the orchestra has made more friends and obtained more solid favor with the Brooklyn public than this modest, enthusiastic man who came from Europe practically unheralded. The concerts will, as usual, be given this season on Friday evenings, the dates being November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 22. In the list of distinguished soloists there are to be in November, Mme. Schumann-Heink; in December, Kathleen Parlow; in January, Josef Hofmann; in February, Bessie Bell Collier; in March, Mme. Louise Homer. Last year was by all odds the most successful the orchestra has ever had in this city, and the authorities at the Institute report that the coming season promises to be even better than that of last year. The programme for the first concert will be announced shortly.

Esta 1884

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 21 [illegible]

A bronze bust of Henry L. Higginson has just been placed in Symphony hall, Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as a tribute to the founder and the patron of this great organization. The bust is by the eminent sculptor Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Sienna marble designed by A. W. Longfellow. There were no ceremonies and the donors desired to remain anonymous. It was first seen upon the thirtieth anniversary of the first concert.

Estal 1884

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date OCT 22 1911

Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, has just been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of H. L. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of the eminent Boston sculptor Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Siena marble designed by A. W. Longfellow. The donors are friends of Mr. Higginson who have elected to remain anonymous. There were no ceremonies attending the presentation of the bust, but it was first seen at the time of the thirteenth anniversary of the first concert of the orchestra. The first pair of concerts in New York on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11, will present as soloist the eminent contralto Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

David Bispham will close his all English song recital in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Sunday next with a recitation of Tennyson's "Elaine" to the musical setting of Ada Weigel Powers, who on this occasion will play the accompaniment herself. Among other features which the barytone will offer are a group of classical and modern songs by foreign composers and several compositions by Americans. Richard Strauss's "Cæcilie," "The Evening Star" from "Tannhäuser" and Mendelssohn's "I'm a Roamer" will be among the former, while the American offerings will include Harriet Ware's "How Do I Love Thee," Louis Elbel's "Calm Be Thy Sleep," Dr. N. J. Eisenheimer's "The Sea's Wooing" and Sidney Homer's "The Song of the Shirt."

Estab 1884

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

WOMAN'S CHORUS TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

Philharmonic Body To Appear With Boston Organization At The Lyric.

The Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, of which Mrs. Charles Morton is president and Joseph Pache director, is starting its third season with the prospect ahead of an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No greater honor nor more flattering tribute to its ability could be paid the Chorus in this country, the members feel, than the invitation which Max Fiedler, director of the Symphony, has extended. Mr. Fiedler's invitation was read at the Chorus rehearsal last Tuesday. Like all the other musical organizations, great and small, the Boston Symphony is going to celebrate the Liszt centenary this season, and at his March concert at the Lyric Mr. Fiedler will present the "Dante" Symphony, for which the assistance of a body such as the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus is needed.

The Chorus resumed its meetings a short time ago and already has work for the season well under way. Three concerts will be given besides the appearance with the Symphony, the first one to take place late in November.

In the two years of its existence the Chorus has presented soloists who appear only under exclusive auspices, the list including Willie Hess, Alwin Schroeder, Tina Lerner and Alexander Heinemann. This season the assisting soloists will be as distinguished as in the past.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 22 1911

The general sale of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House during the coming winter will open on next Friday, October 27, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The seats that are put on sale on Friday are those unclaimed by former subscribers. The season is particularly interesting for Brooklyn in that it will be the last year in which Mr. Fiedler is connected with the great Boston Orchestra, his engagement ending next spring. Of all the conductors that the Orchestra has brought to Brooklyn, which includes all except Henschel, the first conductor, none has made more friends and obtained more solid favor with the Brooklyn public than this modest, enthusiastic man, who came from Europe practically unheralded, and has made such a profound impression upon the musical life of this country. The concerts this year, as for the last several years, will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being November 10, December 8, January 12. February 23 and March 22. The list of soloists is most distinguished. In November Madame Schumann-Heink will appear; in December, Kathleen Parlow; in January, Josef Hofmann; in February, Bessie Bell Collier, and in March, Madame Louise Homer. Last year was by all odds the most successful the Orchestra has ever had in this borough, and the coming season, so the authorities at the Institute report, promises to be even better. The programme for the first concert will be announced shortly.

Estab 1884

From RECORD,

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 22 1911

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts shows that there has been no diminution of interest in these events. The recent celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the first public rehearsal and concert in Boston was made notable by the unveiling in the foyer in Symphony Hall of a magnificent bronze bust of Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of Sculptor Bela Pratt, and it is set in a rich placement of Sienna marble, which

Estab 884

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 21 1911

Date

The general sale of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House during the coming winter will open on next Friday, Oct. 27, at 4 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building, and the sale will continue thereafter at the hours when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. The seats that are to be put on sale on Friday are those unclaimed by former subscribers. The season is particularly interesting for Brooklyn in that it will be the last year in which Mr. Fiedler is to be connected with the great Boston Orchestra, his engagement ending next spring. Of all the conductors that the orchestra has brought to Brooklyn, which includes all except Henschel, the first conductor, none has made more friends and obtained more solid favor with the Brooklyn public than this modest, enthusiastic man who came from Europe practically unheralded and has made such a profound impression upon the musical life of this country.

The concerts this year, as for the last several years, will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 22. The list of soloists is most distinguished. In November, Madame Schumann-Heink will appear; in December, Kathleen Parlow; in January, Josef Hofmann; in February, Bessie Bell Collier, and in March, Madame Louise Homer. Last year was by all odds the most successful the orchestra has ever had in this city and the coming season, so the authorities at the Institute report, promises to be even better. The programme for the first concert will be announced shortly.

Est 1884

From AMERICAN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Baltimore during the coming winter, which has been in progress at Albaugh's ticket office during the past week, is most gratifying to the orchestra itself and to its many friends here in Baltimore. It promises to be the largest on record, and this, the twenty-seventh season in which the orchestra has come to Baltimore, should be the best it has ever had.

Est 1884

From EVENING STAR,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 21 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The season sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Baltimore during the coming winter, which has been in progress at Albaugh's ticket office during the past week, is most gratifying to the orchestra itself and to its many friends here in Baltimore. It promises to be the largest on record.

ew York,

From EVENING SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

WILL SING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Woman's Philharmonic To Give Vocal Part Of Liszt's "Dante."

When the Boston Symphony contributes its part to the universal celebration of the Liszt centenary at its March concert in the Lyric it will have the assistance of a Baltimore choral organization, the honor having been extended to the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus.

Max Fiedler, director of the orchestra, has just notified Joseph Pache, conductor of the chorus, of his desire to have the co-operation of the latter body, and after a consultation with the ladies of the chorus Mr. Pache notified Mr. Fiedler of his acceptance. Mr. Fiedler had ample opportunity for learning of the ability of the chorus through his attendance at several of the concerts given during the preceding two years of its existence, and stated that he was fully convinced that the chorus was equal in every respect to the high requirements of an appearance with the Boston Symphony. The "Dante" symphony of Liszt is to be one of the numbers of the March concert, and it is the vocal part of this seldom-heard score that the Philharmonic Chorus will present.

The chorus resumed its work a short time ago and rehearsals are now in regular progress. In addition to the symphony engagement, three individual entertainments will be given with soloists as famous as those who have assisted it in the past.

Only artists of unquestioned ability and reputation are engaged by the chorus for solo work, and the opportunity of hearing such celebrated people as Tina Lerner, Willie Hess, Alwin Schroeder and Alexander Heinemann has already been given the Baltimore people, and at prices far beneath the ordinary charges.

The chorus is desirous of increasing its associate membership roll and has accordingly sent out several hundred circular letters stating the requirements for such admission and inviting music lovers to join.

The officials of the chorus consist of Mrs. Charles Morton, president; Miss Margaret E. Dulaney, vice-president; Mrs. Charles T. Crane, treasurer; Mrs. Walter H. Billingslea, secretary, and Miss Amelia Clay Kerner, librarian.

HERALD, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1911.

Noted Russian Violinist at Symphony Rehearsal Today

Efrem Zimbalist Will Play for First Time in This Country, Rendering New Concerto.

HE IS BUT 22 YEARS OLD

Efrem Zimbalist, the Russian violinist, who in a few years has made a great reputation in Europe, so that he is classed by many with Mischa Elman, will play for the first time in this country at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestea this afternoon.

He gives this modest account of his early life: "I was born 22 years ago in Rostow. My father was the conductor of an orchestra there, and I began to play the violin when I was very young. In fact, at the age of 9 I played Spohr concertos in public. When I was 12 years old I was playing in Petersburg and Moscow, and at this age also I began to study with Leopold Auer. I studied with him for two years, and then I was sick for a long time. Two years later I renewed my studies with him, and four years ago I made what might be called my first real appearance in Berlin. Since then I have been touring constantly."

Mr. Zimbalist might have added that he was awarded on graduation at the Petersburg Conservatory the gold medal given by the government and a prize of 1200 rubles yearly for two years. His younger brother Sacha, now studying in Germany, gives promise as a 'cellist. Another younger brother is studying the violin.

Mr. Zimbalist will introduce this afternoon Glazounoff's violin concerto, which was played first five or six years ago in London by Mischa Elman. The concerto has not been played here. Mr. Zimbalist considers it the greatest of the Russian concertos, "much better than that of Tschaikowsky." He has with him a concerto by an American named John Paul of which he thinks highly. "I met him in London," he said. "He is very young and has written comparatively little as yet, but I think he is a genius." Mr. Zimbalist himself has composed works for violin and orchestra, violin and piano, also some songs.

After he was graduated he played in Berlin with success, and then, going to London in December, 1907, found himself famous the morning after his concert. He is of boyish appearance and speaks English so well that he came to this country unaccompanied.

Efrem Zimbalist.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the Wi... INQUIRER

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 22 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia, which has been in progress during the past week at Heppe's piano rooms, shows that there has been no diminution of interest in these events. The musical public of this city has increased so rapidly in past years that while it gives, as it should, admirable support to its own fine orchestra, it still loyally supports the Boston Symphony, which has been coming here for twenty-six years.

The recent celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the first public rehearsal and concert in Boston was made notable by the unveiling in the foyer in Symphony Hall of a magnificent bronze bust of Mr. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra, which was presented by a number of friends of Mr. Higginson, who have elected to remain anonymous. The bust itself is the work of the eminent sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it is set in a rich placement of Sien marble, which was designed by A. W. Longfellow.

Esta 1884

HERALD, OCTOBER 26, 1911.

ZIMBALIST, THE VIOLINIST

The feature of this week's Symphony concerts will be the first appearance in America of Efrem Zimbalist, the Russian violinist. Zimbalist, like Mischa Elman and Kathleen Parlow, is a pupil of Auer of St. Petersburg and, like Elman, a Russian. Reports that have reached America concerning him lead one to believe that he ranks among the foremost violinists of our time. He will play a violin concerto by Glazounoff, which will be heard here for the first time. The rest of the program includes Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," Brahm's E minor symphony No. 4 and Bantock's tone poem, "Dante and Beatrice," which will be heard for the first time in this country.

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

D

Tickets Selling Fast For Boston Symphony

The season sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Baltimore next winter, which has been in progress at Albaugh's ticket office during the last week, is gratifying to the Orchestra itself and to its many friends here in Baltimore. It promises to be the largest on record, and this, the twenty-seventh season in which the Orchestra has come to Baltimore, should be the best it has ever had.

E k, 1884

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts at the National during the coming winter, which has been in progress at Droop's music store, has fulfilled all expectations. When the single sale for the concerts opens there will only be a comparatively few seats on the floor available to purchasers.

The recent celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the first public rehearsal and concert in Boston was made notable by the unveiling in the foyer in Symphony Hall of a magnificent bronze bust of Mr. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust was presented by a number of friends of Mr. Higginson, who have elected to remain anonymous. The bust itself is the work of the eminent sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it is set in a rich placement of Sienna marble, which was designed by A. W. Longfellow.

Es 1884

50

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A CHARACTERISTIC ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION

Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms Make the Programme—Mr. Fiedler and the Orchestra on Their Mettle to an Unusually Applausive Audience—The Conductor's Eloquent Version of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—Schubert Aided and Unaided—Brahms's "Academic Overture" for Stately Rejoicing

The anniversary concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, was as characteristic as the austerest Boston heart could have wished. Without and within Symphony Hall wore its usual autumn aspect. The audience was the usual audience of Friday afternoon, but seemingly much more minded than usual to applause. It heard, for example, a very just and eloquent performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony in which Mr. Fiedler kept himself well in hand and in which the men in the orchestra were responsive to the conductor and on their mettle themselves. At the end, the audience twice and heartily recalled Mr. Fiedler and finally brought the band itself to its feet. The listeners were not less pleased with the beauty of the lyric song with which Schubert, the conductor, and the wind choir clothed the slow movement of his "Unfinished" symphony; and Brahms's "Academic Overture" held almost all of them to the end of the concert. "Gaudeamus Igitur," the Horatian ode of rejoicing, is one of the student songs out of which the overture is built. It is as familiar for stately jubilation in the Boston and the Cambridge of Mr. Higginson as it was in the Vienna and the Breslau of Brahms. Out of it and it alone, he has written the sonorous finale of his overture. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra made it especially sonorous, would give it seemingly an anniversary accent and would end with it upon the climax of the day. The programme thus comprised only classic pieces of which the founder and sustainer of the orchestra is particularly fond. The announcing page of the programme book noted that the concert was a "commemoration of the thirtieth anniversary of the first public rehearsal and concert, Oct. 21 and 22, 1881," and further on in the pamphlet were long extracts from Mr. Apthorp's recollections of the early years of the orchestra, originally printed a fortnight ago in this place. Otherwise, the concert and all things appertaining to it ran their usual course. A celebration of an anniversary more characteristic of the orchestra, the founder and the public that supports it would be hard to imagine.

Mr. Fiedler cannot be generalized. Sometimes he seems a very remarkable conductor, achieving very remarkable performances. Again, being human, he vexes and disappoints his more sensitive hearers. A week ago he fell below expectation in his version of Schumann's "Spring" symphony. Yesterday he surpassed expectation in his version of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The day was one of Mr. Fiedler's good days; the orchestra seemed more than ever a superb instrument; and it is hard to remember when a performance of the "Eroica" has so impressed an audience here and so stirred it to applause. Mr. Fiedler was at once continent and eloquent. Only the very finical could quarrel, in the intermission, with his tempi, although that he took the slow movement the shadow of a shade too slowly and that there was just a hint of undue haste in certain of the variations of the finale. Less sensitive ears, with no critical prestige to maintain, were content that the conductor rushed not a measure of the music into a blur and retarded not a measure that he wring another drop from it. In fact, in the choice of his tempi and in the quality of tone that he drew from the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler was very eloquent indeed. Throughout he varied his pace and his tonal mass skilfully, imaginatively.

The low whirr with which the scherzo began and from which it mounted to racing and exuberant gayety, the rich intermezzo of the horns in the trio, the broad, clear, exhilarating resumption of the scherzo itself were all good, almost thrilling, to hear. The conductor and his men found and held the golden mean for the Funeral March. It is a misunderstanding to make it almost neurotic with personal emotion as the Funeral March of Chopin's sonata is. It is a misunderstanding to make it operatically reverberant like Wagner's glorification of the dead Siegfried. This slow movement of the "Eroica" does rise here and there to intense outcry, and so, perhaps, gave a hint to Chopin. Here and there, again, it attains a plangency of lament that may have echoed in Wagner's ears. As a whole, however, it is the majestic voice of lamentation, as impersonal as a Greek tragedy, as deep and insistent as a grief that will not be denied because it is so great, so all-embracing. It was precisely this remote and austere intensity that Mr. Fiedler caught in the music yesterday. The Funeral March was massive and mighty lamentation. The chords that Mr. Fiedler drew from the band, the accent of the strings, the Mahleresque drum beats were of it; while in the voices of the winds was the intensity of the grief. It is hard to recall so just, so Beethovenish a reading. The listener felt, even after these hundred years, the masterful and still untouched isolation of the music in its kind.

Mr. Fiedler was as comprehending and expressive with the first movement and the finale. He did not try to be brilliant; he took no obvious thought of effects; he did not try to make the Beethoven of 1805 sound like the Strauss of 1911. Instead he caught exactly the large eloquence, the sinewy might, the rich and vitalizing power of the music. It strode; it sang; it gathered itself into concentrated intensity. The ear and the imagination answered to the richness of the under-voices, tingled to the incisive power of the transitions; felt the cumulative effect and the rhythmic vitality of the whole; for Mr. Fiedler ordered tempi, rhythm and quality of tone very elastically. Before and since Beethoven, men have written music. Beethoven still seems to create it. Nobody yet, anyhow, has matched the deep and puissant splendor of his melodies. Creation, not invention, is the word for them.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra went on to the allegro and the andante—the beautiful fragments—of the symphony that Schubert left unfinished. It is easy to believe that, had he lived and chosen to complete the piece, it would have surpassed all the rest of his orchestral music. Expression is our quest nowadays in music; we children of our musical and emotional hour have come to seek it everywhere. Sometimes, perhaps, we find it where it is not, or at least in the degree in which we are bound to have it. Pure song for the song's sake, pure music-making for the making's or the music's sake a little disconcerts us. We are coming to admire Mozart most, to answer most sympathetically to him, in his operas, like "Don Juan" or "Figaro" where he had to be more or less definitely expressive. We are not quite content with Schubert who was another pure singer. The musical heavens know that we ought to be, especially before the sheer beauty of this andante of the "unfinished" symphony. The beauty of ordered sound, the depth and the sweetness of pure lyric song could hardly further go, when there is such a choir of wind instruments as there was yesterday to give them voice. The distilled and disembodied beauty of song, sufficient to itself, a passion in itself, is here almost perfectly incarnate. Wise is the conductor, as Mr. Fiedler was yesterday, to let it sing itself, when he has such understanding virtuosi for its voices.

That same conductor may not be so wise, but at least he is in the fashion, when he tries to make the preceding allegro as dramatically expressive as he may. Mr. Fiedler took the contemporary way with it yesterday. He varied his tempi assiduously; made much of transition and contrast; emphasized particular phrases; heightened particular rhythms, ran the gamut indeed from the low grave voice with which the music begins to sharp lyric outcry. Only once or twice was he content with the poignant or the soothing beauty of the music unemphasized. Once at least he was almost tumultuous. Perhaps a new Schubert, dramatist of his own emotions, was in his birth-pangs in this allegro. Quite as probably, he remained still the old songful Schubert, only touched at the moment with more poignant and fitful emotions. The allegro, though its voice is occasionally broken, can still sing itself—when the latter-day conductors give it a chance.

The end was Brahms's "Academic Overture"—the overture that acknowledged a degree of doctor of philosophy, and that is built out of German student tunes, from the solemn chant of the "stately house" though the comic jingle about the Herr Papa—the leathery Herr Papa—to the well-ordered jubilation of "Gaudeamus Igitur." Brahms was no "specialist," as we should say nowadays, in occasional music. He had not the easy and superficial knack of it. He evolved his music out of much meditation, and travail of spirit when the inner purpose and not the outer occasion stirred him. Yet in this same "Academic Overture" he has written a ceremonial piece—and an altogether admirable one in its kind—that has served its purpose the world over these many years, and bids fair to serve it as extensively and as long. It is an essential part of many an academic ceremony into which music enters. It can serve as well, as the event proved yesterday, for the anniversary celebration of a great orchestra. H. T. P.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ITEM, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address

Date OCT 22 [redacted]

best of Liszt's Symphonic Poems.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its five concerts in this city at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, November 6.

The Boston Orchestra is one of the leading orchestras of the world, and its visits to this city each recurring season have come to be eagerly looked forward to by lovers of symphonic music. Especially since the conductorship of Max Fiedler, who greatly broadened the scope of its programmes, has this orchestra taken its place with the truly great. It is feared this will be the last season this enthusiastic and devoted laborer in the cause of music will be with the Boston Orchestra. He is among the greatest of conductors. Remember Mahler. How many regretted allowing a slight inclemency of the weather to prevent their hearing him on what proved to be the last opportunity.

Established in New York, 1884

From PRESS,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 22 [redacted]

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia, which has been in progress during the past week at 1119 Chestnut Street, shows that there has been no diminution of interest in these events. The musical public of this city has increased so rapidly in past years that while it gives as it should admirable support to its own fine orchestra, it still loyally supports the Boston Symphony which has been coming here for twenty-six years.

The recent celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the first public rehearsal and concert in Boston was made notable by the unveiling in the foyer in Symphony Hall of a magnificent bronze bust of Mr. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the Orchestra, which was presented by a number of friends of Mr. Higginson who have elected to remain anonymous. The bust itself is the work of the eminent sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it is set in a rich placement of Sienna marble which was designed by A. W. Longfellow.

Established in New York, 1884

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 28 1911

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Nov. 10, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers will comprise the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude to "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's scene from "Gotterdammerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

For the organ recital preliminary to the Brooklyn Institute reading to-morrow afternoon, in music hall, Academy of Music, at 4 p. m., Scott Wheeler will play selections by two composers. These are Wolstenholm, whose Andantine and Finale will be given, and Tombelle, who will be heard in his paraphrase of "I Am the Resurrection and the Life."

In concluding his Brooklyn Institute course on "Six Great Operas that Have Shaped Musical History," Carl Fique will, next Tuesday evening, take up Michail Glinka's "A Life for the Czar," called "The Foundation of Russin's Musical Greatness." Glinka's period is from 1803 to 1857. The lecture-recital will be given in music hall, Academy of Music, at 8:15 p. m.

The coming concert of the Brooklyn Catholic Oratorio Society to be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, promises to be a very successful affair. After announcing its programme for this concert, the society received many letters from music lovers throughout Brooklyn, expressing their admiration for the excellence of the programme, and many are impatiently awaiting the first performance in America of Bantock's tone poem, "Dante and Beatrice," which will be given on that afternoon.

Frank Ormsby will be the tenor soloist, and William C. Carl will play the organ. The Brooklyn Orchestral Society, composed of seventy musicians, has been engaged.

JOURNAL- OCTOBER 26, 1911.

Boston's Favorite Prima Donna

Geraldine Farrar.

MISS FARRAR TO SING IN SYMPHONY HALL

Geraldine Farrar is due to make her only scheduled appearance in this city at Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4, in a concert with Edmond Clement.

Mr. Clement will be a prominent figure here during the opera season, but Miss Farrar is not to make any appearances on the operatic stage except as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She is studying one of the leading roles in Wolf-Ferrari's "Le Donne Curiose," a new opera which is to be one of the principal features of the next Metropolitan season.

This will therefore be the first season since Miss Farrar made her American debut that will not bring this most popular of American prima donnas back to her native Greater Boston either as opera singer or as symphony so[illegible]

TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

OCTOBER 25, 1911.

CORDIAL WELCOME TO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Delightful Concert Given by Boston Musicians in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest exponents of high class music that visit Providence in the course of a season, returned last evening, playing the first in a series of five concerts. It was, so to speak, the beginning of a farewell, as Conductor Max Fiedler is to close his term of service with the orchestra this season, and Providence music lovers are probably seeing him this fall and winter for the last time.

The prevailing knowledge of this fact may account in a measure for the splendid audience that greeted Mr. Fiedler and his superb band of players. The vacant seats were few, far fewer than in some past seasons. It is evident as the time passes that this orchestra is widening its influence in Providence and Pawtucket—for the audiences include many residents of this city also—and there is little probability that the Providence management will ever again find it necessary to cut the concerts down to three in a season, something that happened a few years ago.

It is next to impossible to say anything new regarding the work of the orchestra itself. With Mr. Fiedler conducting, the same wonderful performances can always be expected. The rendition of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, the work chosen for last evening, was well nigh flawless, and an ovation was given the conductor and his players at the close.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, a young violinist new to Providence, was the soloist. Her offering, the concerto in B minor, by Saint-Saens, was finely played and justified the reputation which preceded the artist. The programme follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, Beethoven; (1) Allegro con brio; (2) Marcia funebre: Adagio assai; (3) Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio; (4) finale: Allegro molto. Concerto in B minor for violin and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61, Saint-Saens; (1) Allegro non troppo; (2) Andantino quasi allegretto; (3) Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo; symphonic poem, "Tasso: lamento e trionfo," Liszt.

EVENING NEWS.

From .....

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date .....

MUSIC LOVERS FEAR DISPOSAL OF LYRIC

Believe Its Use As Garage Would Reduce City's Concert List.

It is rumored and not denied by those who know that our wonderful concert hall is possibly to be sold to a firm which proposes to use it as a garage. Should this transaction be consummated, next autumn would find us without a suitable auditorium for concerts involving large bodies of performers, or for opera. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has so won its way to popular regard that one cannot calmly think of the discontinuance of its visits, would be forced to overstep Baltimore on its beneficent tours. The New York Philharmonic Orchestra, which will come to us three times this season, trusting to its virtues to attract patronage and asking no guarantee fund, would also be shut out. Without the Lyric, or a new building adapted to orchestral concerts and opera, Baltimore music would drop back a half century or more, leaving us hopelessly behind even most of the small cities of the country.

The situation requires prompt action to avert a mortifying calamity. As it stands today, the Lyric houses most potent influences for art culture, and the city could quite properly devote funds to its purchase and maintenance. Otto Kahn, who owns the Lyric, would doubtless sell it for $240,000, which sum he expended in purchasing the building and some adjoining lots. Self respect would be cheap at that cost, and we should certainly be seriously humbled by the absence of a suitable auditorium.

O. B. B.

MONITOR,

NOVEMBER 4, 1911

STRAUSS ON VANTAGE GROUND

Mendelssohn, overture, to "The Legend of the Fair Melusina," op. 32; R. Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; D'Indy, symphonic variations, "Istar," op. 42.

When battle practise is carried on in autumnal fields, the soldiers whom an observer imagines to represent his own nation take their position on the hill, and the party he surmises to represent foreign invaders steals up the slope of the meadow to dislodge them. The men on the hill are out of view, screened by the oaks and birches; and they are protected from the attacking party by the brow of the ledge. There they wait, holding the height whereon you played in childhood, defending as you fancy your hearth and home and country from a landing party of the foe. It is surely a losing game for the attack as it comes, a half battalion or so, under the protection of the two knolls lying below the hill. From your doorway you see how it must end. The reconnoitering line will approach safely enough until within easy range of the entrenched side and will then meet speedy blank-cartridge checkmate.

This is warfare by blueprint and schedule and so far as the eye of an observer can see is officerless. The sergeant leading the skirmish line shouts to you where you stand in the doorway and asks if you have seen the enemy.

"There he is!" you answer, synchronously with a clatter of shots from the ledge. Sergeant, corporals and their following rush toward the height, but before they have reached the apple-tree at the edge of the skirting field you know that every man of them is blanked. Nevertheless they rush on, knocking off a belated apple or two with their signal pole as they pass under the sweet-tree and they join the enemy among the oaks and birches of the ledge with hilarity all around.

The "assembly" sounds on the bugle, officers start up out of the ground, apparently, and gather the whole battalion, attack and defense now indistinguishable, and they swarm about your house until you almost think you will read from the constitution of the United States to them and tell them you are not expected to quarter soldiers in time of peace. But in a moment the whole detachment is on the road, a column of brown khaki against a line of gray stone wall, and off go friend and foe together to meet their noon appointment with the regimental cook.

The outcome of the sham battle of the symphonists all depends on how the commanding officer of the post disposes affairs in blueprint and schedule at the beginning. If the Germans and the French are to contest for the supremacy, the result will all turn on which side he stations at the height. The order of battle on Friday afternoon as arranged by the first in command was to put the Mendelssohn-Strauss forces in the advantageous place and let the Debussy-d'Indy attack drive them off if it could. Of course it was a fruitless exercise for the party of the Faun and Istar to creep up on the entrenchments of Melusina and Zarathustra, picturesque though they looked on the brown-green meadow under the slanting November sun. The old hedge where you played in childhood is full of Teuton enchantment which will turn in flight every Gallic sentiment that ventures near. The standard of the Faun and Istar will drop before it even reaches the apple tree.

"There he is!" you tell the man who inquires for Zarathustra and the musketry of the philosopher rattles a merry echo to your answer.

It was all settled when the program was sketched. With Mendelssohn and Strauss first, what chance was there for Debussy and D'Indy afterward? Where in these United States, boasting themselves of having orchestras the equal of any heard in Europe, is there the orchestra which could in one afternoon adjust itself to the technique of both Richard Strauss and Claude Debussy; where, too, in these United States, boasting themselves of being able to hire away from Europeans their best conductors, is there a conductor who could put himself thoroughly into the mood of both Zarathustra and the Faun in one and the same day? Where, moreover, exists the audience that could assume an attitude for receiving the musical message of a Parisian master immediately after listening to an authoritative voice from Berlin?

The position on the heights was worthily bestowed on the Teutons. Never has the Strauss formula of orchestral expression better justified itself than at the Friday matinee in Symphony hall. The Strauss structure exhibited by Max Fiedler (did the visit to Gamisch this summer have anything to do with it?) appeared as lucid as that of Beethoven when Mr. Gericke presided at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Fiedler now han-

AMERICAN,

NOVEMBER 4, 19[illegible]

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE PROGRAM

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Ultra-modern music was exclusively considered at the Symphony concert yesterday and Strauss, Debussy and D'Indy were each shown against a background of the others and, of course, the exquisite prelude to "Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Istar" variations of D'Indy were overshadowed by the mammoth tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Zarathustra was a slightly "queer" old gentleman with a rambling, incoherent manner of speech, if Strauss interprets him correctly, but there is no denying that he said strange and beautiful and wonderful things. Strauss is not noted for melodic invention, but he wrote some very lovely music in this poem, music that is all the more glorious because of its wierd and massiveness of the work, and its lyric beauty more than offsets its eccentricities and beside his recent outpourings "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is conservative.

It is getting to be a frequent feature of Symphony programs Mr. Fiedler is fond of it and offers it each year.

The orchestra never played more brilliantly than during this performance, which Fiedler conducted with great vigor and effectiveness. At the conclusion there was so much applause that the whole orchestra was compelled to rise and bow, not a frequent occurrence at the Symphony.

Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" with its fascinating atmosphere and pale, strange coloring made a vivid contrast to the great work that preceded the intermission. It was played with great delicacy and appreciation.

The last performance of D'Indy's "Istar" in Boston was six years ago, when the composer himself conducted. The brilliant descriptive music did not suffer at the hands of Mr. Fiedler and the lady "Istar" was successively diarobed by orchestral variations until the climax.

And while talking about descriptive music let us not forget the beautiful Mendelssohn Overture "Legend of the Fair Melusina," which opened the concert. The composer with his sinuous, watery Melusina motive and his virile theme for the knight Lusignan has been very successful in creating atmosphere. The orchestra will travel next week for the first time this season and there will be no concerts on Friday and Saturday.

JOURNAL-

NOVEMBER 4, 1911.

TONAL SKYSCRAPER PLEASES AUDIENCE

Strauss Selection Wins Biggest Demonstration at Symphony Matinee.

It is the orchestra's turn again to show its glorious virtuosity at this week's symphony concerts; and beyond all doubt and peradventure there is no greater test of orchestral superiority than such prodigious twentieth century tone poems as Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," respectively the second and third numbers on the program played yesterday afternoon and to be repeated tonight.

Apparently the large audience at the matinee liked the performance of the Strauss tonal skyscraper best. There is more to please the average taste in "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—simple, tender themes like that which characterizes the section entitled "Of Joys and Passions," and which is as touching and unaffected as "Nearer, My God, to Thee;" and then again soaring fantasies and whirling rhapsodies that tax the skill of the player and the imagination of the hearer. It is a tremendous tone poem, if ever there was one, representing Strauss's tribute to Nietzche and illustrating at the same time the manner and method of the most likely candidate for the honor of filling the still empty shoes of Richard Wagner, the musical superman. It was a gripping, thoroughly sympathetic performance that the orchestra gave, led by Mr. Fiedler in his happiest manner, and when it was over the audience insisted upon having the players stand up for the applause which was their just due.

But though there was a bigger demonstration of enthusiasm after the Strauss work, it was the French division of the program that finally filled the hall with late-comers, and that won the rare compliment from a matinee audience of having almost every seat remain occupied up to the very end. The Debussy piece, which came first, returning after an absence of nearly three years, showed off the incomparably fine wood wind section of the orchestra. Surely the playing of Messrs. Maquarre, Grisez and Longy must be acclaimed as worthy of the exquisite setting which Debussy has provided for Mallarme's strangely charming verses. The performance of D'Indy's "Symphonic Variations, 'Istar'" completed brilliantly a program begun in the sweet, smooth style displayed by Mendelssohn in his "Melusina" overture.

After tonight the orchestra will be away for nearly two weeks.

HERALD,

OCTOBER 29, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There will be no soloist at the fifth Symphony concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of much more than ordinary interest. It begins conservatively enough with Mendelssohn's Overture, "The Fair Melusine." Then will come Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This will make the first half of the program. The second half of the program will be French, the first number being Debussy's exquisite "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the second and last d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." These were last played here six years ago under the direction of the composer. In these variations the composer begins with the most complicated variations and ends practically with the theme. Thus he pictures the descent of Istar into hell. Each one of the variations represents one of the seven stages of her being disrobed by the gods of the "immutable land," until in the last she stands forth, in the words of Mr. Apthorp, "in the full splendor of nudity." There will be no concerts the following week as the orchestra will then be away on its first southern trip.

RECORD.

NOVEMBER 4, 1911

A "SOLOLESS" SYMPHONY CONCERT

Of this week's symphony concert L. C. Elson says:

There was no soloist. The afternoon was given up entirely to abstruse orchestral problems. Yet not quite entirely. The Fair Melusina must have been astonished to find herself in such company. Her limpid, rippling-water melodies seemed rather canal-like after Zarathustra had spoken, after the faun had complained, and after Istar had been undressed. Nevertheless we felt that the school of formalism had still something to say even in these days of Brobdignagian scores. In overture-writing Mendelssohn took to the water like a duck, as witness his "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage", his "Hebrides", and this waterscape.

We would have liked the tempo of this overture a trifle slower. Mr. Fiedler too often uses whip and spur when the composer gives any warrant for quickness. He must make haste a little more slowly. It is a sore temptation to hurry when the composer intimates an allegro and the strings are technically able to rush at almost any pace. But this haste was only in portions of the chief theme, where the figure of the waves might have been a trifle clearer. The beautiful mermaid was done justice to otherwise, and the fish course, which began this banquet left little to be desired.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 29, 1911—

"Thus Spake Zarathustra"
at Symphony Concerts

At the Symphony concerts this week Mr Fiedler will make the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," of Strauss the principal number. Following it there will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," and d'Indy's tone poem, "Istar," not heard here in a number of years.

The Frenchman has permitted his fancy to play upon the seven stages of the progress of Istar, daughter of sin, in her "Descent Into Hades," according to an ancient Babylonian poem, the original of which is believed to have existed in the library of Sardanapalus.

At each gate the warder strips the fair pilgrim of her jewels or of some part of the raiment which adorned her, the composer meanwhile weaving his musical fabric in an inverse ratio of complexity to the divestment of hers, until at the seventh and last gate her warder takes the final veil from her body.

Mendelssohn's "The Fair Melusine" overture will begin the program.

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 2, 1911.

Geraldine Farrar and Edmond Clement, whose concert in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon is the first of the important miscellaneous concerts of the season, return from Springfield today, where they gave a concert last night.

"The Smart Set," headed by S. H. Dudley, the leading negro fun maker, is pleasing large audiences at the Grand Opera House this week. The Milans-Films Company's Italian production of Dante's "Inferno" as a motion picture drama will come next Monday.

The Symphony program for tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening presents several important contributions of the ultra-modern school. These are the "Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss, the exquisite "Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy and d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar." The concert will begin

[52]

TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

OCTOBER 25, 1911.

CORDIAL WELCOME TO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Delightful Concert Given by Boston Musicians in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the greatest exponents of high class music that visit Providence in the course of a season, returned last evening, playing the first in a series of five concerts. It was, so to speak, the beginning of a farewell, as Conductor Max Fiedler is to close his term of service with the orchestra this season, and Providence music lovers are probably seeing him this fall and winter for the last time.

The prevailing knowledge of this fact may account in a measure for the splendid audience that greeted Mr. Fiedler and his superb band of players. The vacant seats were few, far fewer than in some past seasons. It is evident as the time passes that this orchestra is widening its influence in Providence and Pawtucket—for the audiences include many residents of this city also—and there is little probability that the Providence management will ever again find it necessary to cut the concerts down to three in a season, something that happened a few years ago.

It is next to impossible to say anything new regarding the work of the orchestra itself. With Mr. Fiedler conducting, the same wonderful performances can always be expected. The rendition of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, the work chosen for last evening, was well nigh flawless, and an ovation was given the conductor and his players at the close.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, a young violinist new to Providence, was the soloist. Her offering, the concerto in B minor, by Saint-Saens, was finely played and justified the reputation which preceded the artist. The programme follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, Beethoven; (1) Allegro con brio; (2) Marcia funebre: Adagio assai; (3) Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio; (4) finale: Allegro molto. Concerto in B minor for violin and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61, Saint-Saens; (1) Allegro non troppo; (2) Andantino quasi allegretto; (3) Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo; symphonic poem, "Tasso: lamento e trionfo," Liszt.

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

MUSIC LOVERS FEAR DISPOSAL OF LYRIC

k, 1884

Believe Its Use As Garage Would Reduce City's Concert List.

It is rumored and not denied by those who know that our wonderful concert hall is possibly to be sold to a firm which proposes to use it as a garage. Should this transaction be consummated, next autumn would find us without a suitable auditorium for concerts involving large bodies of performers, or for opera. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has so won its way to popular regard that one cannot calmly think of the discontinuance of its visits, would be forced to overstep Baltimore on its beneficent tours. The New York Philharmonic Orchestra, which will come to us three times this season, trusting to its virtues to attract patronage and asking no guarantee fund, would also be shut out. Without the Lyric, or a new building adapted to orchestral concerts and opera, Baltimore music would drop back a half century or more, leaving us hopelessly behind even most of the small cities of the country.

The situation requires prompt action to avert a mortifying calamity. As it stands today, the Lyric houses most potent influences for art culture, and the city could quite properly devote funds to its purchase and maintenance. Otto Kahn, who owns the Lyric, would doubtless sell it for $240,000, which sum he expended in purchasing the building and some adjoining lots. Self respect would be cheap at that cost, and we should certainly be seriously humbled by the absence of a suitable auditorium.

O. B. B.

MONITOR,

NOVEMBER 4, 1911

STRAUSS ON VANTAGE GROUND

Mendelssohn, overture, to "The Legend of the Fair Melusina," op. 32; R. Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; D'Indy, symphonic variations, "Istar," op. 42.

When battle practise is carried on in autumnal fields, the soldiers whom an observer imagines to represent his own nation take their position on the hill, and the party he surmises to represent foreign invaders steals up the slope of the meadow to dislodge them. The men on the hill are out of view, screened by the oaks and birches; and they are protected from the attacking party by the brow of the ledge. There they wait, holding the height whereon you played in childhood, defending as you fancy your hearth and home and country from a landing party of the foe. It is surely a losing game for the attack as it comes, a half battalion or so, under the protection of the two knolls lying below the hill. From your doorway you see how it must end. The reconnoitering line will approach safely enough until within easy range of the entrenched side and will then meet speedy blank-cartridge checkmate.

This is warfare by blueprint and schedule and so far as the eye of an observer can see is officerless. The sergeant leading the skirmish line shouts to you where you stand in the doorway and asks if you have seen the enemy.

"There he is!" you answer, synchronously with a clatter of shots from the ledge. Sergeant, corporals and their following rush toward the height, but before they have reached the apple-tree at the edge of the skirting field you know that every man of them is blanked. Nevertheless they rush on, knocking off a belated apple or two with their signal pole as they pass under the sweet-tree and they join the enemy among the oaks and birches of the ledge with hilarity all around.

The "assembly" sounds on the bugle, officers start up out of the ground, apparently, and gather the whole battalion, attack and defense now indistinguishable, and they swarm about your house until you almost think you will read from the constitution of the United States to them and tell them you are not expected to quarter soldiers in time of peace. But in a moment the whole detachment is on the road, a column of brown khaki against a line of gray stone wall, and off go friend and foe together to meet their noon appointment with the regimental cook.

The outcome of the sham battle of the symphonists all depends on how the commanding officer of the post disposes affairs in blueprint and schedule at the beginning. If the Germans and the French are to contest for the supremacy, the result will all turn on which side he stations at the height. The order of battle on Friday afternoon as arranged by the first in command was to put the Mendelssohn-Strauss forces in the advantageous place and let the Debussy-d'Indy attack drive them off if it could. Of course it was a fruitless exercise for the party of the Faun and Istar to creep up on the entrenchments of Melusina and Zarathustra, picturesque though they looked on the brown-green meadow under the slanting November sun. The old hedge where you played in childhood is full of Teuton enchantment which will turn in flight every Gallic sentiment that ventures near. The standard of the Faun and Istar will drop before it even reaches the apple tree.

"There he is!" you tell the man who inquires for Zarathustra and the musketry of the philosopher rattles a merry echo to your answer.

It was all settled when the program was sketched. With Mendelssohn and Strauss first, what chance was there for Debussy and D'Indy afterward? Where in these United States, boasting themselves of having orchestras the equal of any heard in Europe, is there the orchestra which could in one afternoon adjust itself to the technique of both Richard Strauss and Claude Debussy; where, too, in these United States, boasting themselves of being able to hire away from Europeans their best conductors, is there a conductor who could put himself thoroughly into the mood of both Zarathustra and the Faun in one and the same day? Where, moreover, exists the audience that could assume an attitude for receiving the musical message of a Parisian master immediately after listening to an authoritative voice from Berlin?

The position on the heights was worthily bestowed on the Teutons. Never has the Strauss formula of orchestral expression better justified itself than at the Friday matinee in Symphony hall. The Strauss structure exhibited by Max Fiedler (did the visit to Garmisch this summer have anything to do with it?) appeared as lucid as that of Beethoven when Mr. Gericke presided at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Fiedler now handles this Zarathustra tone poem with Mozartean lightness and suavity. It can hardly be, the listener thinks, that the man who makes these short, crisp crescendos by way of bringing out the composer's purposes of larger rhythm is the same musician who conducted Brahms so laboriously a week ago. Here was the Symphony orchestra engaged in the work it can best do, here was Max Fiedler summing up all the idea, the force, the originality that he has contributed to the artistic life of Boston. Let him carry this civic triumph to the audiences of the orchestra's southern tour.

AMERICAN

NOVEMBER 4, 19

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE PROGRAM

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Ultra-modern music was exclusively considered at the Symphony concert yesterday and Strauss, Debussy and D'Indy were each shown against a background of the others and, of course, the exquisite prelude to "Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Istar" variations of D'Indy were overshadowed by the mammoth tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Zarathustra was a slightly "queer" old gentleman with a rambling, incoherent manner of speech, if Strauss interprets him correctly, but there is no denying that he said strange and beautiful and wonderful things. Strauss is not noted for melodic invention, but he wrote some very lovely music in this poem, music that is all the more glorious because of its wierd and massiveness of the work, and its lyric beauty more than offsets its eccentricities. And beside his recent outpourings, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is conservative.

It is getting to be a frequent feature of Symphony programs. Mr. Fiedler is fond of it and offers it each year.

The orchestra never played more brilliantly than during this performance, which Fiedler conducted with great vigor and effectiveness. At the conclusion there was so much applause that the whole orchestra was compelled to rise and bow, not a frequent occurrence at the Symphony.

Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" with its fascinating atmosphere and pale, strange coloring made a vivid contrast to the great work that preceded the intermission. It was played with great delicacy and appreciation.

The last performance of D'Indy's "Istar" in Boston was six years ago, when the composer himself conducted. The brilliant descriptive music did not suffer at the hands of Mr. Fiedler and the lady "Istar" was successively diarobed by orchestral variations until the climax.

And while talking about descriptive music let us not forget the beautiful Mendelssohn Overture "Legend of the Fair Melusina," which opened the concert. The composer with his sinuous, watery Melusina motive and his virile theme for the knight Lusignan has been very successful in creating atmosphere. The orchestra will travel next week for the first time this season and there will be no concerts on Friday and Saturday.

JOURNAL-

NOVEMBER 4, 1911.

TONAL SKYSCRAPER PLEASES AUDIENCE

Strauss Selection Wins Biggest Demonstration at Symphony Matinee.

It is the orchestra's turn again to show its glorious virtuosity at this week's symphony concerts; and beyond all doubt and peradventure there is no greater test of orchestral superiority than such prodigious twentieth century tone poems as Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," respectively the second and third numbers on the program played yesterday afternoon and to be repeated tonight.

Apparently the large audience at the matinee liked the performance of the Strauss tonal skyscraper best. There is more to please the average taste in "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—simple, tender themes like that which characterizes the section entitled "Of Joys and Passions," and which is as touching and unaffected as "Nearer, My God, to Thee;" and then again soaring fantasies and whirling rhapsodies that tax the skill of the player and the imagination of the hearer. It is a tremendous tone poem, if ever there was one, representing Strauss's tribute to Nietzche and illustrating at the same time the manner and method of the most likely candidate for the honor of filling the still empty shoes of Richard Wagner, the musical superman. It was a gripping, thoroughly sympathetic performance that the orchestra gave, led by Mr. Fiedler in his happiest manner, and when it was over the audience insisted upon having the players stand up for the applause which was their just due.

But though there was a bigger demonstration of enthusiasm after the Strauss work, it was the French division of the program that finally filled the hall with late-comers, and that won the rare compliment from a matinee audience of having almost every seat remain occupied up to the very end. The Debussy piece, which came first, returning after an absence of nearly three years, showed off the incomparably fine wood wind section of the orchestra. Surely the playing of Messrs. Maquarre, Grisez and Longy must be acclaimed as worthy of the exquisite setting which Debussy has provided for Mallarme's strangely charming verses. The performance of D'Indy's "Symphonic Variations, 'Istar'" completed brilliantly a program begun in the sweet, smooth style displayed by Mendelssohn in his "Melusina" overture.

After tonight the orchestra will be away for nearly two weeks.

HERALD,

OCTOBER 29, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There will be no soloist at the fifth Symphony concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of much more than ordinary interest. It begins conservatively enough with Mendelssohn's Overture, "The Fair Melusine." Then will come Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This will make the first half of the program. The second half of the program will be French, the first number being Debussy's exquisite "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the second and last d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." These were last played here six years ago under the direction of the composer. In these variations the composer begins with the most complicated variations and ends practically with the theme. Thus he pictures the descent of Istar into hell. Each one of the variations represents one of the seven stages of her being disrobed by the gods of the "immutable land," until in the last she stands forth, in the words of Mr. Apthorp, "in the full splendor of nudity." There will be no concerts the following week as the orchestra will then be away on its first southern trip.

RECORD.

NOVEMBER 4, 1911

A "SOLOLESS" SYMPHONY CONCERT

Of this week's symphony concert L. C. Elson says:

There was no soloist. The afternoon was given up entirely to abstruse orchestral problems. Yet not quite entirely. The Fair Melusina must have been astonished to find herself in such company. Her limpid, rippling-water melodies seemed rather canal-like after Zarathustra had spoken, after the faun had complained, and after Istar had been undressed. Nevertheless we felt that the school of formalism had still something to say even in these days of Brobdignagian scores. In overture-writing Mendelssohn took to the water like a duck, as witness his "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage", his "Hebrides", and this waterscape.

We would have liked the tempo of this overture a trifle slower. Mr. Fiedler too often uses whip and spur when the composer gives any warrant for quickness. He must make haste a little more slowly. It is a sore temptation to hurry when the composer intimates an allegro and the strings are technically able to rush at almost any pace. But this haste was only in portions of the chief theme, where the figure of the waves might have been a trifle clearer. The beautiful mermaid was done justice to otherwise, and the fish course, which began this banquet left little to be desired.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 29, 1911—

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" at Symphony Concerts

At the Symphony concerts this week Mr Fiedler will make the tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," of Strauss the principal number. Following it there will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," and d'Indy's tone poem, "Istar," not heard here in a number of years.

The Frenchman has permitted his fancy to play upon the seven stages of the progress of Istar, daughter of sin, in her "Descent Into Hades," according to an ancient Babylonian poem, the original of which is believed to have existed in the library of Sardanapalus.

At each gate the warder strips the fair pilgrim of her jewels or of some part of the raiment which adorned her, the composer meanwhile weaving his musical fabric in an inverse ratio of complexity to the divestment of hers, until at the seventh and last gate her warder takes the final veil from her body.

Mendelssohn's "The Fair Melusine" overture will begin the program.

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 2, 1911.

Geraldine Farrar and Edmond Clement, whose concert in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon is the first of the important miscellaneous concerts of the season, return from Springfield today, where they gave a concert last night.

"The Smart Set," headed by S. H. Dudley, the leading negro fun maker, is pleasing large audiences at the Grand Opera House this week. The Milans-Films Company's Italian production of Dante's "Inferno" as a motion picture drama will come next Monday.

The Symphony program for tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening presents several important contributions of the ultra-modern school. These are the "Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss, the exquisite "Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy and d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar." The concert will begin

[52]

AMERICAN—

OCTOBER 28, 1911.

AMERICAN DEBUT BY ZIMBALIST

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Efrem Zimbalist is the name of the latest violinist. He made his American debut at the Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon in a concerto by the Russian Glazounoff, which was also a novelty in Boston.

Zimbalist is a pupil of Leopold Auer, the celebrated violinist and teacher who, though a Hungarian, makes his home in St. Petersburg. Auer produced Mischa Elman and the report had it that Zimbalist was the equal of that extraordinary youth.

We know that he has an excellent technique, a rich and beautiful tone and a capacity for varied expression. Yesterday he lacked the magnetic qualities which make audiences get excited about violinists. The applause he received was perfunctory rather than enthusiastic. The concerto was rather conventional but not without charm.

An extremely interesting orchestral novelty is Bantock's "Dante and Beatrice," a tone poem which received its first American performance. Bantock is probably the greatest living English composer, not forgetting Sir Edward Elger.

Now he is snugly located in a professorship of music in an English college. His "Omar Khayyam" was performed in Boston last Winter by the Symphony-Cecilia combination.

Bantock has adopted the rather conventional idea of declaring two themes, one for Dante and one for Beatrice and happily uniting them. As descriptive music there isn't much to make you think of the poet, his sweetheart or even the period in which they lived. Taken, however, as music it is a very charming composition, full of unexpected orchestral effects and lyric beauties. It is an interesting example of a composer taking full advantage of a modern orchestra to produce good music.

Cherubini's Overture to the opera "Lodoiska" was played for the first time at these concerts, despite the fact that it is a century and a quarter old. It proved to be a spirited and fascinating piece.

GLOBE— NOVEMBER 4, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Is Heard.

D'Indy's "Istar" and "The Afternoon of a Faun" Included.

The program of the fifth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was purely orchestral, including these numbers: Mendelssohn, "Melusina," overture; Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; D'Indy, "Istar."

It was an afternoon illustrative of the methods of a German and two Frenchmen, all moderns, in expressing concrete images or emotional ideas through tone. And who shall say that Mendelssohn's overture was not written to a "program," that of Kreutzer's opera, with its characteristic and contrasting themes? Its clarity, grace and prettiness gave pleasure yesterday to many and upon the softly expiring motive of "the fair Melusina," brought feminine and unconscious exclamations of a mild transport which even a greater poet need not have despised.

In singleness of purpose the two French works are not comparable with that of Strauss. They would each publish one principal idea, whereas the thoughts upon which the latter is built, while emanating from and pertaining to one character, are themselves various and diverse.

Titanic Tone Poem.

The hearer of Strauss' titanic tone poem is not necessarily to be concerned with what may be the metaphysical significance of the revolt of Zarathustra and of the precise balance of sense and intellect in the superman of whom he would teach. The life of Nietzsche was a perpetual revolt, against Wagner, society, his friends, and ended in madness.

Perhaps he, and after him, Strauss, conceived the "Joys and Passions" as the rebounding pendulum upon mediaeval aceticism and the mortification of the body in religious penance. Is the sodden fugue of "Science," in which the voices grovel as a mole burrows in the earth, satirical of the learning which stuffed the brain and starved the heart, and is the "convalescent" Zarathustra revived and quickened by the poetry and song of the renaissance whose poets and bards went out to hear and learn the song of the birds even as he was bidden to do?

Is Strauss himself satirical of all philosophizing when he begins his poem with the thrice-repeated sonorous figure, premise in the trumpet and confirmation in the orchestra and organ, the third time developed to such magnificent proportions as though the scroll of the heavens were rolled back and the answer emblazoned there?

Is he then the more satirical, when he has commented upon his hero's profound ethics, to end with an obdurate and eternal C major in the plucked strings of his basses, with an orchestra sustained in B major superimposed upon it, as though to wash his hands of a solution to the problem?

Reasons for the Bass C.

Other finely devised reasons have been advanced, while in Munich one may hear that Strauss, once at a rehearsal of the piece, when asked his reason for the C in the bass, simply said he wrote it C instead of B so the 'cellos could play it; that he could not expect them to tune down the C string in time.

[illegible] also closed the first [illegible] of the Golden West" with an unresolved major seventh in the aspiring violins when Johnson, a bold, bad man, has made Minnie for the first time discontent with the restricted life of the "Polka."

Whatever the obstacle, or the inspiration of a "program," Strauss clearly gives evidence at times of a cessation in the sequence of vital ideas and of his fondness for excursions into some related fancy. There is the unhalting facility in redressing up his themes in a new guise, but he reminds himself of the trumpet's text of three tones, root fifth and root, in pages that are inherently commonplace and meager in thought.

It is as music, and as the grammar and import of it as sheer sound that its final appeal must be determined. No interpretation, and not even the beauty of the divided strings in the "rear world," and of "the song of the night wanderer," can give it the coherence and balance of "Till Eulenspiegel" or of "Don Juan."

D'Indy's Theme.

An attempt to read "disgust" into the theme first in the trombones, and later widely repeated by diminution may be baffling to some, even as for those of simple minds who would nudge their neighbors during the playing of Mr D'Indy's piece, symbolical of the disrobing at Hell's gates of the beautiful Istar, and whisper with the certitude born of knowledge, "Now the warder is taking an earring," or "there goes a French heel opera pump."

Here is music sufficiently engaging of itself, in its finely imagined color contrasts and grouping, its effective rhythms, its brilliance and glow. It is, nevertheless, agreeable to remember that from the composer's process of stripping and disclosing more perfectly his thematic material, Istar finally emerges in the nude splendor of her divestitude, superbly embodied in the livid theme in octaves in the strings, with its fiery upspringing skips of the seventh.

Debussy's exquisite prelude was enjoyed. There was applause after the Strauss which Mr Fiedler and the players received together. The orchestra will make its first Southern trip next week.

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 28, 1911.

SYMPHONY OFFERS MANY NOVELTIES

Efrem Zimbalist, Russian Violinist, Makes American Debut.

Yesterday's Symphony matinee was a gilt-edged event. Efrem Zimbalist, a young Russian violinist, made his American debut in a Glazounoff concerto never heard here before; a virtually unknown Cherubini work, the overture to the long since forgotten opera "Lodoiska," was given for the first time at a Symphony concert; and a tone poem by Granville Bantock, called "Dante and Beatrice," had its initial performance on this side of the North Atlantic ferry. It was a veritable round-up of novelties. But too much novelty mars a concert.

Zimbalist's artistic performance was glory enough for one afternoon. The newcomer is quite unlike his compatriot, Mischa Elman, in appearance and in manner. He is rather small and boyish-looking for his age, but he has the air of a veteran who has foresworn vanity and thinks not of himself but of his art. Elman is a youth of leonine individuality. Zimbalist is not a youth of striking personality at all, but only the master player, the sympathetic interpreter, the creator of prodigiously pure tones. Zimbalist's art does not lack virility or brilliancy, but its most prominent characteristics are flawless technique and a poetic feeling that seems to anathematize the raspy tone. The concerto itself was not particularly interesting. It was an instance of the performer magnifying the composition.

Zimbalist was recalled warmly several times when the fireworks were over. He could not have made his first appearance in this country before a friendlier or more appreciative audience.

The Bantock tone poem has a flashlight sort of brilliancy proceeding from a succession of stunning climaxes. But it is a praiseworthy work, nevertheless, with indisputable marks of unborrowed distinction; and it is to be regretted that it came at the end of the program, when so many persons had left the hall. It would have been better to put it at the beginning of the program, for though the Cherubini overture proved pleasing it did not prove indispensible.

The performance of the Brahms symphony in E minor, No. 4, was notable for its heartiness and not for its poli[illegible]

Lacking Coherence.

Bantock is either too hasty or too plenteous with his compositions. A frightfully active man. He writes music with the same volume and the same physical enthusiasm with which he has done every kind of day's work in the course of his checkered musical career. He knows the modern orchestra thoroughly, and scores with lamentable vulgarity and lack of taste. He is the copious inventor of melodies, but we have yet to hear a theme having true distinction from his pen. The introductory measures of "Dante and Beatrice" give a certain promise. A grandiose moment comes with the final glorification of the Dante and the Beatrice themes with all the storm and stress of which the modern orchestra is capable. But it is as if a man, with no very clear ideas in his head, sat down to write a long letter in a very short time.

This is an impression, in fact, that one constantly receives from the music of Bantock. There is no genuine coherence in his work heard yesterday, no continuity of thought. The Dante theme has a measure of dignity; the Beatrice theme is not distinguished, but it has a broad curve and a sweep which is highly effective when sufficiently orchestrated. Outside of these themes, rather commonplace, there is nothing. They are patches divided by noisy passages of the dullest sort of bombast. And this is the tone-poem to which Mr. Ernest Newman, the English music critic, alluded in 1902 as "the fine symphonic poem, 'Dante,' written last summer, and not yet performed!" If there is no present school of English music, it is not the fault of the patriots.

Mr. Zimbalist made an excellent impression. The modesty of his demeanor was particularly refreshing. He had an admirable command of the resources of his instrument; his tone is at once rich and full and refined in its quality; he is a thoughtful and exceedingly gifted musician. The concerto which he played seemed exceptionally dry at a first hearing, but the soloist made the music as interesting as possible, and perhaps even gave certain passages a value that was inherently lacking. Mr. Zimbalist was applauded with the warmest enthusiasm and recalled several times. It is a pleasure to hear that he will soon play again in this city.

The Brahms symphony alone was the work that was worth while and sufficient in itself yesterday afternoon. Many place the first and the second symphonies of Brahms highest in the category of his orchestral works, but it seems to the present writer that there is hardly a greater and finer piece of absolute music extant than this fourth symphony, the essence of Brahms' genius, purified of its dross, impersonal in its message, as the greatest art must be, perhaps one of the noblest symbols in music of that beauty of which we dream, and in our best moments strive toward, here in the midst of death.

The programme of the concert of next week is one of unusual interest: Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture; Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra"; Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" D'Indy's remarkable "Istar" variations

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 4, 1911

At the Symphony

There will be no soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of musical interest. It will include Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusine;" Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar." These symphonic variations by d'Indy were last played here six years ago under the direction of the composer. They picture the descent of Istar into hell, each one of the variations representing one of the seven stages of her revelation before the gods of the "immutable land."

POST,

OCTOBER 28, 1911

BOY VIOLINIST WITH SYMPHONY

Two "Novelties" Also on Friday Programme

Efrem Zimbalist, the 17-year-old Russian violinist, made his American debut yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, on the occasion of the fourth public rehearsal of the season. For orchestral music there were two "novelties," written in 1791 and in 1911. The first was Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," a "Comedie Heroique" in three acts, and the second was Granville Bantock's tone-poem, "Dante and Beatrice." Brahms fourth symphony filled out the list.

The overture of Cherubini is already nearly dead, but Bantock's overture will die sooner. Cherubini was a great formalist. He did not follow tradition because he feared it, but because he had a very rare feeling for style and nobility of structure, and believed that by such means emotion or dramatic feelings were most adequately portrayed. The Lodoiska overture cannot rank as one of his important compositions. The Coda alone has a certain interest. The second theme shows strongly the influence of Mozart. There is a great deal of padding and repetition according to rule, and yet, this overture has a fineness of manner, a certain distinction of style absolutely lacking in the swollen music of Bantock.

After this [illegible] study of th[illegible] profundities and complexities of music. Music, heavenly maid, has become something of a blue-stocking in the century. She demands considerable attention and effort on the part of her suitor. She has gone out of the business of soothing sorrow and calming perturbed natures. Yet we were glad to have a chance to study Strauss, D'Indy and Debussy, and see whether we would "first endure, then pity, then embrace" their elusive or ascetic measures. With Strauss we had already found solid ground. Back of all his tremendous skill of orchestral combination there is something like Genius. If there had never been a Wagner, Strauss would show to better advantage, for one might suppose that vast scoring interfered with direct beauty of thought, had not the preceding Richard taught us the contrary.

"Also Sprach Zarathustra" received a superb reading. We begin to believe that Mr. Fiedler is one of the best Strauss interpreters in the world. He has grown even since he came to Boston, by connection with our great orchestra, and he will be prized more highly in Europe, after his return, than ever before. Every figure stood out clearly; every climax was worked up to with fervor. The trumpets and horns were of especial excellence in this work, the melodic duet of the latter and the three-noted figure of the former being remarkably effective. The impression of the tone-poem was one of colossal power. There was a sense of surety in the composition, a feeling that Strauss knew what he was aiming at and achieved it. Therefore, at the end, even though many an auditor could not have comprehended the full meaning of it all, almost everyone was applauding and Mr. Fiedler was recalled, the orchestra obliged to rise, and considerable enthusiasm reigned.

But we have not even yet come to sympathize with the tonal troubles of the Debussyan faun in that momentous afternoon. We feel sure that he must have been less disagreeable in the morning. What could he have had for lunch? It is quite possible that indigestion lay back of some of his unmelodic phrases. We feel more and more convinced that Debussy, even if he has discovered a new school of musical expression, is not going to play a large part in the musical evolution of the future. Strauss's work may lead us forward somewhere, D'Indy's may lead us back somewhere (into something old-enough to be new), but Debussy's art will move in its own little circle, joining on to no other development. The performance was dainty and poetic, but we found the work not to wear very well.

It was otherwise with D'Indy's "Istar." We were never so heartily impressed by the dignity and fitness of the work as yesterday afternoon. It was ingenious and most intelligent to think of reversing the variation process to picture the progress of the heroine through the seven gates. There was also more of melody than is found in some of D'Indy's works. There was less of that mediaeval asceticism that stares from his quartette and symphony work. Therefore "Istar" made a success only less pronounced than that of "Zarathustra."

It was a bold proceeding to give such a succession of earnest or elusive orchestral works, unrelieved by any solo. It was probably as much of a study-programme as any that has ever been given in the long series of symphony concerts. One little sop to Cerberus, at the beginning, and nothing more. There may have been more than one auditor who went away tune-hungry and wailing—"I have supped full of Horrors!" But to the musical student it was a great opportunity.

GREAT OPPORTUNITY FOR MUSICAL STUDENT

FOUND IN THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Succession of Earnest Orchestral Works Superbly Conducted by Mr. Fiedler.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—"The Fair Melusina." Overture.
Strauss—"Thus Spoke Zarathustra." Tone-poem.
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
D'Indy—"Istar."

There was no soloist. The afternoon was given up entirely to abstruse orchestral problems. Yet not quite entirely. The Fair Melusina must have been astonished to find herself in such company. Her limpid, rippling-water melodies seemed rather canal-like after Zarathustra had spoken, after the faun had complained, and after Istar had been undressed. Nevertheless we felt that the school of formalism had still something to say even in these days of Brobdignagian scores. In overture-writing Mendelssohn took to the water like a duck, as witness his "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," his "Hebrides", and this waterscape.

We would have liked the tempo of this overture a trifle slower. Mr. Fiedler too often uses whip and spur when the composer gives any warrant for quickness. He must make haste a little more slowly. It is a sore temptation to hurry when the composer intimates an allegro and the strings are technically able to rush at almost any pace. But this haste was only in portions of the chief theme, where the figure of the waves might have been a trifle clearer. The beautiful mermaid was done justice to otherwise, and the fish course, which began this banquet left little to be desired.

AMERICAN—

OCTOBER 28, 1911.

AMERICAN DEBUT BY ZIMBALIST

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Efrem Zimbalist is the name of the latest violinist. He made his American debut at the Symphony Rehearsal yesterday afternoon in a concerto by the Russian Glazounoff, which was also a novelty in Boston.

Zimbalist is a pupil of Leopold Auer, the celebrated violinist and teacher who, though a Hungarian, makes his home in St. Petersburg. Auer produced Mischa Elman and the report had it that Zimbalist was the equal of that extraordinary youth.

We know that he has an excellent technique, a rich and beautiful tone and a capacity for varied expression. Yesterday he lacked the magnetic qualities which make audiences get excited about violinists. The applause he received was perfunctory rather than enthusiastic. The concerto was rather conventional but not without charm.

An extremely interesting orchestral novelty is Bantock's "Dante and Beatrice," a tone poem which received its first American performance. Bantock is probably the greatest living English composer, not forgetting Sir Edward Elger.

Now he is snugly located in a professorship of music in an English college. His "Omar Khayyam" was performed in Boston last Winter by the Symphony-Cecilia combination.

Bantock has adopted the rather conventional idea of declaring two themes, one for Dante and one for Beatrice and happily uniting them. As descriptive music there isn't much to make you think of the poet, his sweetheart or even the period in which they lived. Taken, however, as music it is a very charming composition, full of unexpected orchestral effects and lyric beauties. It is an interesting example of a composer taking full advantage of a modern orchestra to produce good music.

Cherubini's Overture to the opera "Lodoiska" was played for the first time at these concerts, despite the fact that it is a century and a quarter old. It proved to be a spirited and fascinating piece.

GLOBE— NOVEMBER 4. 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Is Heard.

D'Indy's "Istar" and "The Afternoon of a Faun" Included.

The program of the fifth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was purely orchestral, including these numbers: Mendelssohn, "Melusina," overture; Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Debussy, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; D'Indy, "Istar."

It was an afternoon illustrative of the methods of a German and two Frenchmen, all moderns, in expressing concrete images or emotional ideas through tone. And who shall say that Mendelssohn's overture was not written to a "program," that of Kreutzer's opera, with its characteristic and contrasting themes? Its clarity, grace and prettiness gave pleasure yesterday to many and upon the softly expiring motive of "the fair Melusina," brought feminine and unconscious exclamations of a mild transport which even a greater poet need not have despised.

In singleness of purpose the two French works are not comparable with that of Strauss. They would each publish one principal idea, whereas the thoughts upon which the latter is built, while emanating from and pertaining to one character, are themselves various and diverse.

Titanic Tone Poem.

The hearer of Strauss' titanic tone poem is not necessarily to be concerned with what may be the metaphysical significance of the revolt of Zarathustra and of the precise balance of sense and intellect in the superman of whom he would teach. The life of Nietzsche was a perpetual revolt, against Wagner, society, his friends, and ended in madness.

Perhaps he, and after him, Strauss, conceived the "Joys and Passions" as the rebounding pendulum upon mediaeval aceticism and the mortification of the body in religious penance. Is the sodden fugue of "Science," in which the voices grovel as a mole burrows in the earth, satirical of the learning which stuffed the brain and starved the heart, and is the "convalescent" Zarathustra revived and quickened by the poetry and song of the renaissance whose poets and bards went out to hear and learn the song of the birds even as he was bidden to do?

Is Strauss himself satirical of all philosophizing when he begins his poem with the thrice-repeated sonorous figure, premise in the trumpet and confirmation in the orchestra and organ, the third time developed to such magnificent proportions as though the scroll of the heavens were rolled back and the answer emblazoned there?

Is he then the more satirical, when he has commented upon his hero's profound ethics, to end with an obdurate and eternal C major in the plucked strings of his basses, with an orchestra sustained in B major superimposed upon it, as though to wash his hands of a solution to the problem?

Reasons for the Bass C.

Other finely devised reasons have been advanced, while in Munich one may hear that Strauss, once at a rehearsal of the piece, when asked his reason for the C in the bass, simply said he wrote it C instead of B so the 'cellos could play it; that he could not expect them to tune down the C string in time.

Mr Puccini has also closed the first act of his "The Girl of the Golden West" with an unresolved major seventh in the aspiring violins when Johnson, a bold, bad man, has made Minnie for the first time discontent with the restricted life of the "Polka."

Whatever the obstacle, or the inspiration of a "program," Strauss clearly gives evidence at times of a cessation in the sequence of vital ideas and of his fondness for excursions into some related fancy. There is the unhalting facility in redressing up his themes in a new guise, but he reminds himself of the trumpet's text of three tones, root fifth and root, in pages that are inherently commonplace and meager in thought.

It is as music, and as the grammar and import of it as sheer sound that its final appeal must be determined. No interpretation, and not even the beauty of the divided strings in the "rear world," and of "the song of the night wanderer," can give it the coherence and balance of "Till Eulenspiegel" or of "Don Juan."

D'Indy's Theme.

An attempt to read "disgust" into the theme first in the trombones, and later widely repeated by diminution may be baffling to some, even as for those of simple minds who would nudge their neighbors during the playing of Mr D'Indy's piece, symbolical of the disrobing at Hell's gates of the beautiful Istar, and whisper with the certitude born of knowledge, "Now the warder is taking an earring," or "there goes a French heel opera pump."

Here is music sufficiently engaging of itself, in its finely imagined color contrasts and grouping, its effective rhythms, its brilliance and glow. It is, nevertheless, agreeable to remember that from the composer's process of stripping and disclosing more perfectly his thematic material, Istar finally emerges in the nude splendor of her divestitude, superbly embodied in the livid theme in octaves in the strings, with its fiery upspringing skips of the seventh.

Debussy's exquisite prelude was enjoyed. There was applause after the Strauss which Mr Fiedler and the players received together. The orchestra will make its first Southern trip next week.

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 28, 1911.

SYMPHONY OFFERS MANY NOVELTIES

Efrem Zimbalist, Russian Violinist, Makes American Debut.

Yesterday's Symphony matinee was a gilt-edged event. Efrem Zimbalist, a young Russian violinist, made his American debut in a Glazounoff concerto never heard here before; a virtually unknown Cherubini work, the overture to the long since forgotten opera "Lodoiska," was given for the first time at a Symphony concert; and a tone poem by Granville Bantock, called "Dante and Beatrice," had its initial performance on this side of the North Atlantic ferry. It was a veritable round-up of novelties. But too much novelty mars a concert.

Zimbalist's artistic performance was glory enough for one afternoon. The newcomer is quite unlike his compatriot, Mischa Elman, in appearance and in manner. He is rather small and boyish-looking for his age, but he has the air of a veteran who has foresworn vanity and thinks not of himself but of his art. Elman is a youth of leonine individuality. Zimbalist is not a youth of striking personality at all, but only the master player, the sympathetic interpreter, the creator of prodigiously pure tones. Zimbalist's art does not lack virility or brilliancy, but its most prominent characteristics are flawless technique and a poetic feeling that seems to anathematize the raspy tone. The concerto itself was not particularly interesting. It was an instance of the performer magnifying the composition.

Zimbalist was recalled warmly several times when the fireworks were over. He could not have made his first appearance in this country before a friendlier or more appreciative audience.

The Bantock tone poem has a flashlight sort of brilliancy proceeding from a succession of stunning climaxes. But it is a praiseworthy work, nevertheless, with indisputable marks of unborrowed distinction; and it is to be regretted that it came at the end of the program, when so many persons had left the hall It would have been better to put it at the beginning of the program, for though the Cherubini overture proved pleasing it did not prove indispensible.

The performance of the Brahms symphony in E minor, No. 4, was notable for its heartiness and not for its polish.

Lacking Coherence

Bantock is either too hasty or too plenteous with his compositions. A frightfully active man. He writes music with the same volume and the same physical enthusiasm with which he has done every kind of day's work in the course of his checkered musical career. He knows the modern orchestra thoroughly, and scores with lamentable vulgarity and lack of taste. He is the copious inventor of melodies, but we have yet to hear a theme having true distinction from his pen. The introductory measures of "Dante and Beatrice" give a certain promise. A grandiose moment comes with the final glorification of the Dante and the Beatrice themes with all the storm and stress of which the modern orchestra is capable. But it is as if a man, with no very clear ideas in his head, sat down to write a long letter in a very short time.

This is an impression, in fact, that one constantly receives from the music of Bantock. There is no genuine coherence in his work heard yesterday, no continuity of thought. The Dante theme has a measure of dignity, the Beatrice theme is not distinguished, but it has a broad curve and a sweep which is highly effective when sufficiently orchestrated. Outside of these themes, rather commonplace, there is nothing. They are patches divided by noisy passages of the dullest sort of bombast. And this is the tone-poem to which Mr. Ernest Newman, the English music critic, alluded in 1902 as "the fine symphonic poem, 'Dante,' written last summer, and not yet performed!" If there is no present school of English music, it is not the fault of the patriots.

Mr. Zimbalist made an excellent impression. The modesty of his demeanor was particularly refreshing. He had an admirable command of the resources of his instrument; his tone is at once rich and full and refined in its quality; he is a thoughtful and exceedingly gifted musician. The concerto which he played seemed exceptionally dry at a first hearing, but the soloist made the music as interesting as possible, and perhaps even gave certain passages a value that was inherently lacking. Mr. Zimbalist was applauded with the warmest enthusiasm and recalled several times. It is a pleasure to hear that he will soon play again in this city.

The Brahms symphony alone was the work that was worth while and sufficient in itself yesterday afternoon. Many place the first and the second symphonies of Brahms highest in the category of his orchestral works, but it seems to the present writer that there is hardly a greater and finer piece of absolute music extant than this fourth symphony, the essence of Brahms' genius, purified of its dross, impersonal in its message, as the greatest art must be, perhaps one of the noblest symbols in music of that beauty of which we dream, and in our best moments strive toward, here in the midst of death.

The programme of the concert of next week is one of unusual interest: Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture; Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra"; Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" D'Indy's remarkable "Istar" variations.

After this we gave ourselves up to the study of the depths and darknesses, the profundities and complexities of modern music. Music, heavenly maid, has become something of a blue-stocking in this 20th century. She demands considerable attention and effort on the part of her auditors. She has gone out of the business of soothing sorrow and calming perturbed natures. Yet we were glad to have a chance to study Strauss, D'Indy and Debussy, and see whether we would "first endure, then pity, then embrace" their elusive or ascetic measures. With Strauss we had already found solid ground. Back of all his tremendous skill of orchestral combination there is something like Genius. If there had never been a Wagner, Strauss would show to better advantage, for one might suppose that vast scoring interfered with direct beauty of thought, had not the preceding Richard taught us the contrary.

"Also Sprach Zarathustra" received a superb reading. We begin to believe that Mr. Fiedler is one of the best Strauss interpreters in the world. He has grown even since he came to Boston, by connection with our great orchestra, and he will be prized more highly in Europe, after his return, than ever before. Every figure stood out clearly; every climax was worked up to with fervor. The trumpets and horns were of especial excellence in this work, the melodic duet of the latter and the three-noted figure of the former being remarkably effective. The impression of the tone-poem was one of colossal power. There was a sense of surety in the composition, a feeling that Strauss knew what he was aiming at and achieved it. Therefore, at the end, even though many an auditor could not have comprehended the full meaning of it all, almost everyone was applauding and Mr. Fiedler was recalled, the orchestra obliged to rise, and considerable enthusiasm reigned.

But we have not even yet come to sympathize with the tonal troubles of the Debussyan faun in that momentous afternoon. We feel sure that he must have been less disagreeable in the morning. What could he have had for lunch? It is quite possible that indigestion lay back of some of his unmelodic phrases. We feel more and more convinced that Debussy, even if he has discovered a new school of musical expression, is not going to play a large part in the musical evolution of the future. Strauss's work may lead us forward somewhere, D'Indy's may lead us back somewhere (into something old enough to be new), but Debussy's art will move in its own little circle, joining on to no other development. The performance was dainty and poetic, but we found the work not to wear very well.

It was otherwise with D'Indy's "Istar." We were never so heartily impressed by the dignity and fitness of the work as yesterday afternoon. It was ingenious and most intelligent to think of reversing the variation process to picture the progress of the heroine through the seven gates. There was also more of melody than is found in some of D'Indy's works. There was less of that mediaeval asceticism that stares from his quartette and symphony work. Therefore "Istar" made a success only less pronounced than that of "Zarathustra."

It was a bold proceeding to give such a succession of earnest or elusive orchestral works, unrelieved by any solo. It was probably as much of a study-programme as any that has ever been given in the long series of symphony concerts. One little sop to Cerberus, at the beginning, and nothing more. There may have been more than one auditor who went away tune-hungry and wailing—"I have supped full of Horrors!" But to the musical student it was a great opportunity.

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 4, 1911

At the Symphony

There will be no soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of musical interest. It will include Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusine;" Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra;" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar." These symphonic variations by d'Indy were last played here six years ago under the direction of the composer. They picture the descent of Istar into hell, each one of the variations representing one of the seven stages of her revelation before the gods of the "immutable land."

POST,

OCTOBER 28, 1911

BOY VIOLINIST WITHSYMPHONY

Two "Novelties" Also on Friday Programme

Efrem Zimbalist, the 17-year-old Russian violinist, made his American debut yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, on the occasion of the fourth public rehearsal of the season. For orchestral music there were two "novelties," written in 1791 and in 1911. The first was Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," a "Comedie Heroique" in three acts, and the second was Granville Bantock's tone-poem, "Dante and Beatrice." Brahms fourth smphony filled out the list.

The overture of Cherubini is already nearly dead, but Bantock's overture will die sooner. Cherubini was a great formalist. He did not follow tradition because he feared it, but because he had a very rare feeling for style and nobility of structure, and believed that by such means emotion or dramatic feelings were most adequately portrayed. The Lodoiska overture cannot rank as one of his important compositions. The Coda alone has a certain interest. The second theme shows strongly the influence of Mozart. There is a great deal of padding and repetition according to rule, and yet, this overture has a fineness of manner, a certain distinction of style absolutely lacking in the swollen music of Bantock.

GREAT OPPORTUNITY FOR MUSICAL STUDENT

FOUND IN THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Succession of Earnest Orchestral Works Superbly Conducted by Mr. Fiedler.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—"The Fair Melusina." Overture.
Strauss—"Thus Spoke Zarathustra." Tone-poem.
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
D'Indy—"Istar."

There was no soloist. The afternoon was given up entirely to abstruse orchestral problems. Yet not quite entirely. The Fair Melusina must have been astonished to find herself in such company. Her limpid, rippling-water melodies seemed rather canal-like after Zarathustra had spoken, after the faun had complained, and after Istar had been undressed. Nevertheless we felt that the school of formalism had still something to say even in these days of Brobdignagian scores. In overture-writing Mendelssohn took to the water like a duck, as witness his "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage", his "Hebrides", and this waterscape.

We would have liked the tempo of this overture a trifle slower. Mr. Fiedler too often uses whip and spur when the composer gives any warrant for quickness. He must make haste a little more slowly. It is a sore temptation to hurry when the composer intimates an allegro and the strings are technically able to rush at almost any pace. But this haste was only in portions of the chief theme, where the figure of the waves might have been a trifle clearer. The beautiful mermaid was done justice to otherwise, and the fish course, which began this banquet left little to be desired.

AMERICAN
OCTOBER 29, 1911.

Miss Farrar Is Anti-Osler

Man's Best Age 45, Says Star

MISS FARRAR, WHO SAYS 45 IS MAN'S BEST AGE

GERALDINE FARRAR

Prima donna, former Melrose singer from one of her latest and best photographs.

Between Geraldine Farrar and Dr. Osler a man has fifteen years of real life.

Miss Farrar said yesterday:

"No man is any good until after he is forty-five."

Dr. Osler said a man ought to be chloroformed at sixty.

Forty-five from sixty leaves fifteen.

This is the trouble with man, according to Miss Farrar:

"He doesn't know enough to be interesting till he is forty-five. And it's the same with a woman, except that she generally learns by the time she is thirty."

The little Melrose girl, who has grown up, just as the fairy tales tell, to be a great and wonderful opera star, leaned back in her sables with an air of finality. She was found as she was leaving the dining room of the Touraine. As she led the way up to her apartment, her dress fairly dazzled. The pointed train of bright blue satin was split down the middle and lined with cerise, so that at every step the brilliant lining flashed and quivered like uneven tongues of flame. The bodice was of filmy white stuff, cut very low in front, and as for the back, there wasn't any, except around toward the sides.

And Such a Diet.

"Ugh-h-h, but I am cold" she shivered, wrapping her magnificent long sables about her as she settled back in a great arm chair.

She was told that she is thinner than when she was here last Winter. She was pleased.

"Indeed I am thinner, and it does make me happy to have people notice it. Why even the most dissolute old loafer on the wharves seemed to notice it as I came down the gang plank on my return from Europe, and it has been some recompense for what I have been through.

"But oh, it just breaks my heart because I can't have any good things to eat. Never, never, never, do I allow myself a real hearty meal. No souces or gravies or raw fruit or anything rich. Just plain things such as the peasants might eat."

Then came the declaration about man's beginning of knowledge.

"No man is any good until after he is forty-five, he doesn't know enough to be interesting until then."

It seemed an opportune moment for asking her the inevitable question as to whether she is going to marry—anybody. She rose suddenly from her chair, and came forward with quick intensity.

"No!" She laughed and turned to her opera cloak, "I wouldn't do anything so undecisive and unnecessary," she said, looking back with a pleased smile as though she rather liked her witicism.

Marriage, For An Artist!

"That makes rather a god definition of marriage," was ventured. She laughed her assent, and then added quickly.

"But I don't mean for other people. I htink marriage is a very nice thing for lots of people. But for an artist—to have a lot of children—and let her work deteriorate—" Her beautiful bare shoulders rose in a shrug of horror, and the great string of pearls lying across her bosom, almost quivered with disdain.

From PRESS,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 29 11

Estabd. 1884

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 6. The principal orchestral item on the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has never been played here by the Boston Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing Bruch's aria from "Achilleus" and a group of songs with orchestra. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Overture "Egmont," Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date OCT 29

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given at the new National Theater Tuesday, November 7, at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon. The soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is to sing an aria by Max Bruch and a group of songs. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and the other numbers will be Debu-

Estabd. 1884

AMERICAN HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29,
OCTOBER 29, 1911.

GERALDINE FARRAR SINGS AT SYMPHONY

Prima Donna's Only Appearance During the Winter Season in Boston.

The special musical feature of the coming week will be the Farrar-Clement concert in Symphony Hall on next Saturday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock. Miss Farrar's appearance in Boston under any condition has always meant an overflowing house, and as this will be the only time she will be heard in Boston during the coming Winter, the demand for tickets is even larger than is usually the case.

Miss Farrar is not to sing this year with the Symphony Orchestra, nor is she to appear here in concert, for her duties in New York are so exacting that it is impossible for her to leave that city after the opera season begins, and she is to sing at the first performance of the year of the Metropolitan Opera Company in Brooklyn on Saturdey evening, November 11.

Big Artistic Success.

For the past month she and Edmond Clement, the eminent French tenor, have been making a concert tour through the Middle West under the personal direction of Charles A. Ellis of this city, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This tour comes to an end in Worcester on Tuesday evening, November 7. Associating on the same program two such eminent artists as Miss Farrar and Mr. Clement and Frank La Forge as accompanist, Mr. Ellis has been pursuing the policy that has always marked his work in the managerial world, of seeking not merely for commercial success, but for artistic as well. They will have the further assistance of fifty members of the Symphony Orchestra with Gustav Strube as conductor.

The programme consists of three purely orchestral pieces. Miss Farrar and Mr. Clement will each sing an aria, the former Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser," the latter the Cavatina from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." Each will be heard in two groups of songs and they will also sing three duets. Miss Farrar's song in the first group will comprise Cherubino's Aria, "Non so piu," from "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven's "An der Geliebte," Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," and Liszt's "Jugendgluck."

Eight Numbers to Be Heard.

Her second group will comprise Bruckler's "Fruhlingssegen," Hugo Wolff's "Wenn du mein Liebster," Strauss's "Zueignung," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum."

Mr. Clements first group of songs will comprise Debussys "Aquarella" and "Romance," and Massenet's "Ouvre tes yeux bleus." His second group will comprise Faure's "Le Secret," Dupare's "Chanson Triste," La Forge's "To a Violet," and Arcadet's "En Passant par la Lorraine."

DOES WITHOUT A SOLOIST.

Mr. Fiedler Prepares Strong Symphony Program.

While there will be no soloist at the fifth Symphony concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of more than ordinary interest. It begins conservatively enough with Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusine." Then will come Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Of all the works of Strauss which Mr. Fiedler has performed in the three years that he has been conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, with none has he achieved greater success than this musical paraphrase of Nietsche's philosophy.

The second half of the program will be French, the first number being Debussy's exquisite "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the second and last Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." These were last played here six years ago under the direction of the composer, who came to Boston as the guest of the orchestra in December, 1905.

In these variations the composer has reversed the usual process, beginning with the most complicated and ending with the simple theme. He pictures the descent of Istar into the infernal regions, each one of the variations representing one of the seven stages of her being disrobed by the gods of the "immutable land."

The following week the orchestra will be away on its Southern trip.

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY

Efrem Zimbalist Plays for First Time in America at Fourth Rehearsal.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE

Glazounoff's Concerto and Bantock's "Dante and Beatrice" Given.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, played for the first time in this country. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Lodoiska".....Cherubini
Symphony No. 4, E-minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin and orchestra.....Glazounoff
"Dante and Beatrice," poem for orchestra.....Bantock

Bantock's poem was performed for the first time in this country and Glazounoff's concerto was played for the first time in this city. Cherubini's overture was played for the first time at these concerts. It was performed by the Harvard Musical Association in the 70s; but neither Theodore Thomas, visiting Boston, nor any one of Mr. Fiedler's predecessors thought it worthy of a place on a program. While it is not so noble a composition as the overture to "Anacreon," or so interesting as other familiar overtures by Cherubini, it has the clearness of thought, the clean-cut expression, the classic profile peculiar to this composer, and the second theme has characteristic suavity and Attic simplicity. When "Lodoiska" was first performed, the instrumentation excited comment. They that are forgetful or ignorant of the orchestral treatment in French opera before Cherubini arrived in Paris may now shake the head at the contemporaneous wonder and praise. Unfortunately, in 1911 it is impossible to listen to music of 1791 with the ears, trained or naive of that year.

Mr. Zimbalist chose a concerto unknown to the audience. His performance was of much greater worth than the concerto, which has few salient pages and no great or original moments. This music is in the later style of Glazounoff, who gave great promise in his "Stenka Razin." It is fluent, colored, at times ingenious, but decorative, not emotional, for in the slow melodies, although there is a striving after emotion, there is no rising above mere prettiness. Mr. Zimbalist is one of the most accomplished violinists that have visited this city in recent years. His technic is highly developed, and although he is only about 22 years old, he is already a virtuoso of the first rank. He is much more than a virtuoso in the lower meaning of the word, for he has fine taste and true musical feeling. He is delightfully free from prima donna airs and graces. His modesty is not feigned, and there is a modesty that is more distressing than pronounced arrogance. He was enthusiastically and deservedly applauded.

Bantock's "poem" is built on two themes, one of which may be supposed to be typical of Dante, the other of Beatrice. Each theme is worked laboriously and for the most part without real effect. The two themes are brought together at the close. It is impossible to deny this composer an intimate knowledge of orchestral resources. He knows his trade and at times produces plausible effects. He also knows and remembers the works of other composers, from Meyerbeer to Puccini; not that he helps himself flagrantly, but his moods are sometimes the moods of others. Unfortunately his themes have little character. Neither one can be said to be typical of the person supposed to be portrayed, and neither one is striking in itself. The cadenzas and the assumed simplicity of the measures introducing Beatrice are decidedly cheap. In spite of a few brilliantly sonorous passages the composition is labored and pretentious. And it is long drawn out with its tiresome repetitions of insignificant matter.

The performance of Brahms's symphony was effective, much more so than the last performance of the same work led by Mr. Fiedler, who was happier yesterday in his choice of tempi, treatment of details, and breadth and warmth of interpretation.

The program of the concerts next week will include Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, Strauss's "Thus Spake Barathustra," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mme. Schumann-Heink Will Be The Soloist Here November 8.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric, on Wednesday evening, November 8, the soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will then make her only appearance here during the current season. She is to sing two songs from Wagner's "The Ring," Erda's scene from "Das Rhinegold" and Waltraute's scene from "Gotterdammerung." She will also sing an aria from "Rienzi."

The principal item on the orchestral part of the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which will be given by this orchestra for the first time in this city. Other numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Bossi's Goldenian Intermezzi; Nos. 1, 2, 5 and 6 and Weber's "Oberon"

w York, 1884

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The time draws near for the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. The first one will be given in the National Thearter on Tuesday afternoon, November 7, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will sing an aria by Max Bruch and a group of songs. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the other numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Estabd. 1884

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 4, 1911

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME OF ULTRA-MODERN MUSIC

Strauss's "Zarathustra," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and d'Indy's "Istar"—Mr. Fiedler's Way with Strauss—A Performance of "Zarathustra" That Revealed and Heightened the Tone-Poem—Debussy and His Piece—D'Indy and His Logical Imaginings

MR. Fiedler came perilously near the "unified" programme—that so embittered the discussions of the connoisseurs in Dr. Muck's time—at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. Three of the pieces upon it were ultra-modern music: Strauss's "Zarathustra," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." The two French composers had the second half of the concert to themselves; and Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," preceded Strauss's tone-poem. Perhaps it was the grace that saved the programme from "unification"; perhaps it may have begun the concert that the dilatory might not have to wait at closed doors through the thirty-five unbroken minutes of "Zarathustra"; perhaps even Mr. Fiedler wished to suggest that Mendelssohn, despised of the ultra-moderns though he is, could write in his way delineative and even slightly "impressionistic" music. Anyhow, the overture to "Melusina" made pleasant preluding, and adjusted audience and orchestra, as the first number of a programme should, to the mood and atmosphere of a concert-room. Anyhow, again, the orchestra performed prodigies of executive skill and interpretative eloquence in the playing of Strauss's tone-poem, and the audience listened most intently to it. The riddles of "Zarathustra"—Nietzsche's book and Strauss's tone-poem—are many and difficult. Mr. Fiedler has solved the riddle of making the music intelligible, engrossing and exciting to the public of the Symphony Concerts. He revived the piece after it had lain nine years unheard here. He has played it three times in as many years. Yesterday, he had his reward. For a moment when the tone-poem ended in the last whispering questioning of the wood winds and the dark responsive murmur of the double-basses, there was silence. Then the audience awoke out of its absorption in the music, applauded it as no piece by Strauss, except "Death and Transfiguration," has been applauded within memory at the Symphony Concerts; twice recalled the conductor, and once brought the orchestra to its feet. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," which used to be the very height of æsthetic fashion, received only scattering and feeble applause, and d'Indy's "Istar" fared not much better. The popular victory of the afternoon lay plainly in Munich and not in Paris. If the audience doubted Debussy and d'Indy, it accepted Strauss.

Yet Strauss owed much to Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra. There are fashions of "interpretation" that go and come with all the classics. Just now, for example, we must listen to incessantly modulated Schubert. The last concession that the present generation of conductors would make to him is to let him sing straightforwardly. Just now, too, we must listen to Brahms, made as sensuous, as colorful, as dramatic even, as the conductor can imagine, and the orchestra play, his music. Strauss is hardly yet a classic; but already there is a new and better fashion of "interpretation" for him. In the nineties, when his music was making its way, and for some years into the present century, the conductors and their hearers with them, seemed to be obsessed by the magnitude of his tonal masses, by the power of his sonorities, the pervading largeness and energy of the whole. At all costs, at all times, in all places, they must make his music sound big, loud, emphatic, even strident. They chose to enforce its contrapuntal intricacy, its bold instrumental combinations, its delineative use of dissonances, its intellectual force, its driving power, its occasional freaks and its occasional furies. They overlooked its frequent sensuous beauty, disturbed its moments of repose, neglected its adroit musical and imaginative adjustments.

A more discerning fashion of interpretation that is much nearer to the true Strauss has succeeded to those old frenzies of power. The conductors can be big, sonorous and puissant enough nowadays, as Mr. Fiedler was in the great sweeps of tone with which "Zarathustra" begins, or as he was again when the Superman, weary of the gropings of science and of all the confusions and hesitations of the hinterworld, rises from his convalescence and goes forth into the joy of the senses, into the fulness of life. No less do Mr. Fiedler and other conductors as penetratingly and sympathetically minded with Strauss's music seek out the passages of deep, sensuous beauty in "Zarathustra." They find them time and again, as in the music "of The Great Longing" and "of Joys and Passions," as in the mounting progressions of "The Night Song." In all these Strauss achieves beauty of mental image, of musical ideas and expression. He is writing, literally, in the poetry of tones. Again, these wise conductors have adjusted their pace, their scale of tone, their rhythms, their interpretative means generally to the varied contents, elastic design and pliant substance of these tone-poems. They have learned even, as they learned with Wagner, to keep the dry and the bare places, unemphatic, Mr. Fiedler's progression in ampler and ampler orchestral voice from the dull and clouded murmur of the double basses at the beginning of the tone-poem to the tonal splendor of the uprising of the sun and Zarathustra with it, made the music sound as magnificent, cosmic, and almost sublime as it really is. Again, he prepared the way for the "Dance Song," he so ordered its gathering course that it seemed to create itself. The detractors of Strauss have strangely called it vulgar. Mr. Fiedler's reading made it as the joy of motion and rhythm come into a world made free. With like penetration and imagination, Mr. Fiedler led the music into the troubled melancholy, the recurring riddle of the end. And what is life and what, after all, is the outcome of its studies and strivings, its joys and passions, its zest and its despair? The spirits of men question the obscurity of Fate; the depths murmur—and none may read their answer. The questioning and the answering voices of the orchestra seemed exalted, transfigured, spiritual.

Furthermore, in the doing of all these things, the conductors are clarifying "Zarathustra" and the obscure tone-poems of Strauss to the ears and the imaginations of their hearers. Mr. Fiedler did not dissect the tone-poem, but he set many a detail, like the Gregorian chant of the horns, in clear and suggestive place. He disclosed without dry pedantry, but with illuminating and proportioning imagination the musical design and contents of "Zarathustra." Then out of the music arose, as Strauss would have them rise, the images and the moods of the tone-poem. It stood forth, as it more and more seems, less as music "after" Nitzsche than as music "after" life, music in which man may read his striving, his questionings, the passion and pain, the illusions and disillusions, the joy and despair of it all. So heard, "Zarathustra" has its epical quality—of our time. So hear.

Yet there is one refuge and pleasure of man that Strauss has overlooked in "Zarathustra"—the shelter and delight of dreams and visions. Debussy discovered them early, has dwelt often in them, has even invented the music that expresses them to the ears and imaginations of his time. We go to music for expression nowadays and unless we are austere we do not question the ways and means by which the composer finds his imparting voice—when once we have become accustomed to them. It is equally easy for one set of extremists to declare that Debussy does not write music at all, and for the other set to affirm that he has created a new music. The mean of truth probably is that he has devised a musical idiom, especially in his harmonies, his juxtapositions, and his instrumental coloring, that exactly accords with the dreams, the visions, the evanescent fancies and images that he would express in tone. Debussy's idiom, as imitators of him are daily proving, as some of his own less happy ventures suggest, is not for all purposes. You may translate "Pelléas and Mélisande" wonderfully, if you are a Debussy, into his medium; but you could hardly bear an "Electra" into it. He perfectly fuses his musical idiom and his expressive purpose in "The Afternoon of a Faun," in the Nocturne of the Clouds, in the new "Iberia." They do not mate so well in the larger and more labored sea-pieces.

Debussy composing "The Afternoon of a Faun" in evanescent phrases, as of fluted melody scattering itself in lustrous flakes against a glowing background of string tone, is writing precisely the music that evokes the vague images, the fleeting fancies, the endless allusiveness of Mallarmé's poem to which he is preluding. Mallarmé sought an esoteric beauty of word and combination of words; Debussy seeks a like beauty of musical phrase and juxtaposition of phrase. Mallarmé sought a silvery limpidity in his verse; Debussy attains a like quality of tone in his music. Mallarmé would have his poem suggest the vague and fleeting course of the Faun's sensuous revery a little touched with melancholy regret. His fancies flit through the brief and evanescent songs of Debussy's flutes and clarinets, the calls of his horns, the tremors of his harp or they gleam for a swift instant in the chords of one or another of his choirs. (Even Mr. Fiedler's over-exactness could not much dull these lustres.) The whole instrumental tissue is as adroitly and implicatingly woven as is the tissue of Mallarmé's words. The music perfectly expresses the matter and the manner of the poem. As perfectly it expresses Debussy's dreaming Mallarmé's dreams and seeing Mallarme's visions. It exists, it deserves to exist by one of the rarest of artistic accomplishments: it gains its expressive end fully; it flawlessly fuses the thing to be said and the ways and means to the saying of it. There is no other justification for any expressive art.

The doubters have been quick to say that Debussy's music lacks intellectual substance—a quality absolutely alien to the ends it seeks—and logical development, another attribute that it as little needs. Formless it is not; indeed, it is often subtle and intricate to sophistication in the adapting of its melodic material to its imaginative purposes; but full-bodied and well-knit, in the conventional sense of the words, it cannot be by its very nature and individuality. Now d'Indy has the logical, the designing French mind, that sees the end from the beginning and each step between. He thinks largely, austerely, nobly in his music. When he is sensuous, he is sensuous by will of intellect, by exaltation of mood. He is never evasive, though he may be abstruse. Yesterday afternoon it was the play of these qualities in "Istar" that set him and his tone-poem in sharp contrast to Debussy and "The Afternoon of a Faun." The design of "Istar"—the final emergence of the theme in stark unisons (when the goddess in the underworld is stripped of her last veil) after the variations have hinted at it (with each loss of jewel or girdle) is an intellectual imagin[illegible]ally adapted to the suggestion of the Babylonian legend and lending itself readily to musical development and illustration. D'Indy is felicitous indeed with his variations. Each has its due place in the musical design; each upturns a new aspect of the theme and seems to bring it in its entirety a little nearer. Each has its poetic and pictorial suggestion of Istar's sorrowing and fearsome quest; of the dismal underworld into which she has descended; of the light of her presence, her jewels, her vesture in it. The theme emerges in its full and final body, and it is of the beauty of Istar bared. The musical and the delineative process have been mated without crack or jar throughout. The tone-poem is a compact and logical whole in which music and poetry have kept equal place. It has withal its remote and calm beauty. And yet the final impression is of devising and ordering intellectual process rather than of imagination creating form and voice for what it would reveal. D'Indy expresses himself, as in his symphony, more freely than he expresses Istar.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 28, 1911

BANTOCK AND ZIMBALIST

A NEW TONE-POEM AND A NEW VIOLINIST

The English Composer's "Dante and Beatrice" Played for the First Time in America—Music of More Rhetoric Than Imagination — Mr. Zimbalist Proves a Violinist of Poised Perfections in a Concerto by Glazounoff That Is Only a "Vehicle"—The Beauty of His Tone—An Old Overture by Cherubini and a Symphony by Brahms

After the classics of an anniversary concert and the four-fold Liszt of a centenary concert, Mr. Fiedler made his fourth programme, yesterday afternoon, almost wholly of novel pieces. One Cherubini's overture to his opera, "Lodoiska," was played "for the first time at these concerts" though it is more than a century old and was in the repertory of the Harvard Musical Association. Another, Glazounoff's concerto for violin, was played "for the first time in Boston," because Mr. Zimbalist, a pupil of the Auer for whom it was written, elected to play it. The third, Bantock's tone-poem, "Dante and Beatrice," was played "for the first time in the United States," and only five months after the original performance last spring in London. Between the overture and the concerto stood Brahms's final symphony in E-minor, for a relatively familiar piece that it was surely "correct" to applaud. "Correct" or not, the audience was pleased with Mr. Fiedler's novel pieces and applauded them heartily and unashamed. For a "novelty" Mr. Bantock's tone-poem was very warmly received; and the old overture of Cherubini was clapped deservedly.

With the concerto, which is in no respect remarkable, the piece was swallowed in the performance. Mr. Zimbalist, the violinist, who was playing for the first time in America proved an agreeable and unaffected youth, a little suggesting Mischa Elman in appearance, but of more refined and less Slavic lineaments. He has attained a poised and curiously even perfection in the subtlest technique of the violin. He draws from it a tone that is lovely of voice, elastic of curve, sensitive to every phrase, never forced, never thinned, that is pure sound sublimated, idealized. And he seemed to feel his music less as the expression of mood and emotion than of the abstract beauty and charm of sound. Seldom has the violin seemed a more perfect or a more impersonal instrument. The audience acclaimed the violinist. Beside Mr. Zimbalist, Brahms had been no more than "correctly" applauded. Moreover, for final tribute to the interest of the concert, the heavy-handed Bantock held the women's hats in their laps to the very end of his tone-poem.

Mr. Bantock is Lisztian in his new tone-poem. For once he has put the Orient and all its voices, pictures and moods behind him. In "Dante and Beatrice," he has written a symphonic poem of approved musical pattern to almost as certain rhetorical effect. There is a melody of Dante and a melody of Beatrice. Each is exposed and developed, as the analysts say; each has its own and its contrasting sections in the development of the tone-poem, and both are fused at the end, as the loves of Dante and Beatrice were fused, when he moved "close at her side and in the happy world" of Paradise. Mr. Bantock treats each theme rhetorically, with all the devices of changeful pace, rhythms, evasive or emphatic harmonies and instrumental timbres that his musical learning and his orchestral imagination can conjure. It is a very full tone-poem, full of notes, full of emphatic sound. The theme of Dante is first "exposed," and it does not much impress the imagination. It is then developed at length in sombre, restless music, now poignant, now clangorous, grim of voice, dark or lurid of instrumental color. The poetic, the delineative purpose seems clear enough. We are to look with the eyes of our ears upon a picture of the poet in the mediæval turmoil of Florence, in the wars of his time, in his mournful and tortured life, and music and "programme" keep pace well.

There is pause and a transitional passage for violin and harp as though they would evoke Beatricee. The clarinet sings low; at first the melody seems a little tame; then as Mr. Bantock develops it is fuller and fuller progressions, it touches and seizes. There is warm luminarity in it. Again "the programme," the poetic impressions is clear in the music. The tone-poem proceeds turbulently, rhetorically, rather brokenly. The melodies of Danté and Beatrice and scraps and suggestions of them appear and reappear. There are changeful rhythms and detail upon detail of instrumental rhetoric. The learned analyst in London bade the listener see—again with the eyes of the ear—Danté by the banks of Letha a procession of patriarchs and prophets upon which he looks, a vision of Beatrice in Paradise and other sights of the poet's "Purgatory." Perhaps and perhaps; but the sound, yesterday, was the sound of orchestral rhetoric that summoned none of those esoteric visions. It was easy to appreciate Mr. Bantock's restless imagination and opulent orchestral resource. It was not easy to read or feel his "tone-poety." The end is clearer; the fused themes bear the united pair into a high heaven of Strauss-like transfiguration of golden-toned beatitude. Then Mr. Bantock's exercise in orchestral rhetoric was done. He—and we of the audience—were breathless. May he profit by his exercise when next he has more to say.

Glazownoff, perhaps, was not far from Mr. Bantock in his concerto for violin, which also is of the rhetoric of music, though of much milder voice than the English tone-poem. It exists primarily for the playing violinist; it provides him with plentiful opportunities for instrumental song duly shaded and colored by the other orchestral voices; it seldom dries away into mere "passage-work"; it is ingenious in transition, and agreeably spirited and rhythmic in the finale. Glazownoff has a practiced orchestral hand; his imagination, within limits, works easily to easily apprehended results. When the concerto was done, the ear recalled hardly a measure of the music. It was full instead of the beauty of Mr. Zimbalist's tone, of the poised perfections of his playing. There is little mood or emotion in the concerto; it only gives the violinist ordered sounds to transmute. Mr. Zimbalist's means were a very complete and subtle command of the technique of the violin, a tone that caressed and fascinated the ear; an unusual feeling for the disembodied beauty of musical sound.

The evenness of Mr. Zimbalist's technical skill is remarkable. He is deficient in no element of it; he emphasizes none. He is subtle without affectation; he commands by beauty and not by power. He is surprisingly poised and even. His tone is like his technique. It is perfectly even, perfectly pure. It has not an idiosyncrasy, a falsity, a flaw. It is the beautiful voice of the violin, seeming to flow spontaneously from the violinist's hand as the distilled beauty of such sound. It never seeks power at the cost of harshness, or meretricious display at the expense of musical feeling. It flows in sustained and pliant curves that have no edge, that bend to every phrase, that are sensitive to rhythm, that seem to make their own transitions and to turn cadenzas into gentle rhapsodies. A violiinist who can achieve such a tone, so ordered and so sensitive, who can so fuse it or contrast it with the other instrumental voices, has indeed the sense of music. It was all as impersonal as though no slender, smooth-faced, wholly absorbed, wholly single-mannered youth was standing between orchestra and audience. Yet out of a very distinct and unusual personality must come such feeling—and such achievement—in beautiful sound. Mr. Zimbalist is more than a violinist for violinists. He would have won Balzac's personage who sought many years for the ultimate beauty of disembodied tone.

CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 10, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan und Isolde;" the funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's scene from "Götterdämmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

ork, 1884

The general sale of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house during the winter opened last Friday.

The season is particularly interesting for Brooklyn in that it will be the last year in which Mr. Fiedler will be connected with the great Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of all the conductors that the orchestra has brought to Brooklyn, which includes all except Henschel, the first conductor, none has made more friends and obtained more solid favor with the Brooklyn public than this modest enthusiastic man, who came from Europe practically unheralded and has made such a profound impression on the musical life of this country.

The concerts this year, as for the last several years, will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 22. The list of soloists is most distinguished. As stated above Mme. Schumann-Heink will appear at the first concert; in December, Kathleen Parlow; in January, Josef Hofmann; in February, Bessie Bella Collier, and in March Mme. Louise Homer.

From EVENING STAR.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 8, the soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing two great songs from Wagner's The Ring, Erda's Scene from Das Rhinegold and Waltraute's scene from Gotterammerung. She will also sing an aria from Rienzi. The principal item on the orchestral part of the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Bossi's Goldonian Intermezzi, Nos. 1, 5 and 6, and Weber's Oberon overture.

York, 1884

[55]

HERALD, NOVEMBER 4. GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1911.

BRILLIANT WORK BY ORCHESTRA

Romantic Compositions Are Superbly Rendered at Fifth Public Rehearsal.

NO SOLOISTS ON PROGRAM

Strauss, Debussy and D'Indy Represented—Even Upper Gallery Is Filled.

By Philip Hale.

The fifth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Legend of the Fair Melusina".....Mendelssohn
Tone Poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra".....Strauss
"The Afternoon of a Faun" (after Mallarme).....Debussy
Variations, "Istar".....D'Indy

There was no soloist; no sleek or wild-eyed violinist, no simpering soprano with a favorite aria and a surprising costume; no muscular pianist eager to engage with the orchestra in a struggle for life or death. The orchestra itself was the soloist and there is none better. It is a pleasure to add that the upper gallery was completely filled; that the house was sold out.

The program was a romantic one, for the overture by Mendelssohn, while it is less romantic, less poetic than the beautiful overture entitled "Fingal's Cave" shows the side of Mendelssohn that keeps his name alive. It is true that there are old-fashioned formulas in "The Fair Melusina," formulas that now are exasperating, not to be pardoned by reason of any quaintness or charming archaism; conventionally respectable phrases, smug and platitudinous utterances, but there are also romantic thoughts poetically expressed, pages that show the possibilities in Mendelssohn. What a pity that he was rich, pampered in his youth, patted on the head, flattered throughout his life, idolized by the English! What a pity that he could not understand Berlioz and was not at ease hearing Schumann's music. His technic was always admirable; would that he had been less priggish, less satisfied with himself and his opinions!

The orchestra played superbly the colossal tone poem of Strauss and d'Indy's variations. It would be easy to take exceptions to tempi chosen by Mr. Fiedler in the former work. He more than once, when the composer indicated only an elastic treatment of pace, turned a slight slackening into a marked change of tempo, and at other times confused allegro with presto, but on the whole the performance was impressive. No conductor of this orchestra, however, has yet made the effect made by Mr. Paur in the stupendous opening. It was not merely an effect of overpowering sonorousness. Mr. Paur gave the idea of elemental grandeur. It was as though the heavens were opened and the universe shouted for joy.

As for the tone-poem itself, it contains pages of Strauss's best and pages that are simply technic or empty rhetoric. The flight is not so uniformly high and sustained as that of "Don Quixote" or "Heldenleben," and there are some who prefer the earlier tone poems, "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel." The fact that "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is associated with Nietzsche need not impress or disturb the hearer. I doubt whether any one deeply versed in Nietzsche will for that reason appreciate this music the quicker or "understand" it better. Even the title may seem to some superfluous. Let every one hearing this music make his own program, be reminded of this or that, dream his own dream, glow with his own aspirations, exult in the mere joy of living or grow chill at the thought of the Lean Fellow with the scythe.

The effect of Debussy's exquisite idyl, pastorate, pastel, what you will, was marred by the undue slowness of the pace. The haunting theme for flute lost character in spite of Mr. Maquarre's consummate art and the various tonal pictures were shifted slowly and became too well defined and obvious.

Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" is not so familiar as it should be. In its nobility of structure, its wealth of tasteful decoration, its rich orchestral expression, as well as in the uncommon technical skill displayed by the composer, it ranks with the greatest compositions of the last 50 years. D'Indy is not yet fully appreciated; he can wait patiently; his time will come. Music like "Istar" purifies the passions, and "Istar" is on a higher plane than the tone poem of Richard Strauss, extraordinary as it is.

The program of the concerts of Nov. 17, 18, will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Grieg's Norwegian melody with variations. The latter, composed originally for two pianos, will be played here for the first time. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an air from Bruch's "Achilles" and songs by Wagner, Schubert and Liszt.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Bantock's Poem Played for First Time in America.

Zimbalist, Russian Violinist, in Successful American Debut.

The fourth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was one of new acquaintances. Granville Bantock's tone poem, "Iaute and Beatrice," was played for the first time in America. Efrem Zimbalist, the young Russian violinist, played for the first time in this country and introduced to Boston a concerto, op. 82, by Glazounoff. Finally Cherubini's antique overture to his opera "Lodoiska" was heard for the first time at these concerts. The symphony was the fourth in E minor of Brahms.

Bantock's new work denotes an advance in the invention and disposal of his material and in command of his orchestral resources over his choral "Omar Khayyam," heard here last Winter. Then at times he was obviously fettered by the text. Now he has taken only a general "program" and has written with spontaneity, imagination, in certain pages with the voice of a rhapsodist, yet not without a sense of symmetry and proportion.

There is also evident an appreciation for dramatic values, a power in characterization, in the expression of abstract thought and in creating the atmosphere which surrounds and denotes an individuality, as that of Beatrice and the poet.

The themes have character, and their development is marked by a fertility in harmonic and contrapuntal devices and by a freedom from the hackneyed formulas that were to be found in Bantock's earlier work. There are effective contrasts of rhythm, dynamics and of orchestral color, combinations of tonal tints, that at times surprised by their novelty, groupings of instruments suggestive of a descriptive or emotional idea, or used merely to enrich the euphony.

Bantock's palette is one of Oriental luxuriance. His tonal coloring and the richness of his melody exhales a tropical fragrance. It may be that in his pages treating of Beatrice his solo violin scarcely reproduces the vision of ethereal virginity that Wolf-Ferrari drew with such chaste and exquisite art in his "New Life," but as a work throughout this is conceived in a bolder, more tangible and more dramatic vein. Not that Bantock's Beatrice loses the halo of worshipfulness, but the light which plays about her face reveals it somewhat less pale in its adorable serenity.

Poet's Music Has Character.

The first division typical of the poet is one of marked interest. It is symbolical of a strong soul that may be moved, as in its more tranquil passages, to thoughts of noble tenderness, and as in the superbly dramatic measures of syncopation may be shaken to its depths.

The celestial benediction was less convincing. Light which filters through stained glass windows of a cathedral may be for Debussy in his "St Sebastian," but less for Bantock. The music, which may be taken to symbolize the poet in his adoration, aspiration and struggle, is to be heard a second and a third time with new appreciation. Through it streams the memory of the emeting in childhood with his adored, which illumines the years as by a path of silver.

Mr Fiedler had obviously prepared the new work with great care, and the orchestra, individually, for Mr Witek and Mr Grisez were conspicuous, and as an ensemble, played with technical mastery and with understanding.

Youth is having its day as lord and mistress of the violin. First came the brilliant Elman as a flame of fire; last year Miss Parlow, scarcely out of her 'teens, and now from the same Auer at St Petersburg, Zimbalist, a modest young Russian who makes no ado over his audience or himself, but who plays with the spirit and the quiet technical command of an artist.

His tone is not one of excessive brilliance or sensuous beauty, but of fine, well-poised purity. His sense of the pitch is practically flawless, his fleetness in rapid passages remarkable and his command of harmonics unquestioned.

Zimbalist an Artist.

Zimbalist is well versed in the demands of style, whether of broad cantalena, as the expressive melody in D flat, which one might call the beginning of the slow movement, or a brilliant bravura. His playing was admirable for its sound musicianship and freedom from affectation or display.

The three movements of the concerto continue without pause. The form and development is free. There is comparatively little here for the mere technician. The cadenza is colorless and dry, the least interesting part of the work.

The themes of the first two movements are happily chosen and lend themselves to development. Throughout both there glows darkly a passion, more repressed than avowed, the passion of the Slav, which is half melancholy. The last movement is richly scored for orchestra, but is more episodic and fragmentary.

Mr Zimbalist was warmly applauded and repeatedly recalled.

The opening bars of the andante of Brahms' symphony invite interest by their vague tonality, and a certain ascetic tranquillity pervades the movement, but the last, with its variations, is indescribably dreary. The first is a tedious thesis on development, and the scherzo, a monograph of bumptious Teutonic jocoseness. Ears having endured the symphony were scarcely better prepared for the timely pieces of the day.

Brahms as a variationist was the equal of Beethoven, and this finale was probably inspired by Beethoven's third or ninth symphony, where the master uses a mighty variation form. But was there ever a simpler melody for variation than the Passacaglia which forms the theme of this Finale! It is not much more than a slow scale, yet the evolutions which spring from it are almost miraculous, the acme of scholarship. By the way, the name "Passacaglia" is generally derived from two Spanish words meaning "coursing the streets," but there is nothing in the character of this Dance which suggests street-life, and its figures in the ball-room were quite bombastic. It is probably a mispronunciation of "Passo Gallo" (the "Rooster step"), which would describe its extreme loftiness admirably.

The reading of the symphony was again a triumph for Mr. Fiedler's intelligent conductorship. Every figure was balanced so that the fairly trained auditor could follow the composer's meaning when the simple field of melody was deserted for the more intricate paths of development. The horn, which is much used in this symphony, deserves an especial word of praise.

Glazounoff's concerto is not a great work, but it is concise, melodic, and has plenty of display for the soloist. It is generally pensive, until its finale, when it is quite the reverse. At times it suggests the Adagio of Bruch's G minor concerto.

The solo instrument plunges at once into "medias res," and presents a soulful melody, which is an immediate letter of introduction for the virtuoso. Mr. Efrem Zimbalist at once made a good impression by his liquid and expressive tone and by some fine harmonics. He has not quite the breadth of an Elman, but he is sure and serene even amidst the greatest difficulties. His work upon the G string was very beautiful, having the brooding quality of a viola.

The cadenza introduced seemed overlong, but it passed all the points of violin technique in review, and in every detail Mr. Zimbalist was without flaw. But the difficulties did not end with the cadenza, for the Finale started off with a roystering theme and the solo instrument began to present skips, harmonics, left-hand pizzicato, and all the pyrotechnics of the violin.

The rollicking character of the Finale suggested a lot of Moujiks dancing a Kamarinskaia. Such a finale is a direct bid for popular enthusiasm, and it is needless to say that this followed. Mr. Zimbalist was frenziedly recalled at least half-a-dozen times.

Now we came into the hot glare of modernity and the concert that began with prim correctness ended with savage intensity. After Liszt's "Dante" and "Tasso," heard last week, Bantock's presentation of Dante and Beatrice seemed rather labored, at least his Beatrice did. Without giving a programme or a fixed story to the music, this much may be established from a single hearing. There are definite "leit-motiven," especially one belonging to Dante, which is powerful enough to be first intimated upon the kettledrums, and another, sweeter and weaker theme, which is Beatrice.

There are four divisions to the "poem," which is, however, continuous. At first Dante is pictured, then Beatrice, then the passion and longing of the lover, and finally the apotheosis, the reunion in Heaven. One can form some idea of the contents from even this brief synopsis, which is about as far as it is safe to go without an especial passport from the composer. We confess to being more impressed with Bantock's recent picture of the bibulous Persian, than with this present one of the amatory Italian. He has entered squarely into Liszt's territory, but without Liszt's equipment. Yet there are some fine portions in the treatment of Beatrice, even if not as tender as Liszt's portrayal of the "Ewig Weibliche," in his Faust symphony for example. Beatrice is far less effectively drawn by the composer than the much noisier Dante, who is certainly very seldom Andante.

The very beginning is original, and we had our talented kettle-drummer in a solo, on three drums, foreshadowing the Dante theme. There was dignity in the motive allotted to this hero, although one was astonished to find him garnished out with Siegfried's "Death Motif" from the Funeral Music in "Goetterdaemmerung." Nevertheless, once accustomed to this annexation, the treatment of the theme was noble in a high degree. Then came Beatrice, ushered in by sweeps of the harp, which Mr. Schuecker played effectively. This lady was rather chromatic for her epoch. After this there came considerable contrapuntal trouble which showed that the course of true love was not running smooth.

A cello loved a clarinette,
With deep-toned adoration.
Which caused the orchestra to fret
And led to syncopation.

The fugal treatment of the Beatrice theme, however, was as expressive and emotional as any modern counterpoint that we have heard. Impressive also is the powerful phrase of the trombones, which seems like a command to the tumult to cease. The tenderness of the celestial music which follows is another beautiful point of the work, which finally ends with an imperfect cadence long drawn-out. In short, the only weakness of the work is in its feminine side. It contains enough of majesty and beauty to make us wish to hear it soon again. Such a great modern work ought to be heard at least twice.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 28, 1911

EFREM ZIMBALIST MAKES HIS AMERICAN DEBUT

PLAYS GLAZOUNOFF'S VIOLIN CONCERTO AT SYMPHONY

Gives Violinist Many Chances for Display—New Bantock Tone Poem Is Played.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Cherubini—"Lodoiska" overture.
Brahms—Symphony in E minor. No. 4.
Glazounoff—Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Efrem Zimbalist.
Bantock—"Dante and Beatrice," Tone Poem, for Orchestra.

The violinist made his debut in America at this concert; the concerto was heard for the first time here; the Bantock work had its first American performance on this occasion; all of which goes to show that Mr. Fiedler is making his last season a very interesting one, and that he is giving us plenty of novelties without neglecting the classics in the least. In fact, the programmes of our present conductor's regime will compare favorably, in their make-up, with those of any of his predecessors.

In this programme also the sane balance was preserved, and the audience was allowed to grow through the classic purity of Cherubini, and the intellectual figure-development of Brahms, into the bolder, yet melodic, vein of Glazounoff and culminate with the modern strivings and harmonic innovations of perhaps the leading English composer of the present.

It was a delightful journey. One school of music does not abolish another. Cherubini sounded more charming than ever in these fretful days of restless modulations, just as one might rest one's eyes in looking at the Parthenon after gazing upon the Taj Mahal. Pure and limpid themes, in correct counterpoise, with modest orchestration, and with intelligible modulations and cadences were decidedly sedative to the auditor when not used in undue proportion. An entire programme of this type, however, would have been rather stagnant. Of course the Cherubini work contained no difficulties for our orchestra, yet not every band could have portrayed the impressive purity of the vein so well. It is a somewhat difficult simplicity. Its soothing tranquility was admirably interpreted.

The Brahms symphony one never ought to tire of, for it offers an endless feast to the intelligent listener. Brahms has not a tenth of the orchestral power of a Richard Strauss, but, per contra, Strauss could never carry out his themes so clearly and logically as his predecessor. One forgets all about the neutral-tinted scoring, in noting how wonderfully Brahms develops his thoughts without becoming either dull or unmelodic. If only some of our later orchestral composers could give us an Andante so direct and melodious as the slow movement in this symphony one would have more confidence in their sincerity.

The first movement was one considered too "Brahmsy" for ordinary comprehension. It shows the recent advance in musical auditorship that it is now readily accepted by almost any symphony audience. The little Rondo which takes the place of the Scherzo as third movement, is certainly a Scherzo in character, if not in form. Again we have Brahms the melodist, in the chief theme, while the countertheme in its more earnest character, is a fine foil to it. We fancy that most auditors enjoy the second and third movements best, but the trained musician demands not only emotion but intellectuality in combination with it, and will glory in the first and last movements of this work.

[56]

POST, NOVEMBER 4, 1911

MASTERPIECES BY SYMPHONY

Strauss, Debussy and D'Indy on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most interesting and representative programmes that have been given during the engagement of Max Fiedler in this city was offered yesterday afternoon at the fifth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, and the fact was appreciated by the audience. The list was as follows: "Melusina" overture Mendelssohn; tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; symphonic variations, "Istar," D'Indy.

Thus were represented on one programme three of the greatest orchestral masterpieces of modern music. The first half of the concert presented the tendencies of the romantic and modern school of music in Germany, and the latter half juxtaposed two works which represent the two extremes of the ultra modern French school. Debussy is in "The Afternoon of a Faun" a marvellous impressionist, and D'Indy has perhaps reached his zenith in the superb tonal structure that is clothed with such gorgeous color and executed with such glowing imagination. The delightful fancy of Mendelssohn was calculated to display Strauss' overwhelming tone-poem in its most magnificent light, and while no one can protest the indisputable masterpieces of Debussy and D'Indy, it must be admitted by this writer that the "Zarathustra" completely overshadowed everything else on the programme not only by reason of the grandeur of its structure and the vastness of the composer's imagination, but by its profoundly great and human philosophy. And, in fact, this tone-poem must be ranked as one, if not the greatest, of the orchestral compositions which have appeared since Beethoven's ninth symphony.

Portrays the Sunrise

Some will be so disgracefully conservative as to dispute this remark, and others admitting that Mozart, Wagner and others wrote some magnificent pages on the most insufficient literary basis, will deny that Nietzsche produced any ideas susceptible of musical treatment. But Strauss pens a cosmic page to portray the sunrise and the invocation of Zarathustra, and in this page he introduces a motive most cunningly fashioned, a motive consisting of three notes, C-G-C, which constitute the only natural notes of our modern scale, which philosophers have claimed contain potentially all the tones of the gamut. This motive—the nature theme, the world riddle, pervades the entire composition, confronts the hearer at every turn, and is treated with inexhaustible fantasy by the composer.

Then Nietzsche speaks of "the backworlds people," those who sought consolation in religion. Solemnly and magnificently the orchestra and the great organ play a chorale, and solo instruments in tone phrases of the Credo, the Magnificat. But the spiritual significance of this passage lies in its mystical vagueness and aspiration. Strauss sings of the longings of the soul with a theme that is as a line out of Swinburne, and then, in a boiling torrent of tone, "Of Joys and Passions"; and his speech is as universal as the speech of Beethoven, and as terrible in its climactic power as anything in the scores of Wagner. Zarathustra sings his grave song, and, significantly enough, this song is a carrying out of the music "Of Joys and Passions." Zarathustra turns to science, and Strauss has written a fugue that will cause the eyes of pedants to bulge for a few centuries more. This fugue is interrupted by mad, Nietzschean laughter. It is resumed in a manner to put to flight the whole futile crew of theorists and pedagogues, and it mounts to a climax which is similar to the opening, only still more blinding in the radiance of the finest C major chord ever scored for full orchestra.

Crash Like Tidal Wave

And who, once hearing, will forget the cunning of the master hand, when the fugue, gone mad, the voices accomplishing the impossible in their striving together over the immense C that booms on, deep below, for about 40 measures, rises toward its impossible climax, and then, just before the culmination, the tone suddenly thins out—the top of the harmony being sustained by the woodwind instruments and the high strings—and with a crash like a tidal wave, the organ and the orchestra enter with all their power, and the trombones, three on a note, hurl out the nature motive.

The dance song is sung first by a solo violin, and then hymned by the whole orchestra. When it has subsided in a degree, a wonderful horn, in the key of A flat, announces the salvation of the soul in a motive so pure and simple and lofty that Beethoven would have welcomed it anywhere, and for pages one wanders in blessed fields. Finally Zarathustra sings his night song of triumph. Over a bell that clangs the midnight hour the orchestra rhapsodizes as only Zoroaster, Nietzsche and Strauss can rhapsodize; there is a sudden transition from C to B major, the theme of the ideal is breathed by the strings, and it goes up in the sky with chords that make one think of receding stars. Away up there is the ethereal color of a chord in B major, and away down the double basses reiterates an obstinate C—the unsolvable end of the universe.

Leaving aside his poetic intentions, it remains that Strauss has taken certain of the elemental meanings of Nietzsche and translated them into music of enormous vitality and matchless splendor. And, however far-reaching his vision, however wild his fantasy, he has remained absolutely master of himself and his material. There is no experimenting. The score is put together with a master hand. It has no weak joints. The tonal scheme of the work—the key relationships, and so on—and its formal architecture are classic and as fundamental as the ground itself. The orchestra is used with unprecedented richness and brilliancy, and, for all that, every page is as clear, as inexorable in its logic, as it could possibly be. When, moreover, it is realized that this music was composed between the first of February and the last of November, 1896, it is apparent that there are a few giants left, even in these days. The performance was a superb one in every detail, and there was long sustained applause for Mr. Fiedler and his men.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST SPLENDID CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first concert of the series of 1911-12 at Infantry hall last evening, before a very large audience of music lovers, and it is not too much to say that every person in the large assemblage had a most delightful treat from a musical standpoint.

Dr. Fiedler had, as usual, selected a program which contained two gems at least for the orchestra, while the concerts played by the soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow, was all that could be desired. The program was:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto in B minor for Violin and Orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61..... Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.

Symphonic Poem, "Tasso: lamento e trionfo" ..... Liszt

It seems almost needless at this late day to say much of Beethoven's grand "Eroica" symphony, for words cannot express all the beauty of the remarkable work.

For many years there has been more or less discussion as to whom Beethoven dedicated this great work, and many persons not so well informed as they might be in regard to the opinions harbored by the great composer, believe it to be Napoleon. Many have contended that Beethoven held Napoleon as an idol to be worshiped, but by investigation it has been ascertained that although the great composer had much respect for Napoleon during the early part of his career, this love and respect turned to hate and scorn as soon as the latter proved himself to be a demagogue, rather than a public-spirited leader of his countrymen.

But the discussion of the relations between the composer and the soldier has no bearing on the work, which although one of Beethoven's early works is one of his masterpieces.

An interesting and most delightful feature of the concert last evening was the first appearance in this city of the talented young violinist, Miss Parlow, whose work has been considered a sensation in the musical worlds of Europe and this country. Her rendition of Saint-Saens' splendid concerto was a musical treat seldom enjoyed by the patrons of music in this city, and most fully sustained the justness of all that has been said of this young girl's remarkable talent and equally remarkable execution.

The orchestra played, in both the symphony by Beethoven, and the poem by Liszt, as it always has played under the baton of Dr. Fiedler, and once more this grand aggregation of players provided its worth in every detail.

The series of concerts by the orchestra is to consist of five performances, the same number that were given last season. The date for the second concert is Nov. 21.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date [illegible] 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

TO-DAY STARTS A PROCESSION OF ORCHESTRAS.

Estab

Three Sides to the Symphony Triangle and More Power to the Elbows of Damrosch, Fiedler and Stransky—Rival Apollos of Russian Dance—Savage Opens English Opera Tour.

David Bispham's song recital in the music hall of the Brooklyn Academy last night pleased an audience that filled every seat in the lower part of the house and overflowed into the gallery. The size of the audience pleased Mr. Bispham. He said it was extremely gratifying to see so many persons interested in hearing the great songs of the world sung to them "in their native tongue."

In his preliminary remarks the American baritone said some more flattering things about the English language. He also put in a good word for American composers. There was just as much bad music written in Europe as could possibly be written here, he said. Of course this nation picked out only the best of what was written on the other side, but in its selection of American music it was not so particular. Much of the worst ragtime and music hall stuff turned out over here could be found in homes that were "otherwise respectable."

Apparently nobody in the audience was guilty of harboring ragtime in his home, because everybody laughed.

For encore to his first group of classic English songs, Mr. Bispham sang the old "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," and after his German composers in the second group, Schubert's "Hark, Hark, the Lark." A third group was made up entirely of American composers. "The Song of the Flint," by William J. McCoy, which Mr. Bispham first sang under the giant redwoods of California, proved to be one of the most popular. Thomas Hood's "Song of the Shirt," as set to music by Sidney Homer, also took well.

The last number was a recitation of Longfellow's "King Robert of Sicily," with Harry M. Gilbert at the piano and Woodruff Rogers at the organ.

And how the concerts now multiply, bless us all! in the last fortnight before grand opera.

The first of the New York Philharmonic Society's concerts at Carnegie Hall take place next week, Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, when Josef Stransky, the Bohemian conductor, will make his American début. The Stransky programme for both days will include Beethoven's Eighth symphony, Liszt's "Tasso," Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, and the violin concerto of Glazounow, with a new Russian star, Efrem Zimbalist.

Then the New York Symphony players have a Beethoven programme to be offered at their second Sunday matinée on Nov. 5, consisting of the Fifth and Sixth symphonies, the C minor and the "Pastoral," the latter and lighter one being played first. Walter Damrosch's men play, of course, at the Century Theatre, the scene also of their first big concert of the new season to-day.

Finally comes the Boston Symphony Orchestra in just two weeks, on Thursday evening, Nov. 9, and the following Saturday afternoon. Max Fiedler for the first time presents Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy," Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," Weber's overture to "Oberon," an aria by Max Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt.

Schumann-Heink is twice soloist with the men from Boston. The Saturday matinée music on Nov. 11 will include Beethoven's Third or "Hero" symphony. Liszt's "Les Preludes," songs by Schubert, the great air from Saint Saens's "Samson and Delilah" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun."

From WORLD

Address New York City

Date OCT 29 1911

The five Philharmonic concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy Opera House during the ensuing winter are being eagerly awaited. The concerts this year as for the last several years will be given Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 22. The list of soloists is distinguished. In November Mme. Schumann-Heink will appear; in December, Kathleen Parlow; in January, Josef Hofmann; in February, Bessie Belle Collier; and in March Mme. Louise Homer. Last year was by all odds the most successful the orchestra has ever had in this borough, and the coming season, so the authorities at the Institute report, promises to be even better. The programme for the first concert will be announced shortly. The season is particularly interesting for Brooklyn in that it will be the last year in which Mr. Fiedler will be connected with the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, his engagement ending next spring. Of all the conductors that the orchestra has brought to Brooklyn—which includes all except Henschel, the first conductor—none has made more friends and obtained more solid favor with the Brooklyn public than this modest, enthusiastic man, who came from Europe practically unheralded and has made a profound impression on the

Est 1884

From EVENING NEWS.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 29 1911

TO HOLD OR NOT TO HOLD THE LYRIC?

Es rk, 1

Proposed Building Might Present Greater Defects Than Present Hall.

All that which has been said and written in regard to the effect of the loss of the Lyric Auditorium upon Baltimore's higher culture has failed to depict adequately the hopeless, helpless condition which its absence would create.

In Washington, where the patronage of musical enterprises is largely drawn from non-business classes, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enabled to give its concedts in the afternoon, when theaters are available. This would not be practicable in altimore, where a large proportion of the music lovers are seriously occupied during the day. We must, therefore, have a house entirely devoted to evening functions or drop out of the running—not be even in the class of "also ran."

There has been much discussion as to the advisability of letting the Lyric pass and building a new house which would better serve operatic purposes. The Lyric stage certainly does present material obstacles to the setting of elaborate spectacles, which have been satisfactorily surmounted by the ingenuity of our visiting stage masters. The artists' rooms are some grades below primitive; still singers are glad to come to Baltimore, willingly overlooking minor discomforts for the privilege of singing to our appreciative public. The acoustic properties of the Lyric are phenomenally good, and this quality is always more dependent upon good fortune than it is upon scientific calculation. The Boston Symphony Hall, which was intended to be a replica of the Lyric, is a comparative acoustic failure.

We must have a large auditorium for the autumn of 1912, or suffer inestimable loss. Let us scan the profit and loss involved in each of the two schemes—the purchase of the Lyric or the building of a new house.

The Lyric is an unequaled concert room, is well situated and is already prepared to nurture vital elements in our musical life.

A new building would in all probability be well equipped with the material accessories which facilitate peace and comfort in the presentation of opera.

The Lyric's operatic disabilities are a too limited stage, poor artists' rooms and the necessary impractical placing of the orchestra. The possible new house might not be finished in time to prevent a season's interruption of the high-plane functions of our musical life. This lack of continuity could have serious results. Then there is no assurance that the greatest skill would reproduce the Lyric's acustic virtues.

Taking every condition into consideration, there seems but one rational mode of procedure in the premises—to hold the Lyric, with its minor shortcomings, until a new building shall have proved its artistic adaptability. Let us hope that those in authority over our destinies, or some of our public-spirited citizens, will act promptly in dissipating the cloud which obscures our art future.

O. B. B.

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date [illegible]

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall will fall respectively on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11, next. The soloist in both concerts will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's Overture to a Comedy. Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's Goldonian Intermezzi and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt.

Esta 1884

At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "L'apres nidi d'un faune" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson et Delila" and songs by Schubert, with orchestral accompaniment.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening next, November 10, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Prelude to "Lohengrin," Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," the Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's scene from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

[57]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From Providence R.I.

Address

Date Oct 5

SYMPHONY SEASON IS AUSPICIOUSLY OPENED

Estab 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at Infantry Hall last night with a large audience in spite of other attractions which would tend to draw some of the patrons of these concerts elsewhere. The opening event was of a character to warrant the expectation that the present season will be a brilliant one, such as was experienced last year when the big hall was practically filled on each of the five nights of the concerts and the programmes were among the best that this musical organization has presented here in the many years it has been affording keen enjoyment to the lovers of the best in instrumental and vocal music. Again, as last year, there are to be five appearances of the orchestra here and the advance sale of seats has assured a success that is deserved and is creditable to the city as well as to the company. There was nothing lacking in the warmth of the welcome back which was given to the orchestra or in the new welcome to the soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow, on her first appearance in this city.

Conductor Fiedler showed again last night his excellent discrimination and happy faculty of making up a programme that is well balanced and suited to the orchestra. The selections were but two in number, exclusive of that of Miss Parlow, but they were admirably contrasted and well calculated to show the versatility and ability of the orchestra and to give variety to the programme. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," which is regarded as a sort of transition mark between the old traditions and the innovations which its composer introduced in music, but holds a place among the masterpieces. It was expected that Providence music lovers would show appreciation of its inherent beauty and the skillful manner of its production and liberal and insistent applause followed its rendition. The other orchestral number was Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," the inspiration for which the composer found in his life in Italy. It is a composition of marked delicacy and yet full of life and was played in a manner that made it a delight to listen.

The initial appearance of Miss Parlow had been anticipated with keen interest by the attendants of the Symphony Orchestra concerts and no disappointment was felt. Still young, she has already had a musical career that might well be the ambition of many of more mature life and her future looms large with promise. That her talent is fully recognized is shown by the fact that she has been engaged for more than two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, which is an honor no other violinist except Mischa Elman has ever received. That she is one of the great violinists of the present day is a tribute which is endorsed by the audience which heard her here last night. Her single selection was Saint-Saen's Concerto in B-minor, a composition which she rendered with fire and force, playing in a finished style and with almost faultless technique, and winning the most sincere and sympathetic applause. The programme follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto in B-minor for Violin with Orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61 ..... Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.

Symphonic Poem, "Tasso: Lamento e trionfo" ..... Liszt

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 29 1911

Dirigent Herr Max Fiedler hat die Programme für die ersten New Yorker Konzerte des neuen Symphonie-Orchesters, welche am Abend des 9., resp. am Nachmittag des 11. November stattfinden, fertiggestellt. Das Donnerstag-Programm umfaßt Reger's „Lustspiel-Ouverture" als Novität, ferner Strauß „Also sprach Zarathustra", Bossi's „Intermezzi Goldoniani", Weber's „Oberon"-Ouverture, wozu Frau Schumann-Heink als Solistin eine Arie von Bruch und Lieder von Wagner und Liszt singen wird. Das Samstag-Konzert enthält die „Eroica", Debussy's „Nachmittag eines Fauns", die Liszt'schen „Préludes" und Frau Schumann-Heink wird die große Arie aus „Samson und Dalila" und Schubert'sche Lieder zum Vortrag bringen.

Estab 18

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 29 1911

Mme. Schumann-Heink, still the greatest of living contraltos, will open her season in this country with a tour of ten concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, early next month. Her own recital will be in Carnegie Hall on November 28.

Estab'd: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From AMERICAN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 29 1911

Sidney Homer

Boston Symphony Concert

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music, under the direction of Max Fiedler, on the evening of November 6. The orchestra will be heard in Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra"; the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy; Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the "Egmont" overture. Ernestine Schumann-Heink will be the soloist, and she will sing Bruch's aria from "Achilleus."

The Hahn Quartet is to begin its annual series of concerts in Witherspoon Hall on the evening of November 17. Other forthcoming musical events include a concert by the Flonzaley Quartet in Witherspoon Hall on the afternoon of November 14; a concert by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Joseph Stransky, and with Lillian Nordica as soloist, in the Academy on the afternoon of November 29; a visit by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, under the baton of Frederick Stock, in the Academy on December 11. Albert Sealding will be the soloist. Edwin Evans will give his seventh Philadelphia song recital in Griffith Hall on the evening of November 28.

One of the most welcome announcements of the season is that which concerns the visit to America, after an absence of many seasons, of the superb orchestral conductor, Arthur Nikisch, whose tenure of office as director of the Boston Symphony is recalled as one of the most brilliant in the history of that organization. Mr. Nikisch, who is being brought to this country by Howard Pew, will direct the London Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians in a series of concerts.

There will be but a brief tour of twenty-one days, from April 5 to April 28, 1912. Philadelphia will, of course, be visited during this period.

Preparations for the forthcoming opera season have assumed such an importance that it has been decided to cancel the engagement of the Russian ballet in "Coppelia" scheduled for Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The Balalaika players, under the direction of Andreef, will give a concert in the opera house as arranged tomorrow night, but there will be no participation by the ballet. From Tuesday until the presentation of "Carmen" on Friday night, the opera house will be the scene of rehearsals and other preparations for the gr...

Estab 1884

ROMEIN

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall fall respectively on Thursday evening, Nov. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11. The soloist at both concerts will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's Overture to a Comedy. Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's Goldonian Intermezzi and Weber's Overture "Oberon." Mme Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt. At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and songs by Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Estab'd: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 28 1911

Concerts of the Boston Orchestra.

Following the custom of previous seasons the Boston Symphony orchestra under Max Fiedler, will give three concerts in Parsons's theater. Monday evening, November 13, Monday evening, January 15 and Monday evening, February 26 are the dates for these events. Eminent soloists will appear at each. Alwyn Schroeder, premier cellist of the orchestra, and one of the most gifted performers on his instrument now before the public, will perform at the November concert. Harold Bauer, one of the greatest pianists of all times, will appear at the January concert, and Kathleen Parlow, who has captivated the musical public of Boston and New York with her wonderful violin playing, at the third and last concert in February.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of three concerts may be procured now at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From HERALD,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given on the afternoon of Tuesday, November 7, at 1:30 o'clock, Mme. Schumann-Heink, soloist. She will sing an aria by Max Bruch and a group of other songs. The orchestra will play Beethoven's "Erlica" symphony; Debussey's "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Estab'd, 188

[58]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

At Symphony Concert.

Infantry Hall held a very large and brilliant audience at the opening concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Concert, Tuesday evening. In the gathering were: Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hoppin, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Green, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mrs. Benjamin A. Jackson, Mr. Daniel Jackson, Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. R. Lincoln Lippitt, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. John G. Aldrich, Mr. and Mrs. John Palmer Barstow, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Miss Edna Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Tillinghast, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. J. J. Finnigan, Miss Evangeline Larry, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. John H. Tillinghast, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian B. Copeland, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Miss Annie May Wallace.

Estab 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH,

Address New York City.

Date

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall fall respectively on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11. The soloist at both concerts will be Madame Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's Overture to a Comedy. Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's Goldonian Intermezzo and Weber's overture "Oberon." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt.

At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the other orchestra numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and songs by Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Estab 4

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

Das „Boston Symphony Orchester" unter Leitung von Max Fiedler kündigt für seine 31. Saison zwei Serien von je fünf Concerten in Carnegie Hall an, und zwar sind hierfür fünf Donnerstag Abende und fünf Samstag Nachmittage gewählt worden. Als Solisten sind die folgenden Künstler gewonnen worden: Miß Farrar, Madame Homer, Madame Schumann-Heink, Miß Kathlen Parlow, Mr. Josef Hofmann und Mr. Alwin Schröder. Das erste Concert ist auf den 9. November anberaumt.

Estab'd, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

Mme. Schumann-Heink will be heard as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Max Fielder, in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, November 10.

Estab'd, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

A new work by Max Reger—the "Overture to a Comedy"—will figure in the first concert for the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Music Hall, a week from Thursday evening. Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the grand opera contralto, who is to be the soloist at both the evening concert and the concert of the Saturday afternoon following, will sing an aria by Bruch and songs of Wagner and Liszt.

Other items on the initial program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," and Weber's overture, "Oberon."

At the Saturday afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and

Estab'd, 1884

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date OCT 28 1911

The programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert in its home town is worth preserving. It contains Philip Hale's annotations on the programme—which was devoted entirely to Liszt. It began with "Les Préludes," and ended with "Tasso." Between these came the "Dante" symphony, and the first concerto, which was played by Rudolph Ganz.

There seems to be only one man left in this town who has not learned the first thing about "How to Liszten to Music."

Estab 1884

From NEW YORK TIMES

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

***

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 10, the programme will be devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," the funeral music from "Götterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's scene from "Götterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

***

Estab 1884

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address

Date OCT 28 1911

Russian Violinist Makes His Debut.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Mr. Efram Zimbalist, a seventeen-year-old Russian violinist, made his début in Boston this afternoon at a Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal and made a decided impression. He played a violin concerto by Glazounoff, heard here for the first time; Cherubini's overture, "Lodoiska;" Brahm's E minor Symphony No. 4, and Bantock's tone poem, "Dante and Beatrice."

Mr. Zimbalist has admirable command of the resources of his violin and his tone is rich, full and refined in quality. He was warmly applauded and was recalled several times.

Estab k, 1884

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall fall on Thursday evening, Nov. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11. The soloist at both concerts will be Mme Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy." Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt. At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the other orchestral numbers, Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un faune," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing "Printemps qui commence" from "Samson et Dalila," and songs by Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Estab 1884

From RECORD,

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 6. The principal orchestral item on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has never been played here by the Boston Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing Bruch's aria from "Achilleus" and a group of songs, with orchestra. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," and Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

***

Estab 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEWS

Address

Date OCT 24 19

Boston Symphony Tonight

Kathleen Parlow, a young pupil of the St. Petersburg master, Leopold Auer, teacher of Mischa Elman and Zimbalist, will make her first appearance in this city with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall tonight as violin soloist. Miss Parlow has made successful public appearance in London and Germany, and recently came to New York.

She will play Saint-Saen's concerto for violin in B-minor. She is probably the most remarkable of the younger women violinists before the public today.

Esta 884

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 29 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall fall respectively on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11. The soloist at both concerts will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy." Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's Goldonian Intermezzi and Weber's overture "Oberon." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt.

At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven, and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and songs by Schubert, with orchestral accompaniment.

Estab 84

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall will come respectively on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11. The soloist at both concerts will be Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy." Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi" and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt. At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and songs by Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Estal 88

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall fall respectively on Thursday evening, November 9, and Saturday afternoon, November 11. The soloist at both concerts will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy." Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's Goldonian Intermezzi and Weber's overture "Oberon." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt. At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and songs by Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Esta 1884

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 28 1911

With Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist, the first programmes of the Boston Symphony concert under Max Fiedler at Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 9 and 11, will include Max Reger's new "Overture to a Comedy," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Strauss; Bossi's "Goldoni Intermezzi" and Weber's "Oberon" overture for the evening concert, and Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler will present the Beethoven "Eroica," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Mme. Schumann-Heink at the afternoon concert will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" and Schubert songs with orchestral accompaniment, and Thursday evening she will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt.

Estabili 84

From AMERICAN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, November 8, the soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink, who will then make her only appearance here during the current season. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing two great songs from Wagner's The Ring, Erda's scene from Das Rhinegold and Waltraute's scene from Gotterdammerung.

The principal item on the orchestral part of the program will be Richard Strauss' Thus Spake Zarathustra.

Estab rk, 1884

[59]

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 28 1911

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 10 will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's scene from "Gotterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

The New York Philharmonic Society's initial concerts of the season take place at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, when Josef Stransky, the Bohemian conductor, will make his American debut. The programme for these concerts will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, concerning the second movement of which Berlioz wrote that it had fallen "complete from heaven into the mind of the composer." Other features will be Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," the "Meistersinger" prelude, and the violin concerto of Glazounow, with Efrem Zimbalist as soloist. This young Russian, the latest product of the Leopold Auer School at St. Petersburg, made his first American appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Friday, playing the Glazounow concerto, and will be heard for the first time here on this occasion. He was soloist of the Berlin Philharmonic last winter, under Nikisch, where he won favorable comment by his rendition of this same work. Zimbalist will also appear at Carnegie Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 5, at the first concert of the Philharmonic Society's Sunday subscription series, when he is to play the Tschaikowsky violin concerto. Other numbers of Mr. Stransky's Sunday programme are Weber's overture "Euryanthe," Svendson's "Zorahayda," and Goldmark's popular "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

* * *

Ork, 1884

From STANDARD UNION,

Addr rooklyn, N. Y.

first concert of the Boston ony Orchestra in the Academy sic, on Friday evening, Nov. 10, bring a programme devoted en- to the music of Richard Wag- with Madame Schumann-Heink oloist. The orchestral numbers prise the prelude to "Die Meister- ger," prelude to "Lohengrin," pre- ude and Love Death" from "Tris- tan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's scene from "Gotterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Estabili 1884

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Mme. Schumann-Heink To Sing With Symphony

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on November 8, the soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink, who will sing Erda's scene from "Das Rhinegold." Waltraute's scene from "Gotterdammerung" and an aria from "Rienzi." The principal item on the orchestral part of the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem. "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Bossi's Goldenian Intermezzi Nos. 1, 2, 5 and 6 and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The Most Extensive and Most Complete

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 29 1911

"Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has never been played here by the Boston Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing Bruch's aria from "Achilleus" and a group of songs with orchestra. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont." Debus-

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening November 6. The principal orchestral item on the program will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem

Ork, 1884

BELL

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 28 1911

Music Notes.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy on Monday evening, November 6. The principal orchestral item on the program will be Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has never been played here by the Boston Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing Bruch's aria from "Achilleus" and a group of songs with orchestra. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont," Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Estal

HOMEIKE NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

LEDGER

From PUBLIC

Address

Date OCT 29 1911

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 6. The principal orchestral item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's stupendous tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has never been played here by the Boston orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing Bruch's aria from "Achilleus" and a group of songs with orchestra. The other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture "Egmont" and Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Estab 84

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 10, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Prelude to "Lohengrin," Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "Das Reingold," "Waltraute's scene from "Gotterdammerung" and Adriano's Aria from "Rienzi."

1884

Est

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 25 1911

Social Doings

At Symphony Concert.

Infantry Hall held a very large and brilliant audience at the opening concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Concert, last evening. In the gathering were: Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hoppin, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Mectalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Miss Green, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mrs. Benjamin A. Jackson, Mr. Daniel Jackson, Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. R. Lincoln Lippitt, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. John G. Aldrich, Mr. and Mrs. John Palmer Barstow, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Miss Edna Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Tillinghast, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. J. J. Finnigan, Miss Evangeline Larry, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. John H. Tillinghast, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian B. Copeland, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Miss Annie M[illegible] Wallace.

Establis

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

The time draws near for the initial Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. The first one will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 7, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist, Madame Schumann-Heink, will sing an aria by Max Pruch and a group of songs. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the rk, 1.

other numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 6, 1911

Philosophy at the Symphony Concert

IT is not idle talk of philosophy in music; and, granted the initial faith which any art demands, the fifth Symphony programme of the season, repeated Saturday evening by Mr. Fiedler, becomes a luminous instance of the philosophic idea vitalized and projected in tone. There was "Zarathustra," man entering into the region of life, above, and "Istar," man entering into the region of death, below. And there was "Melusina," man accepting his fancies for reality, and "The Afternoon of a Faun," man accepting his sensations for reality. The first two insist upon asserting some fundamental principle in life; the last two are content to describe life, in this or that mood. Such were the frank purposes of the composers. And who can say that it did not cause a fundamental difference in their music?

If in the year 1911 Harvard College is offering a course on comparative music it might well contrast pre-Darwinian and post-Darwinian music. For the former it might choose the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—life limited and to be comprehended; for the latter Strauss's "Zarathustra," life unlimited, and to be lived. The latter idea does run through modern thought—Bergson, Wells, James and Nietzsche. At the first awakening we look around and formulate, with Aristotle. Then, with Wells, doubting the instrument by which we arrive at our conclusions, we either look down and are suffocated, or look up and are transported. Nietzsche looked up. He could not look down. Professor Santayana says, "Schopenhauer lived in hotels; he was a pessimist." Poor Nietzsche had stomach trouble (or was it liver complaint?); he evolved the superman. Pitifully limited in material things, he insisted on transcending limits in things spiritual. If he had not had liver complaint, we might not have had the superman. At any rate, he saw a kind of original sin in his liver as the early Christians saw it in their eyes and tongues. And his will evolved its own redemption through vicarious sacrifice—the sacrifice of the mob and of law.

It is just this apotheosis of will at the expense of law which typifies modern music. If you are one of the "dwellers behind," as Nietzsche would say, you will insist upon having your own world finite and comprehensible, and putting the incomprehensible off in heaven with God. But to Nietzsche the incomprehensible is over there, just beyond the foothills, ultimately to be comprehended. Only, to reach it you must break the laws of conventional morality—and of music. It is fair to say that Strauss could not adequately have written Nietzsche into tone in the classical form, which first of all knows its limits. Instead he proceeds from "the dwellers behind," who have their vision at the price of losing their divinity, to picture after picture of the struggling, insurgent soul, asserting its divinity, and finally finishes, or rather stops, in two keys at once. Frankly it is lawless music. And to any but the insurgent soul, which must break its laws to make its salvation, it is more or less foolish music. The overture to "The Fair Melusina," which observes the structural laws of its kind, is totally unable to tell its story, because a story goes on, whereas an overture "returns." Mendelssohn, with a fine perception of the external romance of life, did not feel that there was enough philosophic principle in it to break any academic rules. And his overture must finally be enjoyed only as absolute music. But "Zarathustra" was, to many of the audiences last week, a very real drawing of the veil from the regions which are "beyond good and evil."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

E

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first trip of the season to New York the coming week, the first evening concert being given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, at 8:15 o'clock, and its first afternoon concert on Saturday, at 2:30 o'clock. The evening concert brings one of the important novelties of the season, Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture," Op. 120. The overture is dedicated to Ernst von Schuch, the distinguished general music director of the Royal Opera at Dresden; has just been published and had its first performances, anywhere, in Boston on October 6 and 7. It is comparatively lightly scored, calling for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, kettledrums, triangle and the usual strings. It enjoyed a very considerable success in Boston, for, while it is treated with the elaboration that is characteristic of Reger, the spirit of comedy is preserved throughout.

The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler has also placed on the Thursday evening programme four numbers of Bossi's delightful "Intermezzi Goldoniani," for strings, and the "Oberon" overture of Weber. Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist on Thursday night, as she will be on Saturday afternoon. Her first number Thursday evening will be Andromache's Lament, from Bruch's "Achilleus," and two songs with orchestra—Wagner's "Träume," orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and Liszt's "Three Gypsies"—will compose her second number.

The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the orchestral numbers will be Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes." At this concert Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing as her first number the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah." Three Schubert

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date NOV 4 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO JOIN OUR BANDS.

Establishe

New York Symphony and Philharmonic Matinees—Mormon Choir at Hippodrome—Recitals of Gadski, Gluck and Zimbalist — Opera Here a Week Away—They're Off in Philadelphia with "Carmen."

Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy," delivered to Max Fiedler before the ink was fairly dry, will lead off the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first visit to Carnegie Hall next Thursday night. As to this music, an apt foreword from the American Athens well says that "The spirit of Comedy is reserved throughout."

In opening their thirty-first season, the 101 wise men of the Hub bring back Strauss's "Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi" and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Bruch's air from "Achilles," Wagner's "Dreams" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies," are songs for the star of the evening, Schumann-Heink.

Beethoven's "Eroica" is the symphony for next Saturday's matinée, to which the Bostonians add Liszt's "Preludes" and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." The contralto airs are Delilah's from Saint Saens's "Samson" and Schubert's "Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden" and "The Erl-King.

All-Wagner is the Brooklyn bill of the Boston Symphony on Friday. Adriano's air from "Rienzi," Erda's from "Rheingold" and Waltraute's from "Götterdämmerung" are the solo parts. The band plays overtures to "Meistersinger," "Lohengrin, "Tannhäuser" and "Tristan," Isolde's "Liebestod," and Siegfried's death march.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first appearances of this season, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist on both occasions, returning as she does from the greatest European triumphs of her career. The programmes will be entirely different, that of Thursday evening to include Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture," which came from the press in September and was delivered to Mr. Fiedler literally before the ink was fairly dry. He has also placed Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and four of the Intermezzi Goldoniani of Bossi on this programme and the "Oberon" overture of Weber. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing as her first aria, "Andromache's Lament" from "Achilles," and, with orchestral accompaniment, Wagner's "Traume" and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies." Saturday afternoon the symphony will be the "Eroica," of Beethoven, Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah," and with orchestral accompaniment, "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden," and "The Erl King." Other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

In Carnegie hall to-morrow afternoon the Philharmonic society will give the first of a series of Sunday afternoon concerts. Zimbalist will be the soloist and he will play the Tschaikowsky concerto. Other numbers will be, Weber's "Euryanthe," Svendsen's Legende for orchestra, "Zorahayda" and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

884

Esta

From N. Y. AMERICAN

Address

Date NOV 5 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon. At both concerts the soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink. In the Thursday programme will be Reger's "A Comedy Overture," (Op. 120); "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," of Strauss; an aria from the "Achilles," of Bruch; Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi"; Weber's Overture to "Oberon," and songs by Liszt and Wagner. On Saturday afternoon we are promised Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica"); Saint-Saens' "Spring" aria, from "Samson and Delilah"; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; three songs by Schubert and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Max Fiedler will con-

Es 1884

[60]

TIGHT BINDING

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Die Götterdämmerung" and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erda Scene" from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's narrative from "Die Götterdämmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 4 1911

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of New York concerts this season Thursday evening, Nov. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11, in Carnegie Hall. The Thursday programme includes Max Reger's new "Comedy Overture," Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," four of Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," and the overture to "Oberon." The Saturday programme includes Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Debussy's "Après-midi d'un faune," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." Mrs. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist at both concerts, singing at the first Andromache's lament from "Achilles" and two songs with orchestra—Wagner's "Träume" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies"; at the second, "Printemps qui commence" from "Samson et Delila" and three Schubert songs with orchestra—"The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden," and "Der Erlkönig."

Efrem Zimbalist will play two unfamiliar numbers at his recital at Carnegie Hall, Friday afternoon, Nov. 10—a suite in D minor, by Yorke-Bowen and Cyril Scott's "Tallahassee." Other pieces on the programme are Bach's prelude and fugue in G minor, for violin alone, Tschaikowsky's "Sérénade mélancolique," two Hungarian Dances by Brahms, Drdla's "Esmeralda," and Paganini's "Hexentanz."

York, 1884

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

The first pair of concerts for the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler conductor, will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist at both.

London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From BROOKLYN EDIT

Address BROOKLYN EDIT

Date NOV 5 - 1911

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening will consist of a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" and the funeral music from "Die Götterdämmerung" and the overture to "Tannhäuser."

Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's narrative from "Die Götterdämmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Esta 884

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 4 1911

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Boto, piano, as assisting artist, will give the usual lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. The lecture recital—first of the series for the present season—is set in the Lecture Hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday, at 4 p. m. Like the concert it is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

Esta 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 1911

Madame Schumann-Heink opened her season last Friday evening, November 3, when she gave a song recital at Briarcliff Lodge. This coming week she is singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its first tour of the season. She will appear twice in this city, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with the Boston symphonists. Her recital on Thursday afternoon, November 28, will be the last appearance she will make here this season, and it is the only recital she will give in New York. Any rumors to the effect that Madame Schumann-Heink is to sing in the Hippodrome at any of the Sunday evening concerts given there are unfounded.

Estal 884

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 4 1911

At the Academy of Music Friday, Nov. 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 5 1911

Scarcely a seat remains unsold for the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House, Academy of Music. It is believed that this is the first season such a complete sale has occurred, unless perhaps in the days of the Philharmonic concerts. The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy on Friday evening, November 10, will have a programme devoted to the music of Richard Wagner, with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's narrative from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Es 1884

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to New York the coming week, the first evening concert being given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday at 8:15 and its first afternoon concert next Saturday at 2:30. The evening concert brings one of the important novelties of the season, Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture, op. 120." The overture is dedicated to Ernst von Schuch, the distinguished general music director of the royal opera at Dresden, has just been published and had its first performances anywhere in Boston on October 6 and 7. It is comparatively lightly scored, calling for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, kettledrums, triangle and the usual strings. It enjoyed a very considerable success in Boston, for while it is treated with the elaboration that is characteristic of Reger the spirit of comedy is preserved throughout. The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler has also placed on the Thursday evening programme four numbers of Bossi's delightful "Intermezzi Goldoniani" for strings and the "Oberon" overture of Weber. Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist Thursday night, as she will be on Saturday afternoon. Her first number Thursday evening will be "Andromache's Lament" from Bruch's "Achilleus" and two songs with orchestra, Wagner's "Traume," orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and Liszt's "Three Gypsies" will comprise her second number. The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Beethoven's "Eroica" and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." At this concert Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing as her first number the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah." Three Schubert songs with orchestra make her second number: "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Mottl, and "The Erl King," orchestrated by Berlioz.

Estab 84

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date NOV 4

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon bring the first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink will appear as soloist at both concerts, but the programmes will be entirely different. Conductor Max Fiedler brings one novelty, for Thursday evening, Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture." The big work will be Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and he has also placed on the programme four of the Intermezzi Goldoniani of Bossi and the "Oberon" overture of Weber. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

ork, 1884

From WORLD

Address New York City

Date

Boston Symphony.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At both concerts the soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. The programmes in full and in their order are as follows:

A Comedy Overture, op. 120	Reger
Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"	Strauss
Aria from "Achilles"	Bruch
Goldonian Intermezzi	Bossi
Songs with orchestra,
"Traume" (orchestrated by Mottl)	Wagner
"Die drei Zigeuner"	Liszt
Overture, "Oberon"	Weber
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"	Beethoven
"Spring," aria from "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun"	Debussy
Songs with orchestra,
"Die junge Nonne" (orchestrated by Liszt)	Schubert
"Tod und das Madchen" (orchestrated by Felix Mottl)	Schubert
"Der Erlkonig" (orchestrated by Hector Berlioz)	Schubert
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"	Liszt

Establis

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano as assisting artist, will give the usual lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening next. The lecture recital, first of the series for the present season, is set in the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday at 4 P. M. Like the concert, it is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

Est , 1884

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to New York the coming week, the first evening concert being given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday at 8:15, and its first afternoon concert next Saturday at 2:30. The evening concert brings one of the important novelties of the season, Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture, Opus 120." The overture, dedicated to Ernst von Schuch, the general music director of the Royal Opera at Dresden, has just been published, and had its first performances anywhere in Boston on Oct. 6 and 7. It is comparatively lightly scored, calling for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two trumpets, four horns, kettledrums, triangle, and the usual strings.

The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Mr. Fiedler has also placed on the Thursday evening programme four numbers of Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" for strings and the "Oberon" overture of Weber. Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist Thursday night as she will be on Saturday afternoon. Her first number Thursday evening will be Andromache's lament from Bruch's "Achilleus," and two songs with orchestra, Wagner's "Traume," orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and Liszt's "Three Gypsies" will comprise her second number.

The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." At this concert Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing as her first number the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah." Three Schubert songs with orchestra make her second number—"The Young Nun," orchestrated by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Mottl, and "The Erl King," orchestrated by Berlioz.

E k, 1884

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, has just been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of H. L. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of the Boston sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Sienna marble designed by A. W. Longfellow. The donors are friends of Mr. Higginson, who have elected to remain anonymous. There were no ceremonies attending the presentation of the bust, but it was first seen at the time of the thirtieth anniversary of the first concert of the orchestra. The first pair of concerts in New York on Thursday evening, and Saturday afternoon, will present as soloist Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

Est , 1884

[61]

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 4 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

On Thursday night of this week only fifty seats were unsold for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The tickets are sold for the series, and by now there are probably none left. This is an unusual circumstance, and as far as can be ascertained is without precedent. Friday night at the initial performance of the series the orchestra will present an all Wagner programme. Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the assisting artist. The Wagner numbers for the orchestra are the preludes to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg," to "Lohengrin" and that to "Tristan and Isolde," with the "Love Death" from the same opera, the overture to "Tannhauser," and the funeral music from "Gotter damerung." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltrante's Narrative from "Gotter dammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienze."

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto, piano, as assisting artist, will give the usual lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. The lecture recital—first of the series for the present season—is set in the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday, at 4 P. M. Like the concert it is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

Est... York, 1884

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

NOV 4 1911

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon bring the first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following the custom that has been more the rule than not in the last two or three years, the same artist, Mme. Schumann-Heink, will appear as soloist at both concerts, but as is always the rule with the Boston Symphony in New York, the programmes will be entirely different. Conductor Max Fiedler brings a novelty this time which will be played on Thursday evening—Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture," Op. 120. This work, which is dedicated to Ernst von Schuch, came from the press in September and the escore and parts were delivered to Mr. Fiedler in Germany before the ink was fairly dry on them. The other Thursday numbers will be Strauss's "Zarathustra," four of Bossi's Goldonian intermezzos, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Saturday's orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn" prelude and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing on Thursday Andromache's Lament from "Achilles" and two songs with orchestra, Wagner's "Traume" and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies." On Saturday she will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saëns, and three Schubert songs with orchestral accompaniment, "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden," and "The Erlking."

...k, 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 1911

NOTES OF THE MUSIC WORLD

Est... 1884

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 9, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11, at 2.30, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. The programmes in full are as follows:

Thursday Evening, Nov. 9—Roger, "A Comedy Overture," op. 120; Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra;" Bruch, aria from "Achilles;" Bossi, Goldonian Intermezzi; songs with orchestra, Wagner, "Traume" (orchestrated by Mottl); Liszt, "Die drei Zigeuner;" Weber, overture, "Oberon."

Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 11.—Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Saint-Saens, "Spring," aria from "Samson and Delilah;" Debussy, prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun;" songs with orchestra, Schubert, "Die Junge Nonne" (orchestrated by Liszt); Schubert, "Tod und Das Madchen" (orchestrated by Felix Mottl); Schubert, "Der Erlkonig" (orchestrated by Hector Berlioz); Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN HEBREW

Address NEW YORK CITY NOV 3 1911

Da... urday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will take place on Thursday evening, November 9th and Saturday afternoon, November 11th. On Thursday evening, Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy" will be heard for the first time. At the afternoon concert the "Eroica" of Beethoven will be the symphony.

1884

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 1911

Das erste diesjährige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet kommenden Donnerstag Abend in Carnegie Hall statt, dicht gefolgt von dem zweiten, das am Samstag dieser Woche Nachmittag ebendaselbst stattfindet, und zwar beide mit Frau Schumann-Heink als Solisten. Das Programm umfaßt am Donnerstag Reger's „Lustspiel-Ouverture", Straus' „Also sprach Zarathustra" und Weber's „Oberon"-Ouverture. Frau Schumann-Heink singt Nummern von Bruch, Bossi, Wagner und Liszt. Am Samstag dirigirt Herr Max Fiedler Beethovens „Heroica", Debussy's „Nachmittag eines Fauns" und Liszt's „Preludes". Frau Schumann-Heink singt die große Arie aus „Samson und Dalila" und mehrere Schubert'sche Lieder.

E... k, 1884

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist at the first concert here this season of the Boston Orchestra next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The contralto will sing airs by Mr. Max Bruch and by Mr. Bossig, Wagner's "Traume," with Felix Mottl's orchestration, and Liszt's "Die Drei Zigeuner." Mr. Max Fiedler's orchestral scheme upon this occasion will consist of Mr. Max Reger's "Comedy Overture," Mr. Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

At the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon Mme. Schumann-Heink will again be the soloist. She will sing "The Spring" aria from Mons. Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila" and three Schubert songs, "Die Junge Nonne," "Tod und das Madchen" and "Der Erl König," Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Mons. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes," will be Mr. Fiedler's orchestral numbers.

E... , 1884

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 4 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE FRIDAY

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprised the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erda Scene" from "Das Rheingold," the Waltraute's narrative from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

...k, 1884

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 10, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," the Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Estab... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date NOV 5 1911

Aus dem Reich der Töne.

Im Opernsaal der neuen Musik-Akademie findet morgen, Freitag Abend, das erste Philharmonische Konzert des „Boston Symphonie-Orchesters", Dirigent Max Fiedler, statt, unter Mitwirkung von Frau Schumann-Heink. Das Programm enthält ausschließlich Tonschöpfungen von Wagner.

Das „New York Symphonie-Orchester", Dirigent Walter Damrosch, eröffnet nächsten Samstag Nachmittag im Opernsaale der Musik-Akademie eine Serie von Symphonie-Konzerten für junge Leute.

Es... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK CITY

Date NOV 4 1911

Music of Richard Wagner will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler directing, with Mrs. Ernestine Schumann-Heink as the assisting soloist at the first concert of the Brooklyn series in the New Academy of Music, next Friday evening. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Meistersinger of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," the funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erda Scene" from "Das Rhingold," the "Waltraute's Narrative" from "Die Gotterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Est... 884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

37 "O wad some power the giftie gi'e us To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, and with the orchestra comes as soloist a great Washington favorite, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is scheduled for two numbers. Her first is the great aria "Andromache's Lament," from "Achilles," by Max Bruch. Her second number comprises three songs with orchestral accompaniment — Wagner's "Traume," which, as is generally known, was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde"; Schubert's "The Young Nun" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies." In "Traume" the orchestration used will be that of Felix Mottl, while Franz Liszt's orchestration of "The Young Nun" will be employed. Liszt made his own orchestration for "Three Gypsies."

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica." Another number will be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

Es... 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

42 "O wad some power the giftie gi'e us To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From HERALD,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock the first Boston Symphony concert of the season will take place in the New National Theater. The soloist will be the Washington favorite, Mme. Schumann-Heink. The programme in full is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica"..... Beethoven

Aria from "Achilleus"..... Bruch

Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"..... Debussy

Songs with orchestra—

"Traume"..... Wagner

"Die junge Nonne"..... Schubert

"Die drei Zigeuner"..... Liszt

Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"..... Liszt

Est... 1884

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 9 - 1911

[62]

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 4 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

On Thursday night of this week only fifty seats were unsold for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The tickets are sold for the series, and by now there are probably none left. This is an unusual circumstance, and as far as can be ascertained is without precedent. Friday night at the initial performance of the series the orchestra will present an all Wagner programme. Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the assisting artist. The Wagner numbers for the orchestra are the preludes to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg," to "Lohengrin" and that to "Tristan and Isolde," with the "Love Death" from the same opera, the overture to "Tannhauser," and the funeral music from "Gotter damerung." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltrante's Narrative from "Gotter dammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienze."

Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto, piano, as assisting artist, will give the usual lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening. The lecture recital—first of the series for the present season—is set in the lecture hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday, at 4 P. M. Like the concert it is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

Esta York, 1884

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

NOV 4 1911

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon bring the first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following the custom that has been more the rule than not in the last two or three years, the same artist, Mme. Schumann-Heink, will appear as soloist at both concerts, but as is always the rule with the Boston Symphony in New York, the programmes will be entirely different. Conductor Max Fiedler brings a novelty this time which will be played on Thursday evening—Max Reger's "A Comedy Overture," Op. 120. This work, which is dedicated to Ernst von Schuch, came from the press in September and the escore and parts were delivered to Mr. Fiedler in Germany before the ink was fairly dry on them. The other Thursday numbers will be Strauss's "Zarathustra," four of Bossi's Goldoniani intermezzos, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Saturday's orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn" prelude and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing on Thursday Andromache's Lament from "Achilles" and two songs with orchestra, Wagner's "Traume" and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies." On Saturday she will sing the "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saëns, and three Schubert songs with orchestral accompaniment, "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden," and "The Erlking."

Esta k, 1884

From MORNING TELEGRAPH,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

NOTES OF THE MUSIC WORLD

Est 1884

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 9, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 11, at 2.30, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink. The programmes in full are as follows:

Thursday Evening, Nov. 9—Roger, "A Comedy Overture," op. 120; Strauss, tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra;" Bruch, aria from "Achilles;" Bossi, Goldonian Intermezzi; songs with orchestra, Wagner, "Traume" (orchestrated by Mottl); Liszt, "Die drei Zigeuner;" Weber, overture, "Oberon."

Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 11.—Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Saint-Saens, "Spring," aria from "Samson and Delilah;" Debussy, prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun;" songs with orchestra, Schubert, "Die Junge Nonne" (orchestrated by Liszt); Schubert, "Tod und Das Madchen" (orchestrated by Felix Mottl); Schubert, "Der Erlkonig" (orchestrated by Hector Berlioz); Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Da urday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will take place on Thursday evening, November 9th and Saturday afternoon, November 11th. On Thursday evening, Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy" will be heard for the first time. At the afternoon concert the "Eroica" of Beethoven will be the symphony.

1884

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 1911

Das erste diesjährige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet kommenden Donnerstag Abend in Carnegie Hall statt, dicht gefolgt von dem zweiten, das am Samstag dieser Woche Nachmittag ebendaselbst stattfindet, und zwar beide mit Frau Schumann-Heink als Solisten. Das Programm umfaßt am Donnerstag Reger's „Lustspiel-Ouverture", Straus' „Also sprach Zarathustra" und Weber's „Oberon"-Ouverture. Frau Schumann-Heink singt Nummern von Bruch, Bossi, Wagner und Liszt. Am Samstag dirigirt Herr Max Fiedler Beethovens „Heroica", Debussy's „Nachmittag eines Fauns" und Liszt's „Preludes". Frau Schumann-Heink singt die große Arie aus „Samson und Dalila" und mehrere Schubert'sche Lieder.

E k, 1884

From

Address

Date 1911

Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist at the first concert here this season of the Boston Orchestra next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The contralto will sing airs by Mr. Max Bruch and by Mr. Bossig, Wagner's "Traume," with Felix Mottl's orchestration, and Liszt's "Die Drei Zigeuner." Mr. Max Fiedler's orchestral scheme upon this occasion will consist of Mr. Max Reger's "Comedy Overture," Mr. Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

At the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon Mme. Schumann-Heink will again be the soloist. She will sing "The Spring" aria from Mons. Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila" and three Schubert songs, "Die Junge Nonne," "Tod und das Madchen" and "Der Erl König," Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Mons. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Fawn," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes," will be Mr. Fiedler's orchestral numbers.

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 4 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE FRIDAY

I k, 1884

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprised the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erda Scene" from "Das Rheingold," the Waltraute's narrative from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

"Vision" by

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Establ 1884

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 10, will bring a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, with Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," the Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK CITY

Address

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Music of Richard Wagner will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler directing, with Mrs. Ernestine Schumann-Heink as the assisting soloist at the first concert of the Brooklyn series in the New Academy of Music, next Friday evening. The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Meistersinger of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," the funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erda Scene" from "Das Rhingold," the "Waltraute's Narrative" from "Die Gotterdammerung," and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Esta 884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, and with the orchestra comes as soloist a great Washington favorite, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is scheduled for two numbers. Her first is the great aria "Andromache's Lament," from "Achilles," by Max Bruch. Her second number comprises three songs with orchestral accompaniment — Wagner's "Traume," which, as is generally known, was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde"; Schubert's "The Young Nun" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies." In "Traume" the orchestration used will be that of Felix Mottl, while Franz Liszt's orchestration of "The Young Nun" will be employed. Liszt made his own orchestration for "Three Gypsies."

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica." Another number will be Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

Es 1884

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From HERALD,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock the first Boston Symphony concert of the season will take place in the New National Theater. The soloist will be the Washington favorite, Mme. Schumann-Heink. The programme in full is as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica"..... Beethoven
Aria from "Achilleus"..... Bruch
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"..... Debussy
Songs with orchestra—
"Traume"..... Wagner
"Die junge Nonne"..... Schubert
"Die drei Zigeuner"..... Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"..... Liszt

Esta 1884

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 9 - 1911

Aus dem Reich der Töne.

Im Opernsaal der neuen Musik-Akademie findet morgen, Freitag Abend, das erste Philharmonische Konzert des „Boston Symphonie-Orchesters", Dirigent Max Fiedler, statt, unter Mitwirkung von Frau Schumann-Heink. Das Programm enthält ausschließlich Tonschöpfungen von Wagner.

Das „New York Symphonie-Orchester", Dirigent Walter Damrosch, eröffnet nächsten Samstag Nachmittag im Opernsaale der Musik-Akademie eine Serie von Symphonie-Konzerten für junge Leute.

Es 1884

[62]

TELEPHONE 3925 [illegible]
Intended for Boston Orch

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'l's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 7 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE MODERN PROGRAM

Estab 1884

Mme. Schumann-Heink Pleases as the Soloist of the Evening

SINGER IN GOOD VOICE

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first concert here of the season and Ernestine Schumann - Heink as the soloist of the occasion drew a large audience to the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Fiedler's organization numbers 101 performers now, and its ranking among the world's great orchestras is indisputable. Mme. Schumann-Heink's brilliant operatic record alone entitles her to respectful regard. The finest period of her art has passed, but she is still one of the notable contraltos of the day, and a diva whose achievements have ever been instinct with sincerity and high purpose. Singer and orchestra effected a welcome combination last evening, and the value of this union was additionally enhanced by a program of emphatic interest.

Modernity was distinctively its keynote. Teutonic radicalism in music was represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," and revolutionary French art was typified in Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." The latter is the newer, though more familiar, offering. The mystic intangibility and strange subjective poetry of Debussy's score is in as perfect harmony with Mallarme's baffling "ecologue," on which the work is based, as is the same composer's marvellous accompaniment to Maeterlinckian "marionette drama" in "Pelleas et Melisande." Mr. Feidler's reading revealed every subtle nuance of this remarkable piece of musical writing.

The Strauss work is equally as recondite, although in a much more full-blooded manner than the "prelude." The composer is said to have had in mind more a tribute to the wild, but intensely vital, genius of Neitszche, than a direct musical exposition of his philosophy. Yet, certain philosophical concepts are touched upon the musical episodes, admitting of analysis not likely to be undertaken by the ordinary listener, who can find much to interest him, however, in mere crashing of the tonal waves and the original beauty of its profound polyphony.

Madame Schumann-Heink's art was exhibited in a variety of phases. She sang with rare charm a group of songs that included the lovely "Traueme," based by Richard Wagner on some motives from his "Tristan"; Schubert's "Die Junge Nonne"; Liszt's "Die Drei Zigeuner" and a majestic aria from the "Achilleus" of Bruch's Trojan cycle.

Other numbers given by the orchestra were the frequently heard "Les Preludes" of Liszt and Beethoven's "Egmont," works which now appear almost models of simplicity in contrast with what, rightly or otherwise, the Strausses and Debussys are seeking to do with music.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 4 1911

Estabi

Boston Symphony's Opening Concert

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. The great contralto will sing as her first number the dramatic aria, "Andromache's Lament," from "Achilles," by Bruch, and as her second number a group of three songs by Wagner, Schubert and Lisst. The orchestral part of the program, under the direction of Mr. Fiedler, will be as follows: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Strauss; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

From PRESS,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

Est , 1884

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening at 8.15. The concert will mark the first appearance of the season here of Madam Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who is the soloist of the occasion. Among the singers who come to Philadelphia none enjoys greater favor with the public than this great German contralto. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing as her first number the lament of Andromache from "Achilles." As her second number she will sing three songs with orchestra, the first Wagner's "Traume" which as is already known was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," Schubert's song "The Young Nun" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies." "Traume" has been orchestrated by the late Felix Mottl and "The Young Nun" was orchestrated by Franz Liszt.

The orchestral part of the program is most important and presents features of special attraction. The principal work will be Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem, "Thus spake Zarathustra" which will be played here by the Boston Symphony for the first time. Mr. Fiedler is notably one of the greatest interpreters of Richard Strauss and in no work does he scale greater heights than in this paraphrase of the master work of Friedrich Nietzsche.

The program will also include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Debussy's exquisite prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes." The program in full is as follows:—

Beethoven—Overture ..... "Egmont"
Strauss—Tone poem. "Thus Spake Zarathustra"
Bruch ..... Aria from "Achilleus"
Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
Songs with Orchestra—
Wagner ..... "Traume"
Schubert ..... "Die junge Nonne"
Liszt ..... "Die drei Zibeuenner"
Madame Schumann-Heink.
Liszt—Symphonic poem..... "Les Preludes"

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date [illegible]

Est 1884

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:15. The concert will mark the first appearance of the season here of Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who is the soloist of the occasion. Among the singers who come to Philadelphia, none enjoy greater favor with the public than this great German contralto. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing as her first number the lament of Andromache from "Achilles." As her second number she will sing three songs, with orchestra. Wagner's "Traume," which, as is already known, was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde"; Schubert's song, "The Young Nun," and Liszt's "Three Gipsies." "Traume" has been orchestrated by the late Felix Motti, and "The Young Nun" was orchestrated by Franz Liszt.

The orchestral part of the programme is most important, and presents features of special attractiveness. The principal work will be Richard Strauss's stupendous tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which will be played here by the Boston Symphony for the first time. Mr. Fiedler is notably one of the greatest interpreters of Richard Strauss, and in no work does he scale greater heights than in this paraphrase of the matter work of Friedrich Nietzsche. The work is not unknown to Philadelphia audiences, although it has not had many performances here. Strauss began it in Munich, in February, 1896, and completed it the following August. It had its first performance at Frankfort-on-the Main, on November 27 of that year. The first performance in America was given by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas, early in 1897, and Mr. Paur gave it in Boston for the first time on October 30 of that year. It is the belief of many admirers of Strauss that this is his greatest work. The programme will also include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Debussy's exquisite prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, "Egmont" ..... Beethoven
Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" ..... Strauss
Aria from "Achilles" ..... Bruch
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy
Songs with orchestra—
"Traume" ..... Wagner
"Die junge Nonne" ..... Schubert
"Die drei Zigeuner ..... Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Soloist, Madame Schumann-Heink.

From EVENING SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 4 [illegible]

Est 18

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Schumann-Heink Will Be The Soloist At Lyric November 8.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert of the season in the Lyric Theatre on next Wednesday evening, November 8, at 8.15. The soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will then make her only appearance of the season in Baltimore. Mme. Schumann-Heink is down on the program for two numbers.

Max Fiedler, conductor, has placed on this program Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The program, in full, is as follows:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" ..... Strauss
(a) Erda's Scene from "Das Rheingold" ..... Wagner
(b) Waltraute's Narrative from "Gotterdammerung" ..... Wagner
Intermezzi Goldonian ..... Bossi
Adriano's Aria from "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Overture, "Oberon"

[63]

From PRESS,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 7 - 1911

Estab 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY, FIRST CONCERT

A Varied Program Presented with Schumann-Heink as Soloist.

Program.

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.
Strauss—Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."
Bruch—Andromache's Lament from "Achilles" (Part III, No. 16), Op. 50.
Debussy—Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme).
Songs with orchestra:—
(a) Wagner, "Traume" (orchestrated by Felix Mottl).
(b) Schubert, "Die junge Nonne" (orchestrated by Franz Liszt).
(c) Liszt, "Die drei Zigeuner."
Liszt, "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3.
Soloist, Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto.

The loyalty which Philadelphia has always demonstrated for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was manifested again last evening, when an audience that completely filled the Academy of Music, in spite of the very rainy night, turned out to the first concert of the season. At the appearance of Max Fiedler, his reception was most cordial, and his program so much pleased that this warmth of applause was more marked following each of the numbers. It was especially emphatic after the playing of Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the most exacting number played by the orchestra. To this enthusiasm, more for the hard work of Mr. Fiedler and his men than for the pleasure afforded by the Strauss composition, the conductor compelled the orchestra to stand with him to share in the demonstration.

The Stormy "Zarathustra."

There was a rest of ten minutes following this composition. It was necessary after the hard work that Strauss places upon all the instruments, and equally so to allow the audience to recover itself after this long, weird combination of harmonious and discordant tones. Here and there is luscious Strauss melody, but just sufficient to tantalize, and then off again into those wild flights of musical fancy in which the modern composer so thoroughly delights. While the riddles of "Zarathustra" are many and almost unsolvable, Mr. Fiedler at least so far interprets them as to making the music intelligible, engrossing and stirring. He really is deserving of unstinted praise for the way he accomplished this almost inhuman task. But the few passages of deep, sensuous beauty in "Zarathustra" are well worth its introduction in a program, with the other portions to give an audience a chance to study the great genius of the greatest of present-day composers.

How delightful, though, was the dainty little tuneful "Afternoon of a Faun," which was the next orchestral number given. What a master at program making is Mr. Fiedler to have played this gentle little composition right after the stormy "Zarathustra." It had the appreciated effect of the enjoyable calm after the violent storm. The opening orchestral number was Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," No. 3, played at the last concert but one by the Philadelphia Orchestra—the Liszt Centenary Concert. Both were given in the best style of Mr. Fiedler and the Boston intstrumentalists.

Schumann-Heink the Soloist.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist. She sang twice, first after the Strauss number, Bruch's Androche's Lament from "Achilles," and just before the last orchestral number, three songs, Wagner's "Traume," a great favorite with the composer; Schubert's "Die Junge Nonne," and Liszt's "Die Drei Zigeuner." The beloved contralto was in superb voice. She has never sung better in this city than last night and the audience was overly appreciative, so much so after the last number as to call out the singer a number of times, holding the orchestra from completing the program. The Schubert and Liszt numbers were especially suited to the singer's voice, and in the latter Concertmeister A. Witek, assisted so materially with his fine violin obbligato that Mme. Schumann-Heink compelled him to stand with her, hand in hand, to share the applause. The next Boston Symphony Concert will be given on Monday evening, December 4.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address

Date

NOV 5 - 1911

Estab 1884

At an informal supper, given at the house of a Boston music-lover, after the last concert of the Symphony Orchestra, some years ago, Mr. W. F. Apthorp was chatting with Mr. Higginson about the orchestra, when Mr. Loeffler, overhearing the word "oboe" as he was passing by, joined them and said: "Wouldn't you like to have the first oboe of the Opera-Comique in Paris?" "Yes, I should," replied Mr. Higginson, "and I shouldn't mind having the first flute, too!" "Do you know I think they could be had, both of them," went on Mr. Loeffler. "Then go and get them!" was Mr. Higginson's laconic answer. And sure enough, Messrs. Mole and Sautet was first flute and first oboe in the Symphony Orchestra next season.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From HARTFORD COURANT

Address

Date NOV 8 - 1911

...performance will ...kept ... a constant uproar.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of a series of three concerts by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at Parsons's theater, Monday evening, November 13. Max Fiedler will conduct and Alwyn Schroeder will appear as soloist. The orchestra, conductor and soloist are all favorites with the musical public of Hartford, a public eager for the first event of the season, a large percentage of subscribers of former years having renewed and many new subscribers having taken season tickets. Many patrons will regret the fact that Mr. Fiedler will not return to the orchestra after the present year. His enthusiastic interest in the work, has done more to make the concerts of the Boston orchestra popular in Hartford than ever before and the performances of the year will doubtless equal the best of other seasons. Reserved seats are now selling at John M. Gallup & Co's.

Estab ...84

From EVENING STAR.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, November 8, at 8:15. The soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink, who is down on the program for two numbers. These two are songs from Wagner's Ring, which are most closely connected with her name and fame.

Obeying the wishes of many of the patrons of the Boston concerts here Mr. Fiedler has placed on this program Richard Strauss' stupendous tone poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra, which will be heard in this city for the first time.

Est ...884

From RECORD,

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date NOV 5 1911

* * *

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The concert will mark the first appearance of the season here of Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who is the soloist of the occasion. She will sing as her first number the lament of Andromache from "Achilles." As her second number she will sing three songs with orchestra, the first Wagner's "Traeume," which, as already known, was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde;" Schubert's song "The Young Nun" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies." "Traeume" has been orchestrated by the late Felix Mottl and "The Young Nun" was orchestrated by Franz Liszt.

...884

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

The orchestral part of the program presents features of special attraction. The principal work will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which will be played here by the Boston Symphony for the first time. Conductor Fiedler is notably one of the greatest interpreters of Richard Strauss. Strauss began the work in Munich in February, 1896, and completed it the following August. The first performance in America was given by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas, early in 1897. The program will also include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Debussy's prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date NOV 7 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Madame Schumann-Heink Appears in a Notable Program

There was not a vacant seat in the Academy of Music last night at the first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Fiedler. It was a notable program. The chief orchestral number was Richand Strauss' tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This extraordinary composition has been heard here before and must have many more exemplifications before it can be thoroughly understood. Few people have discovered exactly what Nietzsche meant when he wrote the book of which the tone-poem is supposed to be a musical setting; hence it is not easy to divine all that Richard Strauss tries to read into a score which is supposed to illuminate Zoroaster's philosophy. Nevertheless, it is a work of great interest. There is more tonal beauty in it than the composer commonly allows himself, while the orchestration is a marvel. If one cannot understand all of it one can at least enjoy it, especially when played so admirably.

The other orchestral numbers were: Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"—a work of rare interest—and Liszt's symphonic poem No. 3, "Les Preludes." The latter was in recognition of the centennial of Liszt's birth and was excellently played.

Mme. Schumann-Heink elected to appear for her dramatic number in Andromache's lament from "Achilles," by Bruch, a stately piece of composition in the classic style, which she sang with great authority and with the plenitude of her vocal powers, which show no diminution.

Her other numbers were Wagner's "Traume," Schubert's "Die Junge Nonne" and Liszt's "Die drei Zigeuner." These she sang delightfully. It will be noted that these four vocal numbers cover a wide range of style and emotions, but it would not be easy to say in which

E ...rk, 1884

WELCOME WORDS TO WO

Women who suffer with disorders pec... sex should write to Dr. Pierce and re... advice of a physician of over 40 years ...—a skilled and successful specialist in ... of women. Every letter of this sort ... careful consideration, and is regarded

From TELEGRAPH

Address

Date NOV 4 1911

band.

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening. Madame Schumann-Heink, who is the soloist, will sing as her first number Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles." As her second number she will sing three songs with orchestra, "Traume," Wagner's preliminary study for the second act of "Tristan and Isolde"; Schubert's "The Young Nun," and Liszt's "Three Gypsies." The orchestra program presents as its principal work Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which will be played here by the Boston Orchestra for the first time. Mr. Fiedler is notable as an interpreter of Strauss, who in no work scales greater heights than in this paraphrase of the master work of Friedrich Nietzsche. The opening is one of the grandest passages in the musical literature of our time. The program will also include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Debussy's exquisite Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," a selection and arrangement that testify to Mr. Fiedler's taste and skill in program making.

Establi...

From SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

The Boston Symphony

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Wednesday evening will present to Baltimore for the first time what many regard as the greatest of orchestral compositions since Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This is Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Strauss wrote this poem in 1896 and it had its first performance in America the following year. As the title indicates, Strauss has composed what really is a musical paraphrase of the masterpiece of the German philosopher, Friedrich Nietzsche.

Of equal interest with the Zarathustra will be the appearance here as soloist of Mme. Schumann-Heink. The evening's program in full is as follows:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21.....Mendelssohn
Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra".....Strauss
(a) Erda's Scene from "Das Rheingold"
(b) Waltraute's Narrative from "Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
Goldonian Intermezzi, Op. 127.....Bossi
Aria, "Just God," from "Rienzi"..Wagner
Overture to the Opera "Oberon"..Weber
Soloist—Mme. Schumann-Heink.

E ...ork, 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From POST.

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

NOV 5 - 1911

THE CONCERT OUTLOOK

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 the first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the National Theater, and with the orchestra comes as soloists the great Washington favorite, Mme. Schumann-Heink. Mme. Schumann-Heink is down for two numbers. Her first is the great aria, "Andromache's Lament," from "Achilles," by Max Bruch, and her second comprises three songs with orchestral accompaniment. The first of these is Wagner's "Traume," which, as is generally known, was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde;" the second, Schubert's "The Young Nun," and the third Liszt's "Three Gypsies." In "Traume" the orchestration used will be that of Felix Mottl, while Franz Liszt's orchestration of "The Young Nun" will be employed. Liszt orchestrated his own "Three Gypsies."

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," a work which seems to gain in significance as it gains in age. More than 100 years old, it still stands as one of the mountain peaks in musical literature. Another number will be Debussey's entrancing "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

Estab ...4

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date ...2 - 191...

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be heard in Washington for the first time this season on Tuesday, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist.

The program is most interesting, and, as a mild hint to that class of music lovers who use the "analytical program" as a textbook during the progression of a symphonic number, it is suggested that they listen to the symphony as a whole; a tone picture, and use the program for detail later. This matter, combined with the talking at the rear of the theater during the numbers on the program, caused acute suffering to many last winter.

The program is as follows: "Eroica," Symphony No. 2, in E flat major (Beethoven); aria from Achilleus" (Bruch); prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (Debussy); symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" (Liszt); songs with orchestra, Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Es ...1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From TELEGRAPH

Address

Date OV 3 911

Major Higginson.

From the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Massachusetts capital, has lately been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of Major Henry Lee Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the Orchestra. The donors are his friends who prefer to remain anonymous.

This is a pleasing tribute to a man who deserves it. Major Higginson is the most public spirited man in Boston; in fact, he is one of the most public spirited and philanthropic citizens of the republic. No man has done more for his city than this noble old Bostonian. His name has headed the list every time there has been a call upon the citizens for help. He has given freely here and there until the record of his benefactions is almost endless.

As an alumnus of a university, Major Higginson has shown what a real alumnus should be. To his alma mater, Harvard, he has made splendid gifts which endear him to all those who have passed in and out of the gates of that institution. He helped most in building the great democratic club. The Union, the chief meeting place and centre of activity of six thousand students; he gave to them the finest athletic field in the country. He has given many more things than could be here enumerated, and, unlike so many men of vast wealth, he feels that his obligations to his alma mater did not cease when the time came for him to turn down his student lamp forever.

A great public benefactor, a great leader of movements for the welfare of the people, of brave soul and generous heart, Major Higginson deserves at all times the superlative expression of appreciation from all those who know him to be what a public spirited citizen ...

Estab ...84

From SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Strauss' Work Principal Number And Schumann-Heink Soloist.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season will be given tonight in the Lyric beginning at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, and the principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' "Thus Spoke Zarathustra." The program in full will be as follows:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Tone poem, "Thus Spoke Zarathustra".....Strauss
(a) Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold"...
(b) Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung"..... } Wagner
Goldonian Intermezzi.....Bossi
Adriano's aria from "Rienzi".....Wagner
Oberture—Oberon.....Weber

York, 1884

[64]

From AMERICAN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 5 - 1911

...attractive program will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first concert of the season here, to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. The organization, under Max Fiedler, will play Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Ernestine Schumann-Heink will be the soloist, and she will be heard in Bruch's aria from "Achilleus" and in Wagner's "Traume," Schubert's "Die Junge Nonne" and Liszt's "Die Drei Zigeuner."

The Strauss work is not unknown to Philadelphia audiences, although it has not had many performances here. Strauss began it in Munich in February, 1896, and completed it the following August. It had its first performance at Frankfort-on-the-Main on November 2, of that year. The first performance in America was given by the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas early in 1897, and Mr. Paur gave it in Boston for the first time on October 30 of that year.

Estab ..., 1884

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

SCHUMANN-HEINK'S WAGNER PROGRAM

Will Sing Three Numbers As Soloist At Boston Symphony Concert.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the German contralto whose personality, coupled with her wonderful voice and art, has served to create for her a great following, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening. Mme. Schumann-Heink has not sung here with orchestra for several years, although her yearly recitals at Ford's Opera House are regularly expected, as regularly given and always enormously successful.

Her numbers Wednesday night will be exclusively Wagnerian, the first being "Erda's Scene" from "Das Rheingold," the second the "Waltraute" narrative from "Gotterdammerung" and the third Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

Estab ... 1884

SOLOIST AND LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

MME SCHUMANN-HEINK

PHOTO. BY GARO

MAX FIEDLER

From INQUIRER, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address

Date NOV 5 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15. The concert will mark the first appearance of the season here of Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who will sing as her first number the lament of Andromache, from "Achilles." As her second number she will sing three songs with orchestra, the first Wagner's "Traume," which, as is already known, was Wagner's preliminary study of the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," Schubert's son, "The Young Nun," and Liszt's "Three Gypsies." "Traume" has been orchestrated by the late Felix Mottl and "The Young Nun" was orchestrated by Franz Liszt.

The full program is as follows:

Debussy's exquisite Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The program in full is as follows:

Beethoven—Overture ..... "Egmont"
Strauss—Tone poem. "Thus Spake Zarathustra"
Bruch ..... Aria from "Achilleus"
Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"

Songs with Orchestra—
Wagner ..... "Traume"
Schubert ..... "Die junge Nonne"
Liszt ..... "Die drei Zigeuner"
Liszt ..... Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"
Soloist, Madame Schumann-Heink.

Philadelphia Orchestra Practice

Estab ..., 1884

From SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS

Season Of 120 Concerts Mapped Out For Famous Orchestra.

[H. T. P., in Boston Transcript.]

With the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, October 6, and Saturday evening, October 7, to begin the new season, the orchestra enters upon its thirty-first year. It will celebrate the 30 years that are past on October 13 and 14.

The orchestra will go twice into the Middle West—once at the end of January, as heretofore, and once at the middle of April. The six additional concerts in the Middle West raise the total number that the orchestra will undertake in its seven months of active work to 120, practically four concerts a week—to say nothing of rehearsals and travel—and so the most exacting task the management has yet set for it. To New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington it will go at monthly intervals as of old, and already its audiences there are assured. It will give its occasional concerts in Worcester, Providence, Springfield, New Bedford and other New England cities where it is annually and eagerly expected.

Fortunately for such a scheme, Mr. Fiedler has the physical strength, the nervous vitality and the liking for work that make the schedule possible. He will return to Boston for the final year of his conductorship, to his last opportunity to perform with the Symphony Orchestra the music that he particularly cherishes and the music that he wishes particularly to bring to hearing.

The singers will be Mmes. Gluck and Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Mme. Schumann-Heink, of Europe and America, and Miss Elena Gerhardt, the German concert singer, who comes for the first time to the United States at midwinter. The pianists will be Messrs. Hofmann, Bauer, Ganz, Bachaus and Proctor and Mmes. Samaroff and Goodson. The violinists will be Mmes. Parlow and Powell and Mr. Zimbalist for wandering virtuosi, and Messrs. Witek and Noack from the first desk of the orchestra itself. Furthermore, at one pair of concerts Mr. Schroeder will play a cello piece.

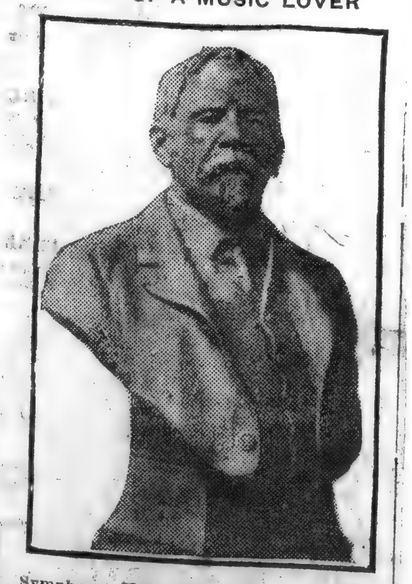
From RECORD,

Address PHILADELPHIA, Pa

Date NOV 8- 1911

Estabi ..., 1884

BUST OF A MUSIC LOVER



Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, has just been enriched by the placing in the foyer of a bronze bust of H. L. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The bust is the work of the eminent Boston sculptor, Bela Pratt, and it has been set in a rich placement of Sienna marble designed by A. W. Longfellow.

The donors are friends of Mr. Higginson who have elected to remain anonymous.

DOING THE CITY BUREAUS

[65]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

ITEM

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date NOV 7- 1911

Establis ...884

BOSTON SYMPHONY, SCHUMANN-HEINK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. In defiance of weather conditions music lovers turned out to welcome the visitors and the auditoroum was well-filled.

Max Fielder conducted, and a very interesting program was rendered, headed by Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont." Strauss' "Thus Spake," Bruch's Lament, from "Achilles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" were the strong numbers.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist. She sang twice, first after the Strauss number, Bruch's Andromache's Lament from "Achilles," and just before the last orchestral number, 3 songs, Wagner's "Traume," a great favorite with the composer; Schubert's "Die Junge Nonne," and Liszt's "Die Drei Zigeuner." The beloved contralto was in superb voice. She has never sung better in this city than last night and the audience was overly appreciative, so much so after the last number as to call out the singer a number of times, holding the orchestra from completing the program. The Schubert and Liszt numbers were especially suited to the singer's voice, and in the latter Concertmeister A. Witek, assisted so materially with his fine violin obbligato that Mme. Schumann-Heink compelled him to stand with her, hand in hand, to share the applause. The next Boston Symphony Concert will be given on Monday evening, December 4.

From

Address

Date NOV 4 1911

Boston Symphony Concert.

Est. ...1884

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its thirty-first season, will give the first of a series of three concerts, the thirty-fifth in Hartford, at the Parsons Theater on Monday evening, November 13. Max Fiedler will conduct the performance and Alwyn Schroeder, the distinguished violinvellist, will appear as soloist. Patrons who have for two seasons enjoyed the enthusiasm apparent in Mr. Fiedler and his work, will regret that this is to be his last year with the orchestra. In the art of program making he has no superior, his interpretations always display originality and authority, a sense of tone proportion possessed by few conductors. The orchestra is more popular today than ever before because of Max Fiedler's forceful personality. A very large and fashionable audience will welcome the great organization and its leader on Monday evening, November 13. Reserved seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

MAX FIEDLER.

Conductor.

From RECORD.

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date NOV 7 1911

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Splendid Concert With Notable Reading of a Strauss Work.

With such a conductor as Max Fiedler, and such an aggregation of finished musicians as go to make up the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was a foregone conclusion that the concert given by that organization at the Academy of Music last evening—the first of the season's series in Philadelphia—would be an artistic triumph. It was more than that—it was a revelation. Conductor Fiedler is one of the foremost interpreters of the music of Richard Strauss in the world, and his reading of "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the central number on the program, was really a wonderful piece of work. When one considers, in addition, that the soloist of the evening was Mme. Schumann-Heink it can be seen readily that the entertainment was a real musical event, a musical treat which drew a crowded house, despite the inclemency of the weather.

With the concert of such a high degree of excellence, it is almost hypercritical to remark that perhaps the program was just a little bit too heavy; the lightest thing on it was Debussy's exquisite "Afternoon of a Faun." After listening to the monumental work of Strauss the brain tires of heavy harmonies, so that Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which brought the concert to a close, was not appreciated as much as it might have been otherwise.

The singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink was a joy and a delight. She was heard in four numbers, the first being the highly dramatic selection from Bruch's "Achilles," the lament of Andromache, which she gave in exquisite fashion, bringing out all of its tragic possibilities. Later in the evening she was heard in a group of songs—Wagner's lovely composition "Dreams," scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, the song which contains the germ of the night scene in "Tristan and Isolde;" Schubert's familiar "Young Nun," and a less-known song by Liszt. "The Three Gypsies," also a highly dramatic composition, sung with telling effect.

The only other number on the program was the familiar overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven, with which the concert opened. The audience was most appreciative—well it might be—and carried away the remembrance of a most enjoyable musical evening.

Established 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date NOV 7 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECITAL

Strauss's "Zarathustra," With Schumann-Heink as Soloist.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Egmont" ..... Beethoven
Tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" ..... Strauss
Aria from "Achilleus" ..... Bruch
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy

Song with orchestra

a. "Traume" ..... Wagner
b. "Die Tonge Nonne" ..... Schubert
c. "Die drei Zigeuner" ..... Liszt
Symphonic poem "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

Even the strong counter-attraction of a novel Massenset opera and villainous weather conditions did not reduce the attendance at the Academy last night to hear the first in a series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the contrary, the great auditorium was thronged, and extra seats had to be placed in front of the parquet. The features of cardinal interest were the appearance of the ever-welcome Madame Schumann-Heink in a generous contribution of an aria and three lyrics, and the first performance in these concerts of Richard Strauss's imposing tone-poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Were not the laws of the Boston Orchestra and Conductor Max Fiedler as inflexible as those of the Medes and Persians, or the Draconian edicts, the famous rule against encores would have had to give way last evening in favor of the incomparable contralto, erstwhile of Germany, now of America. Madame Schumann-Heink invests everything she sings with the utmost dramatic significance, and the lament of Andromache set to Max Bruch's noble numbers was given with thrilling pathos, as though the singer had made the sorrows of old her own.

The great contralto's art is at all times an object lesson in careful phrasing, subtle nuance and dynamic contrast, and in the audience were numerous students and teachers who heard and profited by her admirable exemplification of the art of song in its highest, purest, most perfect estate.

The "Zarathustra" music, consuming 35 minutes in the playing, was made to sound in the interpretation as elementally immense as the composer intended when he penned the score under the inspiration of Nietzsche's text. It is the epic of all human life, translating the aspiration, the despair, the baffled endeavor, the rapture and the incommunicable pain of living. It calls not merely for commanding technical skill on the part of its interpreters, but for a profound spiritual comprehension. The orchestra played the work in soul-satisfying fashion, and it aroused more enthusiasm than certain other of the supposedly cryptic compositions of "Richard the Second" have evoked in Philadelphia. Ending the first half of the programme it was appropriately and effectively balanced by the finale, Liszt's "Les Preludes," recently performed by our own orchestra under Pohlig. The Beethoven "Egmont" overture, and the Debussy prelude were played in not less masterful fashion; the latter is fairyland in terms of absolute music, and brings alive in the imagination the revels of strange shy creature of the woods. The next of these notable concerts takes place December 1.

The Public Ledger will supply, election

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony's First Concert.

Max Fiedler and his excellent corps of musicians, comprising the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first concert of their twenty-seventh Philadelphia season in the Academy of Music last night. Madame Schumann-Heink, beloved of Philadelphians, was the soloist, and the combination was so attractive that the heavy downpour had no adverse effect on the attendance.

The program was fairly catholic in its range, running all the way from such a firmly established classic as Beethoven's "Egmont" overture to the ultra modern tone poem of Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The inevitable Liszt had his representation, too, the final number being the hackneyed "Les Preludes," which seems doomed to be worn to shreds this year in honor of the Liszt centenary.

Under the sympathetic leadership of Fiedler the orchestra responded to every demand upon it. For smoothness of tone, delicacy of interpretation and emphasis of the spiritual note it left nothing to be desired. The efforts of the different instruments were kept in admirable proportions, the brasses did not feel it incumbent on themselves to split any ear drums when they carried the motive, and the ensemble had a grateful smoothness and richness.

Aside from the Schumann-Heink solos, which were easily the most popular numbers, the chief feature of the program was the Strauss selection, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." This "tone poem" is based upon Nietzsche's book of the same name, and Strauss has made a record in that he has succeeded in making music quite as jumbled and unintelligible as Nietzsche did language. Poe once said there was no such thing as a long poem, that so-called long poems were at best a number of short and real poems connected by verse. His dictum applies to the Strauss "tone poem." It contains passages of almost unearthly beauty connected by outbursts of almost unearthly noise. No other term can be applied to some of the snortings, cacklings and crashes the score calls for.

After his dissonances it was a relief to hear Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Exquisite seems to be the term for the manner in which this fairy music, fit for a midsummer night's dream, was given.

But though the audience was enthusiastically appreciative of the orchestra's work and applauded Conductor Fiedler generously, its greatest enthusiasm was bestowed on Madame Schumann-Heink. Time and again she was obliged to acknowledge the persistent hand clapping, but she was adamant as far as encores were concerned. She generously included Concertmaster Witek in the homage rendered her, but held strictly to her printed program.

Her first number was Andromache's lament, from Bruch's "Achilles," and her singing was a real mingling of a Greek wife's grief over her husband's death and her pride in prophesying that his loss would be fatal to beleaguered Troy.

Even better were her three songs with the orchestra, Wagner's "Traume," Schubert's beautiful "Die Junge Nonne" and Liszt's "Die Drei Ziegeuner." Schubert's lyric particularly, in its wild storm, symbolizing human passion, contrasted with the abiding peace in the nun's soul, made a strong appeal.

Established 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date NOV 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAMME

Orchestra Welcomed by Crowded House at Its Carnegie Hall Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised the "Enrica" symphony of eBthoven, Debussy's "Prelude to Afternoon of a Fawn," and the now inevitable Liszt number. This was "Les Preludes."

The house was completely sold out. This would seem to indicate that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would do well to organize another series of concerts.

The music above mentioned was played with that perfection of euphony for which these players are celebrated. The readings of Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, are sound in judgment and often poetical.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was ill-advised enough to sing the Spring aria from Saint-Saens "Samson and Delilah" in a most ungrateful German translation. The aria was not exactly in her style. How infinitely more satisfactory was her interpretation, at once forcible, free and dramatic, of three Schubert songs.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

No novelties graced yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, the first Boston matinee concert of the season. Mme. Schumann-Heink was again the soloist, as she had been at the Thursday night concert.

Est. —, 1881; New York, 1884

From EVENING STAR.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 7 1911

Will Entertain Orchestra.

The Florestan Club will entertain the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their leader, Mr. Max Fiedler, at supper tomorrow night in the club rooms, on North Charles street, at the close of the orchestra's concert at the Lyric.

Est. k, 1884

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date NOV 10 1911

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Schumann-Heink and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Notwithstanding an exceptionally uninviting programme, the season's first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra drew an audience that reminded one of the occasion when Paderewski played with this organization. Ernestine Schumann-Heink was the soloist last night, and her popularity, combined with that of the orchestra itself, resulted in all the seats being sold several days in advance not only for last night, but for Saturday afternoon, and for to-night's Wagner concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Est. 1884

Mme. Schumann-Heink is now a citizen of this country, with which she has for years been identified in opera-house and concert halls. During the past summer she delighted the music-lovers in Hamburg, Frankfurt, Munich, Berlin, and other cities, as well as the pilgrims to Bayreuth, with her great voice and wonderful art of emotional interpretation, being hailed everywhere as the greatest of living contraltos. Now she is "home again," and the cordial welcome she got last evening as she walked on the stage was exceeded in warmth only by the applause which followed her singing. Andromache's Lament from Max Bruch's "Achilles," which she sang first, is not deeply inspired, but it is emotionally and vocally impressive when sung by such an artist. The superb eloquence of some of the lines, notably the "Weh mir! Weh!" recalled the good old times of her Brangäne and Erda at the Metropolitan, where she belongs now. Her voice is as round, as deep, as sensuously beautiful, as ever, and her art has still further ripened, as was also manifested by her soft and dreamy delivery of Wagner's "Träume" and the dramatic realism of her conception of Liszt's "The Three Gypsies," who respectively fiddle, smoke, and sleep away their lives. Concertmaster Witek played the fiddle solo in the true gypsy manner, but not always in tune.

The concert began with one of the latest productions of the horribly prolific Max Reger, "A Comedy Overture," opus 120, which Max Fiedler secured for performance in Boston and New York before it had been heard in Germany. There is no reason to be proud of this distinction. Such music may be liked by some persons in Germany—they actually have Max Reger festivals over there—but a prohibitive duty ought to be placed on its importation into this country. We have at least a dozen composers of our own who have written, or now write, orchestral pieces better worth listening to than that overture. Mr. Chadwick, for instance, and Mr. Foote, living right in Boston, would not compose if they had what a German critic called the "appalling paucity of ideas" of Max Reger; and another Bostonian, John K. Paine, wrote orchestral pieces containing infinitely more substance than such of Reger's as has been heard here; yet Paine's music is never played by this orchestra. Reger's "Comedy Overture" is very cleverly written, with astonishing technic and orchestral skill, but it is barren, arid—no more juice in it than in a soda cracker.

Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is another work "made in Germany" which we could well spare for some of our native products. The opening, recalling the prologue in heaven of Boito's "Mefistofele," is superb; deliciously rich and creamy is the orchestral coloring of the next section, and every now and then there is a group of bars that arouses the flagging attention; but the piece lasts thirty-three minutes, and at the end one feels it was just twenty-three too many. That, too, in spite of an indescribably magnificent performance by Mr. Fiedler and his wonderfully balanced and trained orchestra. The orchestra and its conductor were also at their best in four numbers of Bossi's suite called "Goldonian Intermezzi"—light and "pleasing" music, but shallow and uninspired. As before stated, Mr. Fiedler's programme was exceptionally uninviting, but Weber's immortal "Oberon" overture at the end made amends, although it was not interpreted so lovingly and perfectly as the other numbers. Here were the melody, the inspiration, the genius, the soulfulness, the spontaneity, the music for thought's and emotion's sake that were missing in the other orchestral numbers of the evening.

[66]

From EVENING SUN.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 9 1911

SCHUMANN-HEINK'S ART WAS EVIDENT

Est 1884

Work Of Boston Symphony And Contralto Held Attention.

With the sentimental melodies of "Thais" still ringing in the ear, Baltimore's music-loving public again wended its way to our hall of tone—the Lyric—but last night the occasion was not opera, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto, as soloist, held attention instead. Every seat and all the available standing room was occupied. Was this caused by the return of this celebrated body of artists, or did the personality of the soloist have an unusually magnetic attraction? The answer to this question was represented in both ways, for the regular attendants, who have come to the Boston Orchestra faithfully for years, were there in all expectancy, while many new faces were noticed who doubtless have been converted to the cause of the highest form of orchestral music or were brought to the hall by the magic of the singer's name.

Mme. Schumann-Heink did not disappoint her admirers, and those who perhaps found fault in the choice of arias were given compensation through the artistic delivery of the narrative style which forms the context of these compositions. Erda's sinister warning, scenely "Dass Rheingold," and Waltraute's pleadings and interceding to Brunhilde, from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" ("Dusk of the Gods"), are arias which distinctly belong to the original schemes in which they occur in the opera. Their import is lessened when given on the concert stage, but in presenting them Mme. Schumann-Heink had an impressive vehicle, and her art was evident in every phrase.

Recalled Many Times.

On the other hand, the scena "Gerechter Gott!" and aria, Inseiner Bluethe," from Wagner's "Rienzi," being from an earlier work in which there is still some traces of Italian influence in the writing, gave a more convincing display vocally. The dramatic and melodic elements here are woven into longer sentences and the brilliance of the aria as a whole makes it suitable for concert. In her interpretations Mme. Schumann-Heink was the true artist, stalwart in the deliverance of every nuance and giving all with a glowing tone which was velvety in its refinement and was sympathetic in its power. She was recalled many times.

Fine Conducting.

Mr. Fiedler began the program with the "Midsummer Night's Dream," overture of Mendelssohn, giving it a rather sentimental reading. The next number, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," was the principal orchestral offering. It is freely meant to follow the perplexing philosophy of Friedrich Nietzche's books of the same title. To attempt to outline in the short space here what collassal music this Strauss score holds would be impossible. The music from the onset of the indefinite rumbling basses, with the sounding of the simple theme denoting the World Riddle, carries many beautiful episodes, sweeping in emotion and wonderfully gripping in intensity. There are dissonant gropings and chromatic idioms which are prevelant in the individual Strauss manner, but aside from this there is a strong Teutonic atmosphere in much of the melodic material. The enigmatical close with its suspense, caused by the use of foreign tonalities, left its puzzling effect upon the audience. This work was read very clearly by Mr. Fiedler, in fact, it was the highest illustration of conductorship thus far manifested by him. Perhaps the composition inspires the director, or its moods are attuned to this temperament, for he wrought splendid effects with the orchestra.

And here let it be said, that while the gentlemen of the orchestra handled their task with brilliant virtuosity, the work of Mr. Witek, the concertmeister, being a dazzling display of technical and tonal violin command, it is noticeable that the dignity and bearing of the players while on the stage is not up to the former standard. There are certain members who seem to enjoy themselves heartily, whispering and jesting, but this detracts from the real issue. The delightful Goldonian intermezzi for strings by Enrico Bossi was another proof of the virtuosity of this section of the orchestra. Weber's time-worn "Oberon" overture closed the program brilliantly. Mr. Fiedler accelerated the tempi and inserted more dash than is ordinarily heard in this overture. F. C. B.

To Madame Schumann-Heink.

When Schumann-Heink begins to sing
The very earth stands summer-still
To catch the wondrous, molten thrill
Of Erda's song.
Our earthly toil for useless gain,
Our days and nights of pulsing pain,
Become a little, helpless thing
When Schumann-Heink begins to sing.

When Schumann-Heink begins to sing
A hush falls on the restless throng
Wrought by the magic of the song
That Erda sang.
Lured by the voice and violin
We reach to grasp the might-have-been.
Life turns a precious, priceless thing
When Schumann-Heink begins to sing.

L'envoi

The song dies out.
Beyond Wahalla's dream-capped hills
Our hopes lie dead.
We sense, instead,
A woman with appealing art
Who led us to a land apart
From strife and stress of worldly doubt.
Existence were a golden thing
If Schumann-Heink could always sing.
R. G.

From

Address

Date NOV 12 1911

BOSTONIANS PLAY A 'SAFE' PROGRAMME

Est 1884

Well-Known Works Only Given by Mr. Fiedler in Carnegie Hall.

SCHUMANN-HEINK SOLOIST

Greatest of All Contraltos in the Concert Field Awakes Enthusiasm.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

While he may not be always very imaginative in selecting his programmes, Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the admired Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in most cases safe.

Yesterday afternoon, when for the second time this season he won honor for himself and for his followers at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Fiedler gave us only well-known works, tried and retried.

Beethoven's "Eroica," with its wondrous funeral march movement, its ravishing Scherzo (the model of all Scherzos in the world) and its superb Finale, opened the concert. Debussy had his place in the rare scheme, being represented by a favorite tone-poem, the "Afternoon of a Faun."

Great Concert Contralto.

Before and after (noon) the Debussy number, Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who still leads all contraltos in the concert field, charmed every ear by her great singing of the "Spring" ir from the fmiliar "Samson et Dalila" of Saint-Saens, and of three famous lieder, all by Schubert. And, to wind up, we had the "Preludes" of Franz Liszt.

In his inerpretation of the noble symphony, Mr. Fiedler took various liberties which caused discussion in the audience, although they aroused no opposition of a serious kind.

He toned down and repressed his instruments in various passages, slurred over certain themes, and gave unusual prominence to others.

But in the Scherzo, which was exquisitely played, with grace and lightness, he held closely to tradition. And in the Scherzo he did best of all.

Refreshingly Discreet.

Despite his origin, Mr. Fiedler put considerable fancy into his reading of Debussy's tone poem and was refreshingly discreet in his accompaniments to the four songs of the soloist.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was in her finest voice and gave all present a great lesson in pure singing, both dramatical and lyrical. Her rendering of the "Spring" air was exceptionally beautiful, grave and flowing, broad, yet delicate, and marked throughout by the most noble style.

The audience filled the hall and gave repeated proofs of its approval, both to the singer and the orchestra.

[67]

From CITIZEN.

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 11 1911

BOSTON PLAYERS IN FIRST CONCERT

Est 1884

Symphony Orchestra at Academy of Music.

SCHUMANN-HEINK, SOLOIST, RECEIVES GREAT OVATION

"All-Wagner" Programme Splendidly Played—Famous Contralto Thrills Audience in Three of Wagner's Most Dramatic Arias.

The first concert of the Brooklyn season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has recently been celebrating at "The Hub" its thirtieth anniversary with appropriate ceremonies in Symphony Hall, was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist, and the programme, which was made up entirely of excerpts from the Wagner music dramas, was as follows:

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and "Isolde," Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Scene VI.; Waltraute's narrative from "Goetterdaemmerung," Act I., Scene 3; funeral music, Act III., from "Dusk of the Gods;" scene, "Just God" and aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act III., No. 9; overture, "Tannhauser."

Brooklyn audiences are regarded by musicians as cold and unresponsive, but when the curtain parted last evening revealing again the well-known virtuosi orchestra the applause was generous and spontaneous as the familiar faces of the band were recognized—golden voiced oboist, Georges Lougy; accomplished concertmeister Anton Witek, of the sparkling "Strad;" Anto Schroeder, dean and most universally beloved of 'cellists, and Ferir, of the deep-toned viola. This raising of the curtain upon the seated orchestra, though perhaps a trifle theatric, seems an established Brooklyn custom. Old Philharmonicgoers, like the Chinese mandarin who thought this the most interesting feature of the concert, somehow miss the preliminary tuning up, the reedy clarinette A, followed by the sudden cacophony of all the instruments. The applause increased to enthusiasm when Conductor Max Fieldler appeared.

From the first burst of the pompous, pedantic fanfare of the Guild of the Mastersingers to be bacchanalian finale of the "Tannhauser" overture it proved an evening of great musical enjoyment, but somehow as the overture ended and the large and fashionable audience filed out to their waiting automobiles it seemed as if the frenetic, bacchanalian "Paris Version" had in some way suffered a sudden and very respectable change. The revolutionary principles of "'48" are no longer popular. We do not sieze a musket, like Wagner, or flee to Paris to write protests in score and pamphlet, but leave our troubles for settlement by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, wearing quite enough medals and decorations to satisfy the ambition even of a Governor's military aide, was in glorious voice, and received a tremendous ovation. She delivered Erda's warning with such dramatic power that any one but Wotan would have heeded it; indeed those jealous wives, Fricki and Juno, undoubtedly had many just grounds for complaint.

There was a time some decades ago when everyone with any pretentions to culture was supposed to know the whereabouts and perambulations of "The Ring," and the hope was always cherished that sometimes, somehow, the curse would be lifted from it, but it was always difficult to remember who had the ring last—whether Wotan or Fasolt or Loge or Alberich. It was something like the game, "Who's got the thimble?" set to music.

"Meistersinger," however, tells a human story in a humorous and at times pathetic way, and score and text ring true, while the chromatic yearning motive of the Tristan music, which could never have been written except by a man who had thrown aside all allegi to the modern scale, is the very em ment of passionate emotion.

The orchestra played throughout superb volume of tone, and that rivaled quality which has made it many years, facile princeps, the lea organization of its kind, and the bacc alian "Tannhauser" sent the audi home in good humor.

The musician Wagner is so supe to the dramatist Wagner, that the sc lose nothing, but rather gain, by the sence of stage setting. As music are convincing, as drama casts they absurd. It is hardly convincing to obliged to regard a guileless Parsi usually a Teutonic "youth" of 50 y or so, with legs like those of a gr piano, and a general look of familiarity with eatables and drinkables of the operatic capitals of the world—to see such an innocent youth throw away his bow and arrow, and declare that he will shoot no more swans; and the audience having been moved to sympathy at the fate of the swan, inwardly resolves to join the Audobon Society at once, and adjourns after the performance for the usual small hot bird. Why must all Lohengrins and Isoldes weigh so much? Is it, as Falstaff ruefully complains while [illegible] his figure, or that part of it

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC

Est

The Boston Orchestra.

A critical discussion of the second concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be set in a lower key than that called for by the first. This second concert took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The solo performer was again Mme. Schumann-Heink, and she was gladly acclaimed, though with such show of discrimination as made the judicious observer somewhat proud of the audience. But it is not the solo performer that gives interest to a symphonic concert, and it will be a gladsome day when our orchestras decide to dispense with them. The Boston institution could already well afford to do so in New York, but, unfortunately, this system, pursued in its monthly adventures into foreign lands, has made a "popular" solo performer, whether he or she be a promoter of good or vicious art, an essential feature, and New York must bear the burden, whether or not it is willing.

On the occasion of this first visit for the year it must be confessed the solo feature has provided an agreeable surprise. Mme. Schumann-Heink, who sang on Thursday evening and again yesterday afternoon, seems to have undergone a change of heart since she was last heard here. Then she seemed to think much less of her obligations to art and intelligent art lovers than of her skill in appealing to the tastes of the multitude; on this visit she has sung with real nobility—and heedless of the vulgar many—perhaps because she knows that the vulgar many do not make up a Boston Symphony Orchestra's audience. Her triumphs yesterday were not as emphatic as those of Thursday evening, but the reasons were not hard to find.

She showed as poor judgment in choosing Schubert's "Junge Nonne" as she disclosed good judgment in choosing and singing "Printemps qui Commence" from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila." She sang Schubert's song in a key which gave no opportunities for the opulence of her voice either in volume or quality, whereas the Saint-Saëns romance brought forth a ravishment in both respects. In the second of her three Schubert songs, "Der Tod und das Mädchen," she was again successful because of the tonal glory of its second part; but artists much less gifted in voice have made more than she made out of "Erlkönig." In all these familiar songs the question arose whether their effectiveness had not been impaired by the arrangement of their accompaniments for orchestra. Impressive names are hitched to these transcriptions—Liszt's to "Die Junge Nonne," Mottl's to "Der Tod und das Mädchen," Berlioz's to "Erlkönig," yet he must have poorly adjusted taste who does not feel how much more of real dramatic fire and forcefulness there is in Schubert's pianoforte score than in these strained orchestral arrangements, which fail as much in the merely tonal effect as they do in their appeal to the imagination of the listeners. Wofully weak in these particulars is the transcription of "Die Junge Nonne" (Heresy this, of course, in the year of Liszt's centennial).

The orchestral numbers of the afternoon were Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony," Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and Liszt's "Préludes." In them all the marvelous euphony of the orchestra fell most ingratiatingly into the ears of the audience, though the performances left longings for more poetical readings, for greater regard for rhetorical pause, for one thing, and less reliance on external charm. But it is much to ask that the last day of a week's tour shall be like the first, or even third. H. E. K.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date NOV 11 1911

Establis

The Boston Symphony players end their first week's tour at Carnegie Hall this afternoon with Schumann-Heink. The Saturday afternoon symphony was to be "Eroica" of Beethoven, with Liszt's "Preludes," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," contralto songs by Schubert and the great air from "Samson and Delilah."

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SCHUMANN-HEINK AND BOSTON SYMPHONY TWICE SOLD OUT.

Estabi 1

Fiedler Frolics with Reger Comedy, Ferir Plays Italian Viola d'Amore and Cherubs Witek and Longy Make Sweetness and Light of Strauss—Alma Gluck Sings Nightingale Airs in Poetic Hen-Pheasant Plumes.

Such a gorgeously packed house of the elect of the town as may hardly be seen again—except to-morrow afternoon, when they've sold out again—greeted the season's opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. With Schumann-Heink, the premier band gave a concert half comedy, half tragedy, all revolutionary and nearly all new. There wasn't one classic in a programme of ten parts. We may do without a symphony, but civilized men cannot do without the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it plays as one virtuoso, a perfect unison wrought of thirty years' ensemble. The new Reger "Comedy Overture" that Max Fiedler snatched away from the other Max before the ink was blotted, had never a "dry" note, indeed never an instant's stop in the most dazzling piece of sheer gayety and abandon since "Meistersinger" itself. On the heels, the very dancing heels, of that for a starter, the 101 men of the band plunged into "Zarathustra" and Nietzsche mysticism until they made sweetness and light of Richard Strauss.

Some parts of the "Also Sprach Zarathustra," have not gone at so mad a pace in ten years since Strauss himself led what he considers his most musical achievement here. The morning stars sang together as the Persian astrologer spoke in his dream, and those twin giants of curly cherubs, Witek and Longy, took to the high altitudes like racing aviators, until a fiddle string snapped false on the last vanishing topnote and the wood-wind died in the double bass mourning. The orchestra stood up to bow, deservedly. The quiet Major Henry Lee Higginson, whose marble bust adorns the home hall now as its "founder," was here present in the ever reserved chair down centre aisle from which he walked to the stage to shake hands all around during intermission. Presently another storm of applause greeted the first sight of Schumann-Heink, shining in pale blue brocade and gold medals that fairly weighed down the lowcut bodice from shoulder to shoulder. "Ilium, Ilium, thy dust is ashes!" she sang in Bruch's Andromache's lament of the siege of Troy. For such a piece of tragic declamation, the concert or opera-goer might go back to the palmy days.

Comedy came back to its own in the "Goldonian," not to say golden, intermezzi of minuet, jig, serenade and burlesque, by Enrico Bossi, a live man of Bologna. It was in the antique style, but with a difference, as mad and modern as Reger. The serenade, on Emil Ferir's viola d'amore that has no match here for sensuous tone, was so applauded that Fiedler beckoned the modest soloist to stand up, but he remained hidden. The contralto star in Liszt's "Three Gypsies" showed a woman's way of handling a like situation. After Witek's obligato rhapsody, she lifted the violinist firmly by the arm and made him bow like a good boy. Schumann-Heink also sang Wagner's "Träume," that countless Isoldes call their own. But has the contralto not sung Carmen, pray? If Wagner was a tour de force, Hungarian Liszt came from the heart. There was a final fairy "Oberon" overture of Weber, himself a radical reformer once in a way.

Those who eagerly frequent a hanging day of Revolutionists in our modern painters' shows could appreciate a musical menu that was all paprika. So stimulating a fillip of "future" music as this entire bill was wholly extraordinary. Without Fiedler's announced departure next year, it would have seemed a fin de siècle. The urbane managers, C. E. Ellis and W. H. Brennan, promise to redeem their pledges to the classics, if twenty-four hours' grace be given.

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 5

Boston Symphony Concert At The Lyric Tonight

Es k, 1884

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be held tonight in the Lyric at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink, and the principal orchestral number will be Richard Straus' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. The program in full is as follows:

Mendelssohn — Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."
Strauss—"Thrus Spake Zarathustra," tone poem.
Wagner—(a) Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold."
Wagner—(b) Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung."
Bossi—Goldonian intermezzi.
Wagner—Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Concert.

With Mme. Schumann-Heink as its soloist, it was to be expected that the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon would be presented to an audience that taxed the capacity of the house and manifested its pleasure in a program that was especially enjoyable.

The striking number of the orchestral program was perhaps Beethoven's symphony "Eroica," the second movement of which, the "Marche Funebre," and also the "Sherzo," seemed most effective. Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" was delightfully rendered, and so deep was the interest in the symphonic poem that the large audience lingered, almost without exception, to its close, which was long after the streets were lighted.

Mme. Schumann-Heink gave a varied selection of song with her accustomed grace and finish and served to show the high regard in which she is held by Washington music lovers. Her first number, the aria "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles," won her quite an ovation.

Her splendid voice was also much in evidence in the remainder of her program, which included Wagner's "Traume," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; the Liszt arrangement of Lenau's "Die Drei Zigeuner" and "The Young Nun" of Schubert.

Mr. Fiedler wielded the baton for the orchestra, which means that the beauties of the music and the execution of the orchestra were fully up to the standard of the Boston organization.

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

MUSIC DEVOTEES ENJOY CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Esta , 1884

Program at New National Well Received by Large Audience.

The program of the Boston Symphony concert in the National Theater yesterday afternoon was one which, from its excellent making as a program and equally forceful rendition, appealed to the large audience present. Historically, too, it was interesting from the close spiritual sympathy that existed between the great composers represented on the program—Beethoven, Schubert, Liszt, Wagner; a spirit which in its coherence reached out to the audience and made the concert an unusually pleasing one.

In 1802 Beethoven wrote to Krumholtz: "I am not satisfied with my works up to the present time; from today I mean to take a new road." The new road begins with the "Eroica Symphony," given yesterday afternoon, in which the master breaks away from the school of Mozart and Haydn and enters his more rugged domain. Beethoven in his greatness shatters the forms for the thought, and although the road was new more than a century ago, it is still the great highway in its nobility, marked by nine great glowing beacons, his nine symphonies. The one presented yesterday afternoon was given a most authoritative reading by Director Max Fiedler, and the orchestra played with interest, and musical virtuosity.

Soloists Do Well.

In the first movement the Allegro con Brio, the development was sharply and rhythmically brought out with the solo instruments delightfully played. Perhaps the Scherzo was most effectively given. It was rendered with lightness, delicacy, and charm. In distinction to this older school, the music of De Bussy reached the audience in strong and strange contrast. It carried the audience to the lighter moods, to the kalideoscopic weavings and changes of effects. It tells of moonlight, elves, running water, and, being founded on a new tonality, the scale of whole tones, it falls strangely on the ear. So in the prelude to "An Afternoon of a Faun," the embroidery effect is heard that reaches out as new and delightful glints of color that live in the realm of fancy and imagination, and the faint sound of the oboe is heard, of bells, of muted strings, and harps.

Schumann-Heink Sings.

Madame Schumann-Heink, the soloist, made a deep impression by her breadth of rendition of the Bruch aria. She was equally effective in the beautiful song of repression, "Traume," by Wagner, and in the dramatic song of Schubert, "Die Junge Nonne." The genius of Schubert made a great song of the text that toward the end rather deteriorates by weakened sentiment. Madame Schumann-Heink sang with beautiful art, and managed well her mezzo vocal effects. It was fitting that the first concert of the season should have on its program the name of Liszt, because October 22 of this year was the centenary of his birth; also that he should have been represented by his distinctive form of composition, the Symphonic Poem.

Of these, Liszt wrote twelve, the greatest of which are "Les Preludes" and "Tasso." In the symphonic poem, as in the works of Wagner, a distinct leit-motif occurs often, with different musical devices, and orchestral coloring, and these were most poetically brought

From AMERICAN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 9 1911

ORCHESTRA IN A VARIED PROGRAM

Estal 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS TWENTY-SEVENTH SEASON.

SCHUMANN-HEINK TRIUMPHS

Crowd Applauds Her Excellent Rendition of the Powerfully Dramatic Scenes From Wagner's Das Rheingold — Opening Selection From Mendelssohn a Connecting Link Between Romantic School and More Modern Composers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, director, opened its twenty-seventh season in Baltimore last evening at the Lyric with a crowded house. It presented the following varied program, with Madame Schumann-Heink as the soloist:

Mendelssohn—Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, op. 21.
Strauss—Tone Poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra (free after Friedr. Nietzsche), op. 30.
Wagner—a. Erda's scene from Das Rheingold, Scene IV. b. Waltraute's narrative from Gotterdammerung, Act. I., Scene 3.
Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi, op. 127.
I. Preludio e Minuetto.
II. Gagliardi.
V. Serenatina.
VI. Burlesca.
Wagner—Scene, Just God, and Aria, My Life Fades in Its Blossom, from Rienzi, Act III., No. 9.
Weber—Overture to the opera, Oberon.

The Mendelssohn overture served as a kind of connecting link between the romantic school of musical composers, including both Von Weber and Wagner and the advance guard of really modern company, headed by Richard Strauss. At the present writing no one can say where or with whom the modern school of composers, including Elgar, of England, and Boyle, of Australia will end.

It is presumed that the major dominant will continue to be followed, at least occasionally, by the major tonic, and the minor dominant by the minor tonic, but exceptions containing new departures in composition are becoming so frequent that all old rules are now in danger, and in the future any sequence whatever may be voted justifiable under the plea that the effect justifies the means.

In the meantime the old ideas of musical authority and necessity are on the wane. To find them even now it is necessary to dig up the operas and other musical work of a century ago. Beethoven violated the rules of Handel, Haydn and Mozart. Wagner went beyond Beethoven, and Strauss is not to be seen in the company of any former teacher of the absolute.

It is fortunate for musical ears that all the works last evening were given by the unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, or there would have been doubt as to the correctness of the published parts.

Madame Schumann-Heink achieved her expected triumph in the powerfully dramatic scenes from Wagner's Das Rheingold and Die Gotterdammerung, and the earlier aria, My Life Fades in Its Blossom, composed in the old Italian style before the great revolutionist had discovered what he thought was to be the music of the future and not knowing that Richard Strauss was to come after him.

The fine concert ended with a superb performance of Von Weber's overture to his own fairy opera, Oberon. This beautiful overture by the creator of the romantic school of music, who wrote much but always well, brought the large audience back to its old-time sense of poetic musical beauty, and all realized the great extent of the treat.

At the conclusion of the concert the orchestra was informally entertained by the Floreston Musical Club at the clubrooms, on North Charles street.

From

Address

Date NOV 12 1911

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Estab 884

Another Large Audience at the First Matinee Concert.

The first matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was attended by an audience which filled the house. The programme emprised Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the "Spring Song" from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; three songs, "Die Junge Nonne," "Tod und das Mädchen" and "Der Erl König," and Liszt's "Les Préludes." The singer was again Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

Such a programme does not call for extended comment. It was a foregone conclusion that Mr. Fiedler would attempt nothing revolutionary in the symphony. He chose the wise course of seeking for a smooth and well accented performance, leaving the music to proclaim its own message rather than one he might pretend to have discovered newly.

The beautiful smoothness, solidity of tone and clarity of the playing of the orchestra in the other two numbers evoked that admiration which usually attends the concerts of the welcome visitors from the Eastern metropolis.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was not quite so happy yesterday afternoon as she was on Thursday evening. Her singing of the "Spring Song" had sincerity and some bits of really dramatic delivery to commend it, and her "Death and the Maide was well done. But in the other

[68]

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 10 1911

MUSIC

By IRVING WEIL.

THE near-miracle of Carnegie Hall filled in its every chair was accomplished once more last night by the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their first visit to New York for the season. And the near-miracle was all the nearer because the programme was not one with which to lure musical babes. It was Richard Strauss in his most Nietzschean mood, Max Reger revealed in a grim "Comedy" overture and Max Bruch in the depths of seriousness, with only Weber at the very end and the Italian, Bossi, in the middle to lighten up things.

Conductor Max Fiedler started us off this year without apologies to ourselves or to our tastes. Max Reger was at the beginning, and subsequent reflection would indicate that that was a good place for him. Goodness knows what would have happened to his "Comedy" overture in our minds if it had succeeded instead of preceded the Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The Reger overture was performed last night for the first time in America. It contains the spirit of comedy, not as George Meredith defined it, but Regerized. Its themes are as fragmentary as one could expect and, also, as over-elaborated. From any point of view, it would seem that the overture is not unduly important.

But a renewed hearing of the "Zarathustra" tone poem became an altogether different matter. One recalls the comment of Mr. James Huneker to the effect that on hearing this more than remarkable composition he felt the ground slipping from beneath his mental feet. To depict the doctrines of the Superman in tone is surely a stupendous undertaking, but it is equally certain that Strauss has here mustered all his resourcefulness, invention and ingenuity with the orchestra to do just that.

It is a justification of Strauss, if he needs one, and although you may be inclined to chaff at some of his methods and even deny the efficacy of his music without some such excellent comment as may be gleaned beforehand from the programme notes of Mr. Philip Hale, you, perforce, admit at least the partial accomplishment of what he set out to do.

Conductor Fiedler and his men gave an illuminative account of "Zarathustra." Its difficulties were as naught in the hands of these men from Boston. They played as they always do nowadays.

Mmes. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, in the amplitude of a light blue evening gown, received the tribute of her popularity. She sang the aria from Bruch's "Achilles" in splendid voice and with glowing color througout. She afterward sang Wagner's "Dreams" and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies," with exquisitely appropriate interpretations of both.

The delightful Goldonian intermezzi of Bossi and Weber's "Oberon" overture completed the programme.

Established 1884 ...rk, 1884

From ...

Address ...

Date NOV 12 1911

On Monday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their first of five concerts, with Schumann-Heink as soloist. There was an exceedingly large audience present, and were it not for the laws of the orchestra against encores, every selection would have been encored over and over again, so delighted seemed the audience. Beethoven's "Egmont" was played as the first selection, followed by Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The aria from "Achilleus" and prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" came next. In her solo the great contralto won thunderous applause, so finely was it rendered. The next selection consisted of three numbers, "Traume" by Wagner; "Die Tonge Nonne" by Schubert, and "Die drei Zigeuner" by Liszt, ending with the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which had been played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date ...

Washington again testified its appreciation of good music by its patronage that put standing room at a premium at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City.

Date NOV 11 1911

Schumann-Heink will again be the soloist at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this afternoon. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be the original...

Established 1884

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 11 1911

OPENING "BOSTON" CONCERT

One of the pleasantest events of the winter is to renew acquaintance, after half a year's absence, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This seems particularly so in Brooklyn, where the subscription to the season's series has become quite a family affair, at which one meets friends both within the orchestra and without, after the long summer hiatus. Besides all this, last evening in the opera house at the Academy of Music there was such a programme as the Boston or any other first-class symphony orchestra seldom gives—one hardly knows why. It was of the nature usually called "popular," in that it can be enjoyed by the tyro scarce less than the learned musician—yet including some of the most beautiful music in the world. Here and there, at almost any classical concert, we may be refreshed by a small bit of it, but to have the preludes to the "Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," the Love Death from the latter; the Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser," such a wealth of royal melody all at one time, interpreted by one of the greatest orchestras on the globe, seems almost too good to be true. As a rule the lover of such melodic beauty has to traverse barren wastes to get to them, or nearly drown in the deep, deep waters of musical metaphysics; but here they were, the concentration of almost all Wagner, coming one after the other without one trivial thing in between. All one had to do was to close the eyes and let the heavenly harmonies swirl about the ears, and if only the auditorium might have been darkened, as it should be in concerts not less than music drama, the happiness would have been complete. More people than Vladimir de Pachman are bothered by the lights.

They certainly interfered with the majority, the poignant beauty, the unutterable sorrow of the Funeral Music, which in a sense was the climax of the evening. The Liebestod loses a bit in concert, though it finds the audience unfatigued. Mr. Fiedler is not exactly a strenuous Wagner conductor, veering rather more toward delicacy and finish than passion. He led the concluding Tannhauser overture with great spirit, however.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, whom we do not see these days in opera, gave some of the Wagner music for which she has long been famous—the Erda scene from "Rheingold," and the Waltraute Narrative from "Gotterdammerung," together with the less well-known selection from "Rienzi." She was cordially received, being recalled four times after the Rienzi aria, which appeals to a concert audience rather more than the other selections, to form a necessary contrast. The celebrated contralto still has a handsome and youthful countenance, with that unaffected manner which is always so attractive. She was decorated with all her nine orders. The new one, from the Duke of Hesse, the gold Order of the First Class in Arts and Sciences, was suspended from red and white striped ribbon fastened to the over-shoulder sleeve band and hanging at the centre of the bodice.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is to appear for the Institute, in recital, April 12, is booked in America until Sept. 9, 1912, and will appear twice in opera in December and once in January, in Chicago.

The audience was very large, every seat being occupied, and considerable enthusiasm reigned throughout the two hours.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beethoven, Debussy, and Liszt Played —Mme. Schumann-Heink, Soloist.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday in Carnegie Hall, was again heard with many manifestations of delight by an audience as large as the hall would hold. The programme began with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which was given an admirable interpretation, one in which there were freedom and elasticity, but no exaggeration in nuance or emphasis, nor any anxious search for effects beneath the composer's plain intent; and it was one in which beauty and harmonious blending of tone were unceasing.

The other orchestral numbers were Debussy's exquisite "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," in which there was numberless gradations and delicacies of orchestral coloring, though there might have been a more subtly poetical conception of the piece; and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes," by which the Boston Orchestra conveniently acquitted itself of its duties toward the centenary of the composer with perhaps a minimum of weariness to its New York listeners.

Mme. Schumann-Heink again sang, not quite so well, on the whole, as she did Thursday night, for her songs made a somewhat severer demand than they did then, but better than she has often sung here in recent years, and with an evident striving toward artistic things. Her numbers were Dalila's "Spring Song" from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," and three songs by Schubert with orchestral accompaniment. "Die Junge Nonne," orchestrated by Liszt; "Tod und das Mädchen," by Mottl, and "Der Erlkönig," by Berlioz. "Die Junge Nonne" at least was rather high for her voice, and caused her some effort. These orchestrations of Schubert's pianoforte accompaniments, made by three different masters of the orchestra, have notably one point in common, and that is that they are strangely less effective than the original form that Schubert gave them. More might per-

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 10 1911

AUDIENCE HAILS SCHUMANN-HEINK

Established 1884

Opening of the Twenty-Sixth Season of Boston Symphony Orchestra — Alma Gluck's Recital

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra entered its twenty-sixth season in New York last night at Carnegie hall under the most brilliant auspices, with every seat in the immense auditorium filled, a sight which must have been welcome to Major Henry L. Higginson, the man who has made this orchestra possible, kept it the greatest in the world, and who came over from Boston to be present at the opening concert. Max Fiedler has won a complete victory in New York, as his reception last night must have made him realize, and Mme. Schumann-Heink, who has just returned after a series of wonderful triumphs in Europe, was greeted by numberless outbursts of applause from the instant she appeared as soloist of the occasion. Never has the great contralto sung with more brilliancy, with greater intensity, with a more organ-like tone, or with more sympathy.

Her singing is vocal art in its noblest phase, in its most moving effects, and it is the acme of sincerity, the characteristic, after all, which makes art great in the widest sense. In this spirit she sang an aria from Bruch's "Achilles," a symphonic and choral poem; "Traeume," with orchestration by the late Felix Mottl, and a brilliant vocal Hungarian rhapsody by Liszt, entitled "Die Drei Zigeuner," in which the flexibility, brilliancy and dash of the presentation threw the audience into unqualified demonstrations. Nothing, however, was more beautiful than the Wagner number, which she sang with a wealth of tonal beauty and unspeakable depths of feeling.

PERFECT ORCHESTRATION.

It was startling to see the names of Reger and Strauss in juxtaposition, the programme opening, as it did, with the "Comedy Overture," played here for the first time, and followed by the great tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," but Mr. Fiedler had reckoned well, as the overture was Reger in his most harmless mood, well-nigh trifling, and it contrasted well with the dark, impressive beauty of the Strauss masterpiece—beautiful for those who have come into the idiom and who hear the message beyond the cacophony of sound. It was a marvelous performance, one in which the orchestra seemed at a virtuosity almost too dazzling, almost too overpowering, and certainly extraordinary from the point of color, plasticity and technical perfection.

The concert master, Anton Witek, contributed much to the gypsy song of the soloist by his obligato, which was in the wild Hungarian spirit, and Mme. Schumann-Heink made him take his share of the applause. The Goldonian intermezzi by Bossi, an Italian composer of Bologna, heard here last season at one of the Philharmonic concerts, received the exquisite treatment they merited and pleased the audience much, as did the brilliant performance of the Weber "Oberon" overture.

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City.

Date NOV 10 1911

Established 1884

SCHUMANN-HEINK SINGS WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last night for the first time this season and gave a concert at Carnegie Hall, with Schumann-Heink as soloist. The programme opened with a new work by Reyer, "A Comedy Overture," op. 120. The other orchestral numbers were Richard Strauss's "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldman Intermezzi," for strings, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The players were at their best and Mr. Fiedler led them with his usual authority. Mme.

[69]

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last night with Mrs. Schumann-Heink as soloist. Mr. Fiedler chose to open the concert with Max Reger's new "comedy overture," which had its first performance anywhere under his direction in Boston last month, and had not in the interval been heard in New York. Reger has scored this overture for a comparatively small orchestra; otherwise he has treated the music in the style generally associated with his name. Undeniably the overture is written with a kind of effectiveness, but last night, with all its bustle, it sounded a dry and calculated effort, and the orchestration was conspicuously lacking in sensuous beauty. More impressive works by the redoubtable Reger have been heard in this town. The audience of cultivated and attentive listeners that always throngs Carnegie Hall at concerts of this orchestra received the work with scarcely a perfunctory round of applause.

The next number, as it chanced, was no less a work than Richard Strauss's colossal tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." When the orchestra had at last delivered the mystical and mystifying conclusion (in two keys!) of that portentous composition the applause was so loud, prolonged, and insistent that Mr. Fiedler motioned his men to rise and acknowledge with him the favor of the audience. Whatever one may think of Strauss's Nietzschean tone poem—and one must be pretty deaf not to detect the beauty, the magnificence, the sublimity of many a page!—the performance by the men from Boston was simply superb, one of the great achievements of that remarkable orchestra.

The rest of the programme was of a less taxing nature. First came Mrs. Schumann-Heink, who on her entrance was greeted with enthusiasm, to sing the lament of Andromache from Bruch's "Achilles." The lament is a laborious, uninspired piece of declamation, but Mrs. Schumann-Heink lent it the inspiration of her intense and noble utterance, and for the moment it seemed worth while. Then the orchestra was heard in a selection of four movements from Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," all played admirably, with especial praise for Mr. Ferir's viola solo in the "Serenatina." Then Mrs. Schumann-Heink returned to sing with orchestral accompaniment two songs—Wagner's "Träume" and Liszt's "Die drei Zigeuner." It may be said that this remarkable song of Liszt's as sung by Mrs. Schumann-Heink and accompanied by the orchestra in question (not to forget the violin obbligato by Mr. Witek) was a far finer memorial to the genius of Liszt than many a page of blatant orchestral music that has been played in his honor the last few weeks. Weber's "Oberon" overture completed a long programme.

From COURANT

Address

Date NOV 8 -

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The members of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra left Boston Sunday night for the first tour of the season and give concerts during the week in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, New York and Hartford, playing here Monday. In every city the sale of seats is unprecedented and the demand for season tickets for the Hartford concerts has never been equalled, all of which demonstrates the great popularity of Mr. Fiedler and his musicians. The entertainment at the Parsons Theater Monday evening willbe the first great musical event of the year and is eagerly anticipated by host of music lovers. The program includes "Heroic (No. 3) Symphony;" An Afternoon of a Faun," Debussey; nd the "Preludes" of Liszt. Alwin chrader will play a concerto for violncello and orchestra. Seats are on ale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music for

Est 1884

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

„Die groben Gesellen".

In dem gestern an dieser Stelle erschienenen Referat über das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde gesagt, daß das Orchester, von den groben Gesellen „des Reiches" befreit, glänzte und funkelte. Es hätte heißen sollen, von den groben Gesellen „des Blechs."

York, 1884

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 12

SCHUMANN-HEINK'S CHOICE OF SONGS IMPAIRS WORK

Est. 1884

Great Contralto Loses Dramatic Values with High Notes.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA A DELIGHT

Conducted Through Concert of Beethoven, Debussy and Liszt Numbers Before Large Audience.

With Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee of the season yesterday exerted an attraction on the musical public the demands of which even the vast auditorium of Carnegie Hall could not satisfy. Every available seat was occupied and many eager concert goers tried in vain to gain admittance. Yet the concert on the whole proved less satisfying than the one of last Thursday night, though, of course, the orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction, played with the euphony, precision and technical refinement which have made it one of the foremost bodies of musicians in the world.

The chief disappointment came in the singing of the great contralto, who failed to repeat her inspiring performance of the evening concert. That, probably, was due to the music she elected to sing, which taxed severely her upper register—a part of her voice under remarkable control but lacking the rich beauty and expressiveness of her lower tones.

The "Spring" aria from "Samson and Delilah" Mme. Schumann-Heink sang in German, a language somewhat foreign to the spirit of words and music. Vocally she was impressive, but she had no opportunity here of revealing the declamatory powers so strikingly exemplified in Andromache's Lament on Thursday. Her other numbers were Schubert's "Die Junge Nonne," "Tod und das Maedchen" and "Erlkoenig," with orchestrated accompaniments by Liszt, Mottl and Berlioz respectively. It cannot be said, however, that these inspired songs were improved by their instrumental garb. Indeed, the accompaniment arranged by Berlioz made many of the passages that are so effective on the piano sound tawdry and banal.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang "Tod und das Maedchen"—the second verse, in particular—with telling effect. But the strain of adopting the tessitura of a soprano in the two other contributions impaired her powers of emotional expression.

Decidedly the most impressive offering by the orchestra was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which opened the programme. Not only did Max Fiedler's dignified and dramatically potent reading of the score reflect great credit on the conductor, but the playing of his musicians measured up to their best standard.

Debussy's fascinating prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" also revealed the orchestra's fine qualities to advantage. One missed, however, in Fiedler's interpretation the true Debussyan flavor, delicate and elusive as a half-remembered dream yet peculiarly disturbing and poignant in its effect upon the senses. The spirit infused into the music seemed too real, too palpable, too obvious, though the performance itself, considered apart from its poetic message, was a beautiful example of euphonious and finely balanced playing. The programme closed with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

M. S.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

COURANT

From

Address

Date NOV 9 -

Boston Symphony Concert.

An enthusiastic welcome awaits the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Max Fiedler, conductor, when they appear at the Parsons Theater Monday night. This is but an evidence of the rapid growth of musical appreciation here, as elsewhere. Three of these entertainments for an entire season seem meager, when compared with twenty-four distinct programs presented in Boston. Here more discretion in program making is required to please all tastes and Mr. Fiedler always displays admirable skill in this particular.

Beethoven's No. 3, "Heroic" Symphony, has been performed by the orchestra in Boston no less than twenty-four times in the past thirty years, while the work has appeared on no program here for many years. It was regarded by the composer as his first great symphony. On the title page of the manuscript the words "Sinfonia Grande" appear in his own handwriting, and later, Beethoven inserted, with pencil, "Written on Bonaparte." Napoleon and his greatness, therefore, served to inspire the measures of the great symphony which many will hear Monday for the first time. Other attractive numbers will make the concert a memorable event. Reserved seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Est 1884

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 11 1911

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Stirring All-Wagner Programme, With Schumann-Heink in Perfect Voice.

Estab 1884

The music lovers of Brooklyn were made happy last night by the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the first of its concerts for the season. Every seat in the opera house of the Academy of Music was occupied, including the box seats from which a view of the stage is impossible. Throughout the house there was an atmosphere of rapt and eager enjoyment. It was an auspicious omen for a happy winter, which, unfortunately, is the last under the leadership of Max Fiedler, whose contract with the orchestra expires at the close of this season.

Mr. Fiedler contributed not a little to the pleasure of the evening, by making an all-Wagner programme. If there is one composer more than another whom Brooklyn loves in heroic doses, it is Wagner, and it loves him the more when that heroic singer Mme. Schumann-Heink is his interpreter with the orchestra. Of all operatic composers, Wagner, by his strength, can best hold an audience for an evening with excerpts. The first group, last evening, included three ideal overtures for purposes of grouping; the joyous prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the poetic "Lohengrin," and the passion--laden "Tristan und Isolde," coupled with the "Love Death" music from the last act of that fateful opera. The playing again showed that for smoothness of blending through the different choirs and the resulting lusciousness of tone the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands unrivalled in this country and probably in the world. When it melts into the flowing passion of "Triston und Isolde" it is not a band of eighty men, but is as though one consummate artist was playing on a mighty organ, every part related to every other and the whole responding almost automatically to a single brain.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, radiant in smiles and glittering with decorations, received a royal welcome. Her first number embraced Erda's scene from the fourth act of "Das Rheingold" and Waltraute's protest from the first act of "Gotterdammerung." The singer's appearance indicated that she was in the pink of physical condition and her singing proved it. Concert singing must be a rest for her after the strain of the work in an operahouse, because the singer's voice was never before heard in such beautiful condition in Brooklyn. There was no ragged notes, and when one considers the range which her Wagner music called for, it was little less than wonderful. The passion and the depth of Erda's recital were thrilling, while the Waltraute scene was a complete refutation to the old-fashioned caviller's, if any are left whom complain, that Wagner is noisy or unmusical. Indeed, from a musical standpoint, neither Mme. Schumann-Heink nor Louise Homer sings this scene in the operahouse as it was sung last night. The costume of Walhalla and the action of the scene make for strenuousness, and strenuousness makes for forced and unmusical tones; whereas, the masterful continence of the Boston orchestra is an incitement of the most beautiful tone which any singer can produce. The effect on Mme. Schumann-Heink last night was salutary and delightful, especially in her second number, Adriano's air from the seldom sung "Rienzi," which runs in conveniently high, but on which there were, last night, no unpleasant edges.

The orchestra also played the "Siegfried Rhine Journey," which is so persistently and mistakenly called a "funeral march." Its solemn grandeur was awe-inspiring. The close was the ever-welcome "Tannhauser" overture in which the battle of the spirit with the flesh is made as dramatic and vivid as in the opera itself and in which the triumph of the Pilgrim chorus over the allurements of the Venusberg lifts the hearers to militant enthusiasm. It was a noble evening, brought to a thrilling close with that triumph of the horns.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 10 19

With two local orchestras in full swing and several others about to begin their season, there was nevertheless an overwhelming welcome last night for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The audience which always greets the big band from Boston is like no other.

Est 1884

Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, who has entered upon the last year of his contract, was welcomed with special warmth. His programme this time contained a novelty in Reger's "Comedy Overture," in which the technical skill of the composer is greater than the musical content of the piece. Its themes are fragmentary and their development uninteresting. The orchestra's admirable playing did much to make the piece endurable.

Richard Strauss' "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," which has been played here before under Mr. Fiedler's direction, was again a brilliant, but puzzling, performance. Again the enthusiasm of the audience was evidently for the players—not for the composition.

Bossi's charming Goldonian intermezzi and Weber's always welcome overture to "Oberon" completed the wealth of orchestral music on this initial programme.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, as special soloist, sang with all her wealth of voice. "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles," was declaimed by her with stirring effect. Wagner's "Traume" and Liszt's "Die drei Zigeuner" were her other selections.

[70]

From EVENING STAR.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 9

SYMPHONY CHARMS IN FINE PROGRAM

Boston Players and Mme. Schumann-Heink Divide Honors at Lyric.

Large and representative of the musical element of the city was the audience that heard the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual Baltimore season last evening at the Lyric. Those who filled every available seat in the house and stood several ranks deep on the first floor enjoyed a program that for felicity of selection and brilliancy of interpretation has rarely been surpassed in the many years in which the fine musical organization has been visiting us.

This was the program:

Mendelssohn—Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op. 21.

Strauss—Tone poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra (freely after Friedr. Nietzsche), Op. 30.

Wagner—Erda's scene from Das Rheingold, Scene IV.; Waltraute's Narrative from Gotterdammerung, Act I., Scene 3.

Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi, Op. 127: Preludio e Minuetto, Gagliardi, Serenatina, Burlesca.

Wagner—Scene, Just God! and aria, My Love Fades in Its Blossom, from Rienzi, Act III., No. 9.

Weber—Overture to the opera Oberon.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, of perennial popularity and unfailing vocal excellence, was the soloist, and the ovation that followed her final appearance indicated that hers was the most popular section of the entertainment. But musical art was principally interested in the second number, the Strauss tone-poem, and the large audience followed its wide range through the orchestral possibilities with close and not always clear attention. Probably not one in ten persons present had ever heard the work before, and it must be heard many times, indeed, if one would attempt to perceive its meanings, despite the illuminating analysis in the program pamphlet. Carrying in its mingled harmony and dissonances a very cryptic philosophy and a mysticism that are not always clear even in the words of their creator, the themes of the Strauss tone-poem are beyond the range of casual attention. Doubtless many who heard the work viewed it as mere orchestral gymnastics, but repeated hearings would certainly disclose ever fresh beauty and meaning. To say that the work was enjoyed would be to deal loosely in words; there is no soul-uplifting harmony in its seemingly unrelated themes. It would be better to say that the audience sat in spellbound attention, mentally striving for an understanding that did not come. The fault was not the conductor's nor the players'. Mr. Fiedler interpreted the work in a somewhat original manner that made for greater beauty and would have made for clearness were that quality to be found in a Strauss composition. Accentuating the harmonic themes rather than the abysmal discords that so plentifully mark the score, his version gained materially in effect.

The Wagner numbers were particularly enjoyed. Mme. Schumann-Heink's always delightful voice loses nothing of its charm as she adds more years of youth to her score. Not essentially dramatic, but effective in the highest sense, is her singing of such numbers as she rendered last evening. The purity and sweetness of her lighter tones, the almost masculine quality of her lower register and the perfection of enunciation that is hers had abundant opportunity for display, and the demonstration that followed her final appearance was vociferous.

The Bosi intermezzi were the lightening numbers in a program that but for them and the Oberon overture would have been somewhat oppressively heavy. But both were given with a contrasting vivace and a piquant emphasis on the lighter strings that made for an even shading in the whole performance.

The work of Mr. Schuecker, the harpist in the Strauss work, is deserving of especial mention for its precision, grace and delicacy.

J. C. P.

POST, NOVEMBER 12, 1911

Symphony Orchestra

Madame Schumann-Heink will be the soloist of the sixth programme of the Symphony Orchestra to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and this will be her only appearance of the season in this city. She will sing Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles," and three songs with orchestra, Wagner's "Dreams," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; Schubert's "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Liszt, and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies." The orchestral numbers will comprise Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" and Grieg's Old Norwegian Romance with variation which will be played for the first in Boston. The "Scheherazade" Mr. Fiedler played three years ago with much success. The Grieg piece is an adaption for orchestra of what was originally for piano.

Symphony in Cambridge

Miss Lilla Ormond will be the soloist at the second Symphony concert in Cambridge which will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, Nov. 16, at 8 o'clock. She will sing two arias, one of which will be the recitative and air of Azael from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The Symphony will be Brahms' in E minor No. 4. In addition to this the orchestra will play Cherubini's overture "Lodoiska," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes."

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 13 1911

Esta 1884

Konzerte.

Auch das zweite New Yorker Konzert der Bostoner fand am Samstag Nachmittag vor gänzlich gefülltem Haus unter Mitwirkung von Frau Schumann-Heink als Solistin den lebhaftesten Erfolg. Herr Fiedler dirigirte Beethoven's „Eroica" großzügig und führte das bewunderungswürdige Orchester namentlich im Trauermarsch zu den lichtesten Höhen. Einfach erhebend wirkte mitten in dem düsteren Kolorit des Ganzen der Glanz des vorübergehend einfallenden Lichtstrahles, und der in leisen Zuckungen ersterbende Schluß des Satzes.

Den ganzen noblen Klangzauber der Spielervereinigung von Boston entfesselte sie in Debussy's eigenartigem „Nachmittag eines Fauns", der unbedingt zu denjenigen Kompositionen des französischen Musikanarchisten gehört, mit denen jeder gehen kann. Die Klangspielereien sind da berechtigt, selbst die Kakophonie erscheint zum Rang eines ausdrucksvollen Mediums erhoben. Dem Publikum gefielen die Phantasien des mit einem brummenden Schädel erwachenden Fauns, der nicht weiß, ob die angebete Nymphe wirklich bei ihm gewesen war, oder ob er nur geträumt habe, über die Maßen. Liszt's „Préludes" fanden eine in jeder Beziehung stimmungsvolle und wirksame Ausführung.

Frau Schumann-Heink sang in bester Disposition und mit ihrer reifen, überragenden Kunst zuerst die Frühlingsarie aus Saint-Saëns' „Samson und Delilah", und entschädigte uns damit königlich für die grausen Ohr-Mißhandlungen, die man sich gerade in dieser Arie von so vielen unfertigen Sängerinnen gefallen lassen muß. In der zweiten Abtheilung sang sie mit Orchester-Begleitung „Die junge Nonne" und „Tod und das Mädchen" von Schubert, ersteres in der Liszt'schen, das letztere in der Mottl'schen Bearbeitung, mit unsagbarer Wirkung, um mit Schubert's „Erlkönig" den höchsten Trumpf auszuspielen.

Wie die Schumann-Heink den düsteren Grundton genial andeutet, wie sie die sprechenden Personen so virtuos-charakteristisch und doch ohne die epische Grundstimmung zu sprengen auseinanderhält, wie das Ganze mit dem ganzen Wohllaut ihres Prachtorgans durchtränkt, das muß man gehört haben. Die Berlioz'sche Bearbeitung wirkt namentlich durch die huschenden, gefälligen Violinfiguren äußerst effektvoll. Das Publikum wollte sich gar nicht beruhigen und rief die Künstlerin immer wieder hervor.

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date NOV 11 1911

Esta 1884

Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences Makes Concession to Popular Taste and Presents Boston Symphony Orchestra in Program of Excerpts From Operas of Richard Wagner, Packing the Academy of Music.

Somewhat a concession to popular taste was made by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, when the latter organization presented in the New Academy of Music, Brooklyn, a program made up entirely of excerpts from operas by Richard Wagner, with Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink as the soloiste of the evening. A packed house greeted Max Fiedler and his band from "down East."

The preludes to "Die Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," and "Tristan und Isolde," with the Funeral Music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," were the orchestral selections. Mme. Schumann-Heink sang Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold" and the Narrative of Waltraute from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," the latter of which is invariably omitted from the representations at the Metropolitan Opera House of the last of the "Ring" dramas, and she rendered, as the concluding number of the concert, Adriano's aria from "Rienzi."

The two excerpts from the "Nibelung" operas are too episodical in character to qualify in concert performance, but Mme. Schumann-Heink, by the warmth and feeling of her declamation, contrived to invest them with logical and musicianly expression.

By dint of masterly discrimination exercised by Maestro Fiedler, the orchestra gave an exposition of the "Tristan" prelude that was—thrilling. The climaxes were worked up with tempestuous grandeur.

AMERICAN—GLOBE

NOVEMBER 12, 1911.—NOVEMBER 12, 1911.

SCHUMANN-HEINK SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Noted Singer to Be Heard at Concerts on Friday and Saturday.

Madame Schumann-Heink will be the soloist of the sixth program of the Symphony Orchestra to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and this will be her only appearance of the season in this city.

Madame Schumann-Heink has been engaged for a series of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston and other cities, and with the exception of New York and Washington she makes her sole appearances in these cities with the orchestra; the greater part of her season will be spent in the West. She is down for two numbers, the first being Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles." Her second will comprise three songs with orchestra, Wagner's "Dreams," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; Schubert's "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Liszt, and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" and Grieg's Old Norwegian Romance, with variations, which will be played for the first time in Boston. The "Scheherazade" Mr. Fiedler played three years ago with much success. The Grieg piece is an adaptation for orchestra of what was originally for piano.

Miss Lilla Ormond will be the soloist at the second Symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sanders Theatre, Thursday evening, at 8 o'clock. She will sing two arias, one of which will be the Recitative and Air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The Symphony will be Brahms's in E Minor No. 4. In addition to this the orchestra will play Cherubini's overture "Lodoiska," Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Gilbert's Comedy Overture on Negro Themes. The Gilbert piece was played at the Symphony concerts in Boston last Spring and had a notable success. Mr. Gilbert, who is one of the younger of the American composers, has taken familiar Negro songs of the ante-bellum period and worked them into a most brilliant overture. It is jolly and bright and in its way unique.

Mme Schumann-Heink Soloist at Symphony Concerts.

Mme Schumann-Heink, as soloist at the Symphony concerts this week, will make what is to be her sole appearance here this season. She will sing Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles," and a group of songs, with orchestra, Wagner's "Dreams," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; Schubert's "The Young Nun," with orchestration by Liszt, and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies."

There will be two orchestral numbers, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after the "Thousand Nights and a Night") and Grieg's Old Norwegian Romance with variations, originally written for piano.

Rimsky-Korsakoff has written of the Sultan Schahriar, who, convinced of the hopelessness of placing faith in women, had sworn to put each of his wives to death after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade is resourceful and clever and diverts his mind with stories for a thousand and one nights. He postpones the execution from night to night and finally renounces his bloody vow.

The Sultana ransacked tales of adventure and fairy lore and the verses of the poets to invent her stories to beguile her lord. Among them the composer has written music to these: (1) The Sea and Sinbad's Ship. (2) The Tale of the Kalendar-Prince. (3) The Young Prince and the Young Princess. (4) Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship is Wrecked on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion. There is no clue as to which voyage of Sinbad is meant or which of the three Kalendars. An Oriental ballet bearing the name "Scheherazade" to music from this suite was produced by Gertrude Hoffmann in New York last Summer.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

Miss Lilla Ormond will be the soloist at the second Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. She will sing two arias, one of which will be the recitative and air of Azael from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The symphony will be Brahms' in E minor No. 4. In addition to this the orchestra will play Cherubini's overture, "Lodoiska"; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes." The Gilbert piece was played at the Symphony concerts in Boston last Spring and had a notable success.

MONITOR,

NOVEMBER 11, 1911

Mme. Schumann-Heink is the soloist on the Symphony orchestra program of Friday afternoon, Nov. 17 and Saturday evening, Nov. 18. This will be the contralto's only appearance of the season in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has been engaged for a series of concerts with the Symphony orchestra in Boston and other cities and with the exception of New York and Washington she makes her sole appearances in these cities with the orchestra. The greater part of her season will be spent in the West. She has two numbers, the first being Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles," her second comprising three songs with orchestra: Wagner's "Dreams," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; Schubert's "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Liszt, and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies."

The orchestral numbers are Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" and Grieg's Old Norwegian Romance with variations, which will be played for the first time in Boston. The "Scheherazade" Mr. Fiedler played three years ago with much success. The Grieg piece is an adaptation for orchestra of what was originally for piano.

* * *

Miss Lilla Ormond will be the soloist at the second symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sander's theater Thursday evening, Nov. 16, at 8 o'clock. She will sing two arias, one of which will be the recitative and air of Azael from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The symphony will be Brahms' in E minor No. 4. In addition to this the orchestra will play Cherubini's overture "Lodoiska," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes. The Gilbert piece was played at the symphony concerts in Boston last spring and had a noteworthy success. Mr. Gilbert, one of the younger of the American composers, has taken familiar negro songs of the ante-bellum period and worked them into a brilliant overture.

The soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond. She will sing Azael's air in Debussy's "Prodigal Son" and a new song for contralto and orchestra, text by John Todhunter, music by George W. Chadwick, who has dedicated the song to her.

HERALD,

NOVEMBER 12, 1911.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place next Thursday evening. The symphony will be Brahms's in E-minor No. 4. The orchestra will also play Cherubini's overture "Lodoiska," Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes. Gilbert's piece was played at the Symphony concerts in Boston last spring and had a noteworthy success. Mr. Gilbert, one of the younger of the American composers, has taken familiar negro songs of the ante-bellum period and worked them into a brilliant overture.

The soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond. She will sing Azael's air in Debussy's "Prodigal Son" and a new song for contralto and orchestra, text by John Todhunter, music by George W. Chadwick, who has dedicated the song to her.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 11, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

THREE years and more ago, at the second pair of concerts in which he conducted here, Mr. Fiedler led Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite. "Scheherezade," suggested by tales of the Arabian Nights (like those of Sindbad and the Kalendar), richly colored instrumentally, thick with Oriental atmosphere and vivid with romantic tone-picturing. The music plainly appealed to Mr. Fiedler's imagination, and some of his best talents played in his performance of it. He has not since repeated the Suite, and very seldom has he risked any other of Rimsky-Korsakoff's pieces. For the current musical year both "Scheherezade" and "Antar" appear on the conductor's list, and the repetition of "Scheherezade" is appointed for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The other orchestral piece is a discovery from Grieg in the library of the band. There Dr. Muck found the overture "In Autumn" and promptly played it, and there Mr. Fiedler has found this orchestral arrangement by Grieg himself of an old Norwegian romance that he wrote originally for the piano. As already specified, Mme. Schumann-Heink, the alto, whom the Symphony Concerts almost always put to her mettle, will be the singer. Her numbers are "Andromache's Lament" from Bruch's cantata, "Achilles," and three songs with orchestra—Wagner's "Dreams," Schubert's "The Young Nun" and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies."

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concerts

THE second concert of the series that the Symphony Orchestra annually undertakes in Cambridge befalls at Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. From recent concerts by the orchestra in Boston, Mr. Fiedler has taken Brahms's symphony in E minor, which he leads well; Cherubini's fine old overture to his opera, "Lodoiska," and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." To these, for a fourth orchestral piece, he has added H. F. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," one of the surprises of the Symphony Concerts last spring—music of clear American tang, originally imagined, vividly scored, and quick of impression from beginning to end. The singer for the concert is Miss Ormond, the mezzo-soprano. She will sing an air from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son" and a group of French songs. In such music, she is good to hear.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 13, 1911

Items of the Day

Mr. Fiedler repeated the "Eroica" symphony at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York Saturday afternoon. His public in New York has long liked his readings of Beethoven better than do his audiences in Boston, and justly it was warm over his present version of the "Eroica." "There were freedom and elasticity," says the Times, "but no exaggeration in nuance or emphasis, nor any anxious search for effects beneath the composer's plain intent, and it was one in which beauty and harmonious blending of tone were unceasing."

A Pension-Fund Concert

THE Symphony Orchestra is taking time by the forelock in its concerts, this year, for its Pension Fund. The first is already appointed for the evening of Sunday, Nov. 26, at Symphony Hall, and for a second time Mme. Schumann-Heink has volunteered her services as the assisting singer. Excerpts from Wagner's operas are to make the larger part, if not the whole of the programme, and the probabilities are that the singer will be heard again in the music of Waltraute and Erda. Her public here is large and loyal; it may not hear her in the opera house, since she

[71]

From EVENING NEWS.

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FINE CONCERT

Madame Schumann-Heink Shares Honors With Director Fiedler.

Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a most interestingly varied program at the Lyric last evening. Several epochs in musical creation and several widely differing individualities, aims and modes were present, although but little over a century embraces the dates of birth of the composers who contributed. The order of succession of the works presented also showed good judgment.

There was not a wearisome moment during the evening; at least for those who could follow Richard Strauss understandingly, throughout his prodigally expended ingenuity in picturing his conception of Nietzsche's "Zarathustra." Strauss is a great genius, but he seems to be impelled outward beyond the pale of the true musical field in searching for suggestive subjects. Abstract music is the expression of personal emotion. One misses this intimate impulse in "Zarathustra," but can but wonder at the streaks of genius which enliven its extreme length.

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Overture" is always welcome. It is absolutely natural music, voicing no Shumanic depth of feeling, but delightfully poetic. The Bossi "Goldonian Intermezzi" (Opus 127) are interesting. The composer of these pieces has hearked backward instead of having ventured out into the obscurities and vagaries of the modern trend. These "Intermezzi" display skill of all essential kinds in their construction—contrapuntal and instrumental—but they exhibit no evidences of distinguishing individuality. The "Obecon" is like the Mendelssohn Overture—familiar and prized.

Mme. Schumann-Heink in the Wagner selections again convinced her hearers that she is an almost unique artist, for she is always earnest, capable and illuminating. She is an ideal interpreter of Wagner, and indeed of any true music that possesses those qualities which appeal to her artistic sense.

Mr. Fiedler read the whole program with keen appreciation of the varied moods expressed in its numbers, and the gentlemen of the Orchestra responded to his demands with astonishing adequacy. The Lyric is, beyond doubt, the best auditorium for orchestral music in our ken. O. B. B.

Estab 1884

Marlboro Entries

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date NOV 9 - 1911

Boston Symphony Concert.

An audience of capacity proportion is already assured for the concert a Parsons theatre next Monday even ing by the Boston Symphony Orches tra. This growing appreciation fo orchestral music has been develope in large measure by the famous Bos ton organization, and as a musica body it bears the distinction of great est excellence. The management ha always been most fortunate in choic of conductors, and from the early day of Zerahn and Henschel on through the engagements of Gericke, Nikisch Dr. Muck and the present conductor Mr. Fiedler, the orchestra has made rapid strides in ensemble virtuosity and has won popular favor beyond any other body of musicians in America. The concert next Monday night will add materially to the season's entertainment and will be enjoyed by a representative Hartford audience. Early application for seats should be made, as the demand is likely to exceed the capacity of the theatre. Reservations cannot be held later than Saturday of this week. Seats on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s store, No. 201 Asylum street.

Estabi 1884

From

Address

Date NOV 10 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Parsons's theater, Monday night, for the first concert of its season in Hartford. The orchestra appeared at Carnegie hall, New York, last night before a crowded house. Of the concert the Sun says in part: "Conductor Max Fiedler led the gentlemen from Boston, through a marvellously eloquent and technically faultless performance. The exquisite beauty and perfect balance of tone of the orchestra have never disclosed themselves more completely, nor has the admired body of players ever enunciated every phrase with a finer precision and a more captivating elasticity of style. The Boston Symphony orchestra has come to be regarded with almost as much pride in New York as it evokes [illegible] of her

Estab 1884

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date NOV 18

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Matinee.

Carnegie Hall was again crowded, on Saturday afternoon, to hear the greatest of contraltos, Mme. Schumann-Heink, sing Saint-Saëns and Schubert. Her first number was the aria from Act I of Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Dalila," "Printemps qui commence," which she sang gloriously. Such richness, such volume, such smoothness and velvet tone as she poured out for her delighted hearers are not to be heard often. It was in the Schubert songs, however, that she rose to the heights. "Die junge Nonne" was the first, then came an unforgettable performance of "Tod und das Mädchen," and last "Der Erlkönig," the first song orchestrated by Liszt, the second by Mottl, the third by Berlioz—least successfully of the three. Berlioz has brought out some inner orchestral voices which distract one's attention inopportunely, but this is only a small matter, compared to such an interpretation of the song as that on Saturday. Throughout the first part of it the singer repressed her tone almost to a pianissimo, except when the father's voice was heard, warm and comforting, and this made the contrast of the child's final cry of terror a new experience, even for those who have heard the "Erlking" played and sung a countless number of times. Strange to say, however, the poignancy of the discord which Schubert uses—a discord which never palls, never loses its thrill—is felt less with the orchestral than the piano accompaniment. Great as was Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing of the "Erlkönig," "Death and the Maiden" was even more wonderful. From the first despairing cry of the girl to the last note, her voice and interpretation were thrilling beyond words, and many eyes were wet when the last note was sung. Applause seemed as much out of place after the solemn beauty of such an interpretation as it does after the first or last act of "Parsifal."

The orchestra gave a superb performance of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's glorious "Les Préludes." By the poetic reading Mr. Fiedler gave of Liszt's "Préludes," he showed himself to be an ardent admirer of the genius the world is at present delighting to honor. It is to be hoped we may soon hear more of the master's works played by the Boston Orchestra. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony opened the programme.

As at every other concert up to the present, this year, Carnegie Hall was insufferably hot.

Estab 1884

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn. N. Y.

Date NOV 13 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Opening of Brooklyn Season —Mme. Schumann-Heink Soloist.

An audience which filled the opera house of the Academy of Music to its fullest capacity greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Friday night in the first of a series of five Philharmonic concerts. The temper of the house was most cordial. Mr. Fiedler's appearance was made the occasion of a hearty greeting. The all Wagner programme was well arranged, and it is almost needless to say most gratifyingly given. Mr. Fiedler has held his position so many years that the best kind of relation is established between him and his men. The organization is old enough to have traditions and has the esprit de corps, which means maintenance of high ideals and standards.

Included in the first part of the programme were the prelude to the "Meistersingers of Nuremberg," played with fine cumulative effect, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the glorious prelude and libertod from "Tristan and Isolde." The numbers were played with characteristic precision and scholarly understanding and interpretation. Later orchestral numbers were the funeral music from act third of "Gotterdammerung" and the overture to "Tannhauser," both played with superb rythm, dramatic intensity and dignity. If any special meed of purely musical praise can be meted out for individual numbers in a programme so entirely admirable as a whole it must be accorded the "Liebestod" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist and was received with lavish demontration of regard. She was obviously in radiant health and spirits, and in pure voice. She sung Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung," the scene, "Just God," and the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" from "Rienze."

Her glorious voice, the nobility of her delivery, the rich understanding and the power to make her voice color the sentiment she is singing lent impressiveness to all her numbers. Of the beauty of her delivery of the Erda scene, it is impossible to speak except in terms of eulogy. Orchestra and singer admirably supplemented each other. The audience showed its gratification spontaneously and without stint.

Estab 4

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 16, 1911

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The sale of seats for the first Pension Fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony hall Nov. 26, will open at the box office at Symphony hall at 8:30 Thursday.

As already announced Madame Schumann-Heink has generously given her services to the concert as the soloist and the programme will be devoted to music by Wagner.

[72]

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

When Mr. Max Fiedler stepped to the conductor's desk at the Boston Symphony concert on Saturday afternoon there was not an empty seat in sight in Carnegie Hall. For days before tickets were without price, for they were not procurable for love or money.

The Eroica Symphony went beautifully. The Liszt "Preludes" was in the spirit of a memorial year. Mme. Schumann-Heink, warmly greeted, sang the spring aria from "Samson and Delilah." But the prelude to Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" spoiled one for the group of Schubert songs with orchestra.

The Debussy piece, with its haunting mystery, its suggestion of a wood full of Hamadryads, was a bad preparation for the Germanic ballads. Mme. Schumann-Heink was at her best in "Death and the Maiden" and "The Erlking."

Estabi 1884

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season in Hartford will be given at the Parsons Theater Monday evening with Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, as soloist. With a house that is nearly sold out by subscription, with interest that is keener than ever for the music of this organization, the prospects for the coming season of three concerts are brighter than they have ever been in the past. They will mark Max Fiedler's last appearance in this city, his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra ending at the end of the current season, when he expects to return to Europe. For the first concert the symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," which has not been heard here in a number of years. Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the most popular of Liszt's symphonic poems, "Les Preludes," complete the purely orchestral part of the program. Mr. Schroeder will play two numbers, the first number being Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," which is a treatment of an ancient Hebrew melody and his second Boellman's graceful "Symphonic Variations." The program follows:—

"Symphony No. 3," in E-flat major, "Eroica" ..... Beethoven

(a "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello ..... Bruch

(b) "Symphonic Variations," for violoncello ..... Boellman

Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy

"Les Preludes," symphonic poem, No. 3 ..... Liszt

k, 1884

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date NOV - 3 1911

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall fall respectively on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week. The soloist at both concerts will be Madame Schumann-Heink.

On Thursday evening New York will hear for the first time Max Reger's "Overture to a Comedy." Other items on the programme will be Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi" and Weber's overture, "Oberon." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing an aria by Bruch and songs with orchestra by Wagner and Liszt.

At the afternoon concert the symphony will be the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Estab 1884

HERALD,

NOVEMBER 16, 1911.

At the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, tonight, the orchestral pieces will be Brahms' symphony No. 4, Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes. Miss Ormond will sing songs by Debussy and Chadwick.

The program of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall this week will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade"; Grieg's "Old Norwegian Romance" with variations (first time in Boston); Sibelius's "Karelia" overture (first time in Boston), Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing "Andromache's Lament" from Bruch's "Achilles," Wagner's "Traeume," Schubert's "Young Nun" and Liszt's "Three Gypsies," all with orchestral accompaniment.

The sale of seats for the first pension fund concert in Symphony Hall, on Sunday evening, Nov. 26, will open at the box office at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning at 8:30. Mme. Schumann-Heink has generously

From COURANT HARTFORD, CONN.
Address
Date NOV 10 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season in Hartford will be given at the Parsons Theater Monday evening, with Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, as the soloist. Mr. Schroeder, who is already well known to our musical public, was born at Neuhaldensleben June 15, 1855, and at an early age took up the study of the piano and later, studied both violin and viola, for some time playing the latter in the Schroeder Quartet, composed of three brothers and himself. He abandoned these instruments for the violoncello and since 1875 has held the part of first 'cellist in some of the most famous orchestras. His long career with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet is known to all followers of music and musicians. Mr. Schroeder is always admirable, whether in ensemble or solo, and on this occasion will perform two selections with orchestral accompaniment, Bruch's familiar "Kol Nidrei" and "Symphonic Variations" for 'cello by Leon Boellmann. The latter is new to Hartford audiences. John M. Gallup & Co., No. 201 Asylum street, are conducting the sale of seats for which there has been a large demand.

Estab 84

Alwin Schroeder.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From COURANT HARTFORD, CONN.
Address
Date NOV 11 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony orchestra concert of the season in Hartford will be given in Parsons's theater Monday evening with Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, as soloist. With a house that is nearly sold out by subscription, with interest that is keener than ever for the music of this organization, the prospects for the coming season of three concerts are brighter than they have ever been in the past. Additional interest is lent to the concerts as they will mark Max Fiedler's last appearances in this city, his engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra ending at the end of the current season when he expects to return to Europe. Mr. Fiedler has arranged another of his admirable programs for this concert. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica" which has not been heard here in a number of years and as it is one of the few monumental works of music, will be welcomed again with eagerness. Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the most popular of Liszt's symphonic poems, "Les Preludes" complete the purely orchestral part of the program.

MAX FIEDLER,
Conductor.

Time and the Symphony Concerts

A note from Caroline Lincoln Pond of Winchester, written apropos of recent discussion of Mr. Fiedler's lengthening programmes, suggests that the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should begin half an hour earlier. The note runs: "Now that the length of the programmes for the Symphony Concerts is being discussed, may I venture to suggest a change that has long been in my mind, namely, having the hour of beginning the afternoon concerts two o'clock instead of half-past two. The many suburbanites would be enabled to make connections with earlier trains, the performance would almost invariably be finished by half-past four, and many persons, I feel sure, would have a peace of mind which they have hitherto not known.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From HARTFORD, CONN.
Address
Date NOV 14 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; FIRST CONCERT OF SEASON.

Established:

Brilliant Work of the Famous Organization—Beethoven Symphony No. 3 Played Exquisitely.

With the returning season the Boston Symphony orchestra came Monday evening for the first concert. Parsons's theater was entirely filled. The taste for this class of music and this class of performance has grown from season to season, and the audiences that needed fostering at first almost exceed bounds now. The program brought the famous "Eroica" symphony of the archmaster, the first of what is considered his second style; and it brought the great and beautiful "Preludes" by Liszt, whose centenary all the musical world is now celebrating. The first was played here more than once before, nearly twenty years ago. The second was interpreted not infrequently by the Thomas orchestra. The program, between the two, brought Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Boellmann's "Symphonic Variations," both solo numbers, and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," which has been heard here to every one's admiration more than once. The orchestra, as it deployed on the stage, had an almost intimate look, and Conductor Max Fiedler, whom all audiences know and love in his rich, highly colored, dramatic and forceful renditions, was greeted with applause. Stage and auditorium looked very brilliant, and a festal feeling prevailed in the house.

The "Eroica," or third symphony, is said, with good reason, to have been inspired by Napoleon before he assumed the imperial state. His early career inspired Beethoven, though he eradicated this dedication after the Corsican assumed the purple. The first part of the symphony is carried by these thoughts. It is broad inspiring, full of ambition and full of glory. One can trace the heroic afflatus in its measures, the fierce labor, the triumph of great, free accomplishment. It has been explained in twenty different ways by as many great commentators. But, with the heroic idea at bottom, and the ambition, the courage, the splendor of its measures, it explains itself. No need following the special musical figures. They tend to one expression and one effect. The second part is a funeral march of wonderful dignity and feeling. One can read emotion in its measures, that now soar, then give voice to proud grief and dull reverberations. The sad, steady march theme carries all through, now with splendor as velvet and silver, then again with dull grace like crape. But, throughout, it is a majestic, a soundful sorrow that speaks, and at moments rises to piercing emotional heights. Then intrudes a new quiet melody, and it ends solemn and subdued, with a great triumphal burst at the last. Now follows the Scherzo, graceful and playful, thronged with boisterous abandon. Nothing somber and sinister here, only wild delight. The bass strums low, the instruments trip over it in wild abandon, the melodies lose accent in their haste. And now the whole orchestra sonorously joins the chase, until they all fall into the hurrying rhythms. Then follows the trio, with a sonorous horn solo that is resumed later on, and the former melodies unite in a code that holds balance between fun and triumph. The finale is full of joyous elation, full of rush and revel. The melody is sounded by one group of strings in semi-notes, while the others dance about in wild snatches and phrases. And the original melody comes in, sonorous and fugal. We get a full and joyous climax toward the last, then a soft, heavy chant, and closing triumph of the original theme in emphatic and rapid measures.

The orchestra played this with impressive splendor. The high points of the score fairly glittered, the majestic periods rose roundly and imposingly, the appeal of the whole was broad, picturesque, enchanting. It was a rendition of great balance and color, of sharp, fierce appeal, or broad, bright sweeps, and again of delicious modulations and tender accents. Spirited and highly colored, and yet of artistic poise and great beauty in detail and of the usual finish in execution. Every movement was heartily applauded. The rendition was perhaps not altogether as brilliant, as inspired, as one remembers it of long ago. But it was clear in meaning, and very forceful in contrasts. The funeral march was most impressive, the scherzo light handed and brilliant. In the closing part the violins were very fine. Loud and sincere applause followed each

"Kol Nidrei" is the great prayer uttered by Israel on the eve of the Day of Atonement, and recalls with religious agony all resolves and promises made during the year, in order to appear free and white before the judge. It is for cello and orchestra, and rises with the sentiments of the occasion. The weird sounds of agony, the prayerful lilt, the trust in forgiveness are all fully and harmoniously sounded and lift on wings of music. No subject could be more fruitful, none is treated with sincerer emotion. Alwin Schroeder, whom our public remembers very well and values very high, and who was greeted with long continued, hearty applause, was the soloist. Again and again he was applauded. No need to describe his play. The rich sounds of the solemn melody rose in inexpressible fervor, the agony, the appeal, the cry of the soul was heard in these mounting strains. The cello voice gained human quality. But the accompaniment was too heavy, the full orchestra frequently drowned the single voice, and when it rose on the ear it lost much of its serious effect in the gorgeous accompaniment. Mr. Schroeder played marvellously, but his full, round tones rarely rang with that prayerful shade that touches to the quick. Koi Nidrei was largely applauded. So were the symphonic variations by Boellmann, an exceedingly fine selection, full of a variety of melodies, of graceful and pretty connections, of charming interludes. Grace and melody prevailed in them.

"The Afternoon of a Faun" followed. One of the most charming musical pictures has been given here by Debussy. He has painted with sunlight in his score. All that the name suggests, sylvan solitude, shady trees, dimpling pools, and a warm luscious atmosphere are in the strains of this music, and in the simple animal appreciation of it by the faun. It was a calm, richly colored picture in which the rustle of the woods, the flash of the stream, the hum of insects has been painted. The composer resorts to no extraordinary means, gives one no musical surprises. And yet a strange, queer atmosphere is created, and one feels the lazy sunlight creep through one. The animal well being, not romance, is the motive of the music, the glint and glitter, the shade and repose, make themselves felt in the strains.

The final number was Liszt's "Preludes." This has been rendered here repeatedly, and it is a splendid example of the master's larger compositions, between a symphony and a mind picture. Gorgeous in style, splendid in invention, magnificent in emotional changes, and full of sentiment, it captures the ear and soul. The meaning is found in Lamartine's words that this life is but a prelude to the next. It gives a series of pictures from man's course, ending with a military phase of great splendor. The Liszt was played gorgeously, with vivacity, color, romantic intonation and profound feeling. Liszt music has come into its own lately, though Theodore Thomas used to play it up to its significance years ago. The romanticism of the master is modern but full of poetry.

In this number there are passages that recall all his glory, the broad prayerfulness of his oratorios, the wild and changeful spirit of the rhapsodies, the melodious mastery of character-symphonies. And, as picture succeeds picture, and novel strains sweep aside the conventional melody, the audience yields to the charm. Liszt works with all the resources of the orchestra, and a certain savage independence of melody, a willful breaking of harmonies, a sweep of the resources of composition. And again he sings with great sweetness and with singularly distinctive effect. "The Preludes" won the ear as always before. And they won the heart in measure. The orchestra played them magnificently. One can hardly do them violence. It was one of the great renditions of the Bostonians, this number. It was alive with the changeful, highly colored and forcible style of the master. The audience applauded it again and again, and called Conductor Fiedler to the stage repeatedly.

POST,
NOVEMBER 21, 1911

LONGY CLUB

Last night in Jordan Hall the Longy Club of players on wind instruments, assisted by Alfred de Voto, a pianist of consummate skill, gave the first of their present series of three concerts in Jordan Hall. The programme presented compositions by Louis Diemer, the pianist and pedagogue of Paris (first time here); a posthumous quartet of Rimsky-Korsakoff (first time here), and Mozart's Serenade, op. 11, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons. A delightful treat it was, this serenade. The playing, as is the general rule at these concerts, was characterized by extraordinary musicianship, precision and beauty of tone. When Mr. Longy, the oboist, and Mr. de Voto played L. Diemer's sonato for oboe and piano, it is no wonder that the audience applauded and applauded until the pianist also arose to acknowledge his thanks. There are no words for such oboe playing, and the piano part was treated in as masterly a manner as that of the wind instrument. Mr. de Voto is, in fact, an ensemble pianist second to none who are before the public of this country. If he touches the most commonplace figure he turns it to gold. As for the Diemer sonato, it is a very genial and well worked out composition, and aside from its performance, the piece gave great pleasure. Rimsky-Korsakoff's quintet for flute, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano is not so interesting. It has delightful moments, but as a whole is formal and spun out in its substance. A posthumous work, it should have been left on the shelves. The audience was of good size and very enthusiastic.

[73]

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
NOV 14 19[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

PLAYING OF BEETHOVEN'S "EROICA SYMPHONY."

Conductor Fiedler's Command of His Musicians.

ALWYN SCHROEDER, 'CELLIST, THE SOLOIST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at the Parsons Theater last evening before an audience of tremendous size. Time was in Hartford when a great orchestra played to but a comparatively small number of people but that time, happily, is past and an announcement of a concert by the splendid Boston orchestra is sufficient in itself to dispose of all the seats in the theater regardless of what is to be played or of solo performer. The audience last evening heard magnificent playing though there have been programs that made stronger appeal; Mr. Fiedler's interpretations were masterly and his control of his artists was absolute.

Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," first on the program last evening, came as a novelty to most of the people present for it has not been played here more than once in the last twenty years. Whether or not the work was inspired by the genius of Bonaparte is of no consequence now but the work itself is, and Hartford was fortunate in having an opportunity to hear so splendid a rendition. Mr. Fiedler's reading was brilliant, but the brilliance was of the kind that radiates light rather than gives the impression of hardness, and every loveliness of phrase and melody was shown. In the first movement the tremendous power of the composer's idea as expressed in repeated notes and chords was made apparent and the wonderfully impressive funeral march lost none of its strength because the conductor permitted some flexibility of tempo and rhythm in his rendition. The gayety and brightness of the brilliant scherzo were given effect in light tone except in the contrasts of the last few measures and the theme of the finale was played in most charming grace and clearness; the climax was full of tonal power and impressiveness. The symphony, great as it is, is not one of the greatest in its effects on an audience; and probably because of this the work is only played occasionally in comparison with the number of performances of the Fifth, Seventh and Eighth. But it is good to hear all the Beethoven symphonies—and it is doubly good to hear them played as was the Third last evening.

Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, known here so many years as 'cellist in the Kneisel Quartet as well as a leading player in the orchestra, was the soloist last evening, playing Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Boellmann's "Symphonic Variations" for violoncello and orchestra. In both numbers Mr. Schroeder's splendid art shone at its best and when opportunity offered the audience expressed its full appreciation of his work. The exquisite voicing and expression of the Hebrew ritual melody showed the player's powers in one form and the grace and beauty of melody in the second number were as brilliantly revealed. The orchestra, of course, was one with the soloist in brilliance of performance.

The Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" was beautifully played in all its charms of tonal sweetness, strange intervals and quaintness of rhythm. The work has been given here before but it is one that may often be enjoyed and Mr. Fiedler played its floating measures with the same sureness of touch that he displayed in the splendid rhythmic swing of the Lizst "Les Preludes" that came as the final number on the program. Here, almost for the first time in the evening, the full power of the orchestra's tone was shown and every measure was played finely and brilliantly. There will be more Lizst played this season than is usual—on account of the centenary of the composer—and it seems the fashion to speak slightingly of much of his work; but Lizst, played as he was played last evening, is always worth hearing.

Mr. Fiedler was warmly greeted when he first came on the stage and there was applause at every opportunity during the evening. The audience was of fine musical quality and the orchestra's playing was fully appreciated. Some of the music lovers who sat on the right in the theater would have found more pleasure in watching Mr. Fiedler's conducting if a very glaring bunch of lights, carelessly set on the stage, had not practically blinded them; many were compelled to enjoy the music with eyes closed.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for Monday, January 15, with Harold Bauer as soloist.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 18, 1911

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, GRIEG AND SIBELIUS

With Mme. Schumann-Heink Singing, Too—The Gloomy Pleasure of the Russian's "Scheherazade"—Grieg's Amiable Little Variations — Sibelius's Sprightly Out-of-Door Overture—The Wise Singer and Her Discreet Artistry

The captious cavillers at music that is "all color" may not wisely reproach Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." If they do, and if they are human, then are they stifling their own sensations that they may show their superiority to the rest of us not with the pleasure of the music. For the first time in three years, Mr. Fiedler revived the Russian's "Symphonic Suite" at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon and read it freely and glowingly, as his way often is with opulently romantic music. The suite gives the orchestra many opportunities to prove its technical skill and its responsive feeling; it stimulates the men for its own sake, too, and they played it with a luscious magnificence or a delicate sensibility of tone. Music and performance carried the audience with them. Not a leaf in the distracting or the soothing programme books stirred, while at the end the applause was heartier and more general than even Mme. Schumann-Heink and her singing could evoke later in the afternoon. Grieg's fanciful little variations on an old Norwegian tune seemed paltry and pretty beside this palpitating panorama of the Orient, and Sibelius's overture "Karelia"—no remarkable piece in itself—was no more in comparison than a well-imagined set of tunes. Before the end of the season Mr. Fiedler purposes to play Rimsky-Korsakoff's other Oriental piece, "Antar," long unheard at the Symphony Concerts. He likens it to "Scheherazade." May it prove so and may an audience that thrilled to the familiar music have speedy opportunity to hear the unfamiliar.

If all the Russians could have written as Rimsky-Korsakoff does in "Scheherazade;" if he could always have written in such vein; and if they and he could have devised imaginative schemes so meet for it as this oriental fantasy, then they might almost have invented a new sort of music. Of course the dry-as-dusts cannot pardon Rimsky-Korsakoff. This bearded, spectacled, benignant old professor dared through a suite forty-five minutes long to ignore counterpoint almost altogether—dared to do so when was quite able to interweave melo- and fragments of melodies and when had the scholarly precedent of all little Leipzigs in all the pedantic rmanies behind him. The barbarian— write such a suite and then merely ansform his melodies, re-dress them rmonically, vary them rhythmically nd most of all clothe them in subtle or agnificent instrumental colors, and play with endless ingenuity and agination upon these tints. And the low—as the leathery Herr Professors have admitted to themselves—could ent melodies. That which character- Scheherazade as the narrator—the violin usually plays it against the rp—is imagined very felicitously. It charming in itself; it is characteristic its subject and its purpose. As happy, froit and beguiling are the twin themes the young prince and the young prin- who sat in the garden and talked of love—or rather let a whole orchestra talk for them. As such conventional matters go, it is not fair to despise the quid and tossing sea-motive, and who ith the mixture of humor and senti- ent that ought to be human nature and th a fancy or two of the Orient at the ck of his head can resist the drone of e tale of the Kalendar. It seems to out of some courtyard of Bagdad re the story-teller sits. Up through arrow street it comes; other sounds n Oriental thoroughfare interrupt it; it cannot be long stilled. If Sche- zade had such a voice no wonder she the sultan attentive for a thousand ts and one night besides. d invention, imagination, design and e rest of the finely exacting faculties go to the making of music shine gh this "Scheherazade." Of course ct designs a symphony, a sonata, an re. The composer does not merely notes on the page out of a happy tonal ... But intellect goes also into the of such a panorama in tones as y-Korsakoff was composing—as a r might compose his decoration for ur walls of a great Oriental hall. In- n and imagination devised those es, gave them their intrinsic beauty eir expressive voice, and then set to hancing, the adornment, the varia- them in all the tints of a multifari- hestra. Let them who will imagine terms of polyphony and go unchid- long as they escape dulness. Let em who will—and can—imagine in ms of instrumental coloring and go unreproached, especially when they nt such frescoes in tones as Rimsky- off achieves of Sindbad's voyage the fete at Bagdad; and then set tle panels of quieter beauty between scene of the youthful lovers and add such humors as the telling of the r's tale. "They sat in the gar- talked of love," and the music is t as the air that blew over them. e could not have been a jot more us than the orchestral telling. They in Bagdad—the fortunate East had science—and Sindbad's ship did nd smash in the storm by the bronze n. Then suddenly the watchful tilled Scheherazade's voice. It is yn, the awakening, and we that the Orient of Haroun-al-Raschid thousand nights were applauding ctor, an orchestra, and a com- er, who had written full-bodied, ooded, hotly colored, glowingly pic- usic. The Orientals have no com- the Russians, when they write as Korsakoff does in "Scheherazade." doubtless more expert substi-

And tiny-voiced, short-breathed Grieg seemed very tiny and fitful indeed beside this magnificent Muscovite. Once upon a time the Norwegian wrote a set of variations for two pianos on a Norwegian folk-tune. In the last months of his life he scored the piece for orchestra, and once and again the orchestras now play it. The theme is a cool, wistful, little musical period, and out of it Grieg fancies thirteen happy little variations. He was no bearded barbarian, like Rimsky-Korsakoff, but he had not much more regard in these variations (and in most of his other music) for the leathery pendants on their academic chairs. He is almost as indifferent to counterpoint in this particular piece as Rimsky in Scheherazade. The variations are little more than flitting fancies. They come, they go, less like moods than flecks of moods, and mubh more like whimsies than scholarly exercises in music. The instrumental choirs toss figures to and fro; they dance to many sorts of rhythms; the harmonies run fancifully; there is graceful play with instrumental timbres. When the variations are lightest they are most amusing. Grieg, "majestic" in horns in unison or building up a swelling climax, is not so entertaining. At the end, quite as though it were a Norwegian Scheherazaade, the orchestra sings over the old tune, and lets it die as though composer and band were done with their play. It is more than a trick to write this lightly fanciful, this amiably wistful music. There is a kind of imagination in it. When Grieg does not overtax it till he gasps—and the variations escape by their brevity—he is often charming in it.

Seemingly, there is a Sibelius of high and stern imagination, as in the symphonies; of high and melancholy imagination as in "A Saga;" of well-conceived and well-made occasional pieces like "Finlandia" and even of mellifluous salon music like the "Valse Triste." The early overture "Karelia," with which Mr. Fiedler ended the concert yesterday, is of the occasional Sibelius and even then it is neither mechanical nor savorless. The wise in things Finnish explain that Karelia is a province of Finland and that the Karelians are more sprightly of body and mind than are other Finns. Hence the spirited, rhythmically alert melody, with a little catch to it and a queer tang, as of fresh wind and pale sunshine, that returns again and again in the overture and gives it zest and color. It is amusing to hear and to follow; it is "different" like all Sibelius's themes from the regular thing in the regular way. It may or may not be Karelian, but it is pleasantly jaunty. Moreover, it will not long endure the contrasting plaintive melody, and so Sibelius can find no occasion for bleak and sombre music. The sun shines through this overture as may be it shines in Karelia. It has made Sibelius robustly fanciful too. There is open air and quick and spontaneous spirit in the overture. Intellect did not fret it more than it fretted "Scheherazade" and the Norwegian variations—on Grieg, as usual—strayed on the house.

Mme. Schumann-Heink is wise with the discriminating wisdom of many years in opera house and concert hall. She distinguishes among occasions and audiences; she chooses her music and her way of singing carefully for them. Give her an audience that expects the big voice, the big emphasis, the large manner, and she will bestow them as generously and wholeheartedly as she can. Beforehand, moreover, she chooses her music accordingly. Not so when she is summoned to sing at the Symphony Concerts. Then she elects other music—Andromache's Lament from Bruch's magnified cantata, "Achilles," and orchestrated songs by Wagner, Schubert and Liszt were her pieces yesterday—and lets a discreet artistry order all her singing of them. Except in Andromache's vision of a falling Troy there was no occasion for the big voice in these "numbers," and then large and sweeping tones seemed to cost the singer some labor. Elsewhere, and to a finer pleasure, her tones were soft, full, admirably sustained, transparent to every reflection of the course and the mood of the music. Andromache's lament is sombre musical speech, gravely, a little monotonously anguished until it bursts into the prophetic frenzy of the close. It is a little smoky. It needs such utterance as Mme. Schumann-Heink gave it to release and clear but not exaggerate its emotion. The low-voiced ecstasy of Wagner's song of "Dreams" again suited the subdued quality of her tones and her emphases. Schubert's "Young Queen" bears orchestration less well, but again the singer avoided all temptation to overdo her music. Her tones reflected but did not force its contrasts. As for Liszt's song of the gypsies, her voice and the voice of Mr. Witek's violin bore equal part in it. The strangeness of the music and the picture were in both, and the one and the other easily overcame the relentless intervals. Mme. Schumann-Heink may rely less upon her voice now than she once did. The discrimination, the sense of musical and emotional values, the subdued intensities with which she sang yesterday are surer and finer means. Yet, for a while, like other unaccustomed things, they may lessen the applause.

H. T. P.

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York Ci

Date NOV

BEETHOVEN'S "EROICA"

BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, signalized the end of its first visit to New York for the season by giving a beautiful exposition of Beethoven's great third symphony—the "Eroica." It also played with exquisite grace Debussy's dainty prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Mme. Schumann-Heink again was the soloist. In fine voice, she presented three songs by Schubert—"Die Junge Nonne," "Tod und das Madchen," and "Der Erlkonig," and the spring aria from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah." There was a crowded house.

Ork, 1884

AMERICAN

NOVEMBER 19, 1911.

SCHUMANN-HEINK IN SUNDAY CONCERT

Noted Singer to Be the Soloist at First of Symphony Pension Fund Concerts.

The first of the two concerts given annually for the benefit of the pension fund institution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night. The dates of these concerts are necessarily movable becau so much depends upon getting a soloi and the soloist's convenience must alway be consulted.

For this first concert Madame Schumann Heink has offered to give her service, a she did for the pension fund concert fo years ago in Dr. Muck's last year.

The offer is all the more gratifying t the members of the orchestra, in that i is voluntary on the part of Madame Schumann-Heink, coming without suggestion. When she was here two weeks ago rehearsing for her series of concerts with the orchestra she asked if there was to be a pension fund concert this year, and said that she wanted to sing at one.

With Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist the opportunity was too valuable to miss to give a concert of Wagner music. Certain excerpts from the music drama seem to belong solely to her and these she is going to sing next Sunday night. The first of these is the Erda episode from the fourth scene of "Das Rheingold." The second, Waltraute's Narrative from the first act of "The Dusk 'of the Gods." These will be bracketed together as the first number. The second number will consist of two parts. The first will be the orchestral setting of Wagner's song, "Dreams;" the second, Adriano's recitative and aria from "Rienzi."

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 18, 19

HAROLD BAUER TO PLAY AT SYMPHON

Schumann-Heink Will Pension Fund Soloist. Witek Recital.

Harold Bauer will be the soloist at next week's Symphony concerts. He will play the Schumann concerto. In Mr. Gericke's last year of service Mr. Bauer played the concerto here, the last time in fact that it has been played at the Symphony concerts, and the success won by this artist was one of the most notable events of the season.

Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program one novelty, the "Overture to a Theme of a Spanish March," by Balakireff. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D minor.

WAGNER PROGRAM

The first of the two concerts given annually for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to take place in Symphony Hall Sunday night, Nov. 26. For this concert Mme. Schumann-Heink has generously offered to give her services.

With Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist the opportunity was too valuable to miss to give a concert of Wagner's music. Certain excerpts from the music drama seem to belong solely to her, and these she is going to sing next Sunday night week. The first of these is the Erda episode from the fourth scene of "Das Rheingold;" the second, Waltraute's narrative, from the first act of "The Dusk of the Gods." These will be bracketed together as the first number. The second number will consist of two parts. The first will be the orchestral setting of Wagner's song, "Dreams;" the second, Adriano's recitative and aria from "Rienzi."

The orchestra will play the prelude to "Lohengrin" and to "The Mastersingers," the funeral music from the third act of "The Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

LONGY CLUB

The first concert of the Longy Club will be given in Jordan Hall on Monday evening. Mr. Longy has placed on the program two novelties. The first consists of two pieces for oboe and piano by L. Diemer. This will be played by Messrs. Longy and De Voto. The second is a posthumous quintet by Rimsky-Korsakoff for flute, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano. The first number on the program will be Mozart's "Serenade," No. 11, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 21, 1911.

LONGY CLUB IS HEARD IN CONCERT

Lovers om music spent a highly enjoyable evening in Jordan Hall last night while the Longy Club gave its concert of chamber music for wind instruments.

In a large variety of selections that were rendered with excellent skill and technique, the performance of this organization, which strives to uphold the beauty of the wind instrument which so many forget in their admiration of the violin, attained a perfection that has never been passed by any of its kind in years.

The audience was composed of typical music lovers of Boston. Under the leadership of their well-known conductor, the players outdid all previous efforts and covered themselves with glory.

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I. NOV 11 191

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second Boston symphony concert in rovidence will be given in Infantry hall n Tuesday evening, Nov. 21. The soloist ill be Madame Schumann-Heink, and is will be the only appearance this sea- n in Providence of the admired con- alto. Her selections will be from Wag- r's music dramas, Erda's scene from Das Rheingold," Waltraute's narrative om "Gotterdammerung" and Adriano's ia from "Rienzi." The orchestral num- rs will include Schumann's "Spring" mphony, Bossi's Intermezzo Goldo- ani and Gilbert's comedy overture on egro Themes.

The sale of seats for this concert opens Steinert's next Saturday morning.

Estabi 1884

From

Address

Date NOV 1 0

MUSIC LOVERS TURNED AWAY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at Carnegie Hall, N. Y.

Esta 1884

Turning away real money at the box office before an orchestral concert is something that doesn't happen very often in this music deluged city, but that is what happened at Carnegie hall, Thursday night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first New York concert, says the Herald. It was the beginning of this orchestra's twenty-sixth year of visiting, and if the fire commissioner was not so strict in enforcing the "no standees" law there would doubtless have been a small army of music enthusiasts banked behind the brass rail.

Max Fiedler, conductor, is filling the final year of his contract with the orchestra, and as he stepped on the stage a warm and noisy welcome greeted him from all quarters of the auditorium. His program represented modern and dissonant Germany in its first half, beginning with Max Reger "Comedy Overture" and followed by Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Tharathustra." Both works are hard nuts to crack for any orchestra, but the Boston Symphony last night simply took the bit in its teeth and ran away with the difficulties.

Enrico Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," the next orchestral number, offered vivid contrast by its pleasing melodiousness. The fifth movement of the "Serenatiana" was so exquisitely played that there were insistent demands for a repetition, which was not granted. Weber's jubilant "Oberon" overture brought the orchestral part to a joyous close.

The soloist was Mme. Schumann Heink, contralto, and American citizeness. She looked radiant in a light blue gown, her corsage bedecked with enough medals to flatter a general. There is a touch of gray noticeable in the hair of this eminent singer, but her bearing and voice deny that charge of Father Time.

She sang Andromache's "Lament," from Max Bruch's "Archilles," with admirable dramatic feeling, and gave a spirited interpretation of Liszt's "Three Gypsies." Her remaining number was Wagner's "Dreams." She aroused her audience to prolonged applause and many recalls. After the Liszt song she tried to share honors with A. Witek, who had played the violin obligato, but he declined, so she smiled, shrugged her shoulders and accepted the applause alone. It was, all told, an interesting program, beautifully played and well sung.

POST, NOVEMBER 19, 1911

in Symphony Hall, Harold Bauer, pianist, soloist: D minor Symphony, Cesar Franck; piano concerto in A minor, Schumann; Overture on a Theme of a Spanish March (first time) Balakireff.

Pension Fund Concert

Sunday evening, Nov. 26, in Symphony Hall—Symphony Pension Fund concert, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink volunteering her services as soloist; Wagner programme: Prelude to "The Mastersingers;" Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods;" Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan"; Erda's scene from "The Rhinegold"; Waltraute's Narrative from "The Valkyrie"; Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal"; "Dreams" with orchestral accompaniment by Weingartner; vocal excerpts from "Rienzi"; "Tannhauser" Overture.

[74]

TIGHT BINDING

JOURNAL— NOVEMBER 18, 1911

SCHUMANN-HEINK CHARMS AS OF OLD

Great Contralto Appears With Symphony Orchestra.

There has yet to rise up a contralto who can match Ernestine Schumann-Heink in breadth of style, in beauty of technique and in that power of interpretation which is second nature to the true artist, and never fails to impress an intelligent audience. What are bushels of flowers, such as any singer might be able to purchase, compared with the heartfelt and prolonged applause offered to Mme. Schumann-Heink at the Symphony matinee after her singing of Andromache's mighty lamentation, as set to music by Bruch, and after that inspired delivery of the saint, final alleluia in Schubert's pathetic song of "The Young Nun?"

No other contralto draws an audience which, like yesterday's, fills Symphony Hall. Those who recalled former performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's splendid suite, "Scheherazade," were glad to see it leading the program. In this wonderful composition are to be found "the hum of prayer, the trilling of birds, the thrilling of harp and lute, the shrilling of pipes, the pitching strains of the professional almah, and the minstrel lay," such as Burton mentioned in his picture of ninth century Bagdad; and more than that, too, for the bassoon reproduction of the story of the kalandar prince, the charming romanza which brings before the mind's eye Prince Kamar al-Zaman and the Princess Budur, and the realistic yet harmonious movement describing the wreck of Sindbad's ship on the magnetic rock, are prominently and captivatingly featured.

A glorious set of moving tone pictures—and in this instance gloriously played. The audience simply would not stop clapping until Conductor Fiedler had tired of bowing himself, until Concert Master Witek had bowed for his exquisite announcement on the violin of the oft-repeated "Once Upon a time," and until at last the entire band stood up. Yet some folks will continue to say that these Symphony matinee audiences are slow and cold.

The dazzling "Arabian Knights" number set a standard which Mme. Schumann-Heink well maintained in her impressive rendition of the lament from "Achilles." Later the famous soloist sang Wagner's "Dreams," the Schubert song about the dying nun and Liszt's sprightly song, "The Three Gipsies."

There were two novelties on the program, Grieg's "Old Norwegian Romance with Variations" and Sibelius's "Karelia" overture. There were many agreeable moments in the former and the latter was comparatively cheerful—for Sibelius.

TRAVELER, NOVEMBER 16, 1911.

Mr. Fiedler has placed on his Cambridge Symphony programme of this week the works of two local composers. The piece of Gilbert's played in the Symphony concerts in Boston last season is to be given; also a ballad for contralto and orchestra, by Chadwick, is to be sung by Lillian Ormond. The Gilbert symphonic poem is built around a group of negro melodies, some of them full of the pathetic melancholy of the negro folk song, others the negro dances, that bristle with the unquelled and unquenched spirit of the race. These melancholy outbursts of negro song, that seem ever to be unfinished, always reaching and crying out for harmonic solution, like the outreaching and longing of the race that gave them birth, are wonderful material for a symphonic poem. Only the race that has had its soul almost crushed out of her cries out in poetry and song. The stifled sob of man or of a people has given the world all its great poetry and music. The exiled and imprisoned Dante wrote the "Divine Comedy," not Dante that lived in quietude and prosperity. Mr. Gilbert's orchestration of some of these negro folk songs brings out their pathos and their beauty.

Mr. Fiedler, who has always been most generous in his recognition of American composers, is this season to place several American compositions on his programmes. They are not as [illegible] announced, different ones being under debate and consideration. Last season he played Currie's "Atala" and Chadwick's symphonic suite, which won the prize offered for orchestral works by the National Federation of Musical Clubs.

Mr. Fiedler in his programme for the first Symphony fund concert expresses his belief in Boston's love for Wagnerian music by making it a Wagner evening.

GLOBE— NOVEMBER 21, 1911.

FIRST LONGY CONCERT.

Wind Instrument Choir Plays Delightfully Here—Repeated Recalls in Jordan Hall.

The Longy Club gave its first concert of the 12th season last night in Jordan Hall. The personnel is as follows: Messrs Maquarre and Brooke flutes, Longy and Lenom oboes, Grisez and Mimart clarinets, Hain and Lorbeer horns, Sadony and Mosbach bassoons and De Voto piano.

The program consisted of three pieces, Mozart serenade II, in five movements, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; L. Diemer, romance and intermezzo, op 35, for oboe and piano, and Rimsky-Korsakow, quintet for flute, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano.

The serenade is thoroughly Mozartean in favor, the flourish of playful pomposity in the opening measures of the allegro, the archness of the minuets, the tenderness and grace of the contrasting and songful passages, and the spontaneity with which each measure flowers into its successor, now to satisfy anticipation with a sequence, now to pique it by the surprise of some new caprice.

Here observance of form implies no labor. It is music to afford refreshment, and did so last night, for Mr Longy and his colleagues played it with appreciation. The first movement and the minuet in particular were in the vein.

In the two new pieces played by Mr Longy and Mr De Voto, Diemer, a teacher of piano in Paris, has snown a pretty fancy and a gift for graceful melody. The opening theme of the first movement has distinction, is apt for the solo instrument and is heard further enriched in the piano.

In the intermezzo the composer started out well, but in the development of the middle section, lost his grip, became scattering in speech, and forgot that the oboe's happiest moments are those of song.

Mr Longy played the two little pieces with exquisite art, especially the first. There was tonal beauty, delicacy of nuance and finesse of phrasing. Many of those who attempt to sing would do well to listen to the art of this man upon an instrument that lacks the flexibility and the range of color of the voice, and yet sings in his hands with surpassing vocal loveliness. Mr Longy and Mr De Voto were recalled repeatedly to the stage.

There are posthumous pieces that might better repose in the grave with their creators than be revived to bear their name. The Rimsky-Korsakow is tediously prolix and given to endless and idle repetitions in attempted development of themes which are dry and without significance. There is meager suggestion of the brilliant Russian of fertile invention of the "Scheherazade" suite. The andante contains a songful theme for horn of possibilities when properly phrased and the rondo betrays some imagination, but is needlessly long.

The Mozart showed more clearly the qualities of this unique choir of players, containing masters of their instruments. The acoustics of Jordan Hall are favorable for them, and will be realized more perfectly, for last night the final resolution of a diminishing phrase was sometimes lost. There was an audience which filled the greater part of the hall and applauded heartily. The next concert will occur Monday, Jan 1, 1912.

SCHUMANN HEINK IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Mr. Fiedler made an interesting and varied offering in the Symphony programme played at yesterday's rehearsal. It opened with the symphonic suite "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night") by Rimsky-Korsakoff and contained two novelties, "Old Norwegian Romance," with variations, by Grieg, and the "Karelia" overture of Sibelius. Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist, singing Andromache's "Lament" from Bruch's "Achilles," and a group of songs—Wagner's "Traume," Schubert's "Die junge Nonne" and Liszt's "Die drei Zigeuner."

The "Scheherazade" is a very dramatic story told in narrative form, without pretense of dramatic excitement. It relates smoothly and melodically the tale of the Sultana Scheherazade who, to save her life, tells one stirring or romantic story after another to her husband, the Sultan Schahriar, who married his wives but to kill them.

The orchestra made each story lucid and clear cut. The solo violin played by Mr. Witek was picturesue and ingratiating, but somewhat indecisive, particularly in the narration of Sinbad's ship, when played over against the harp.

Of the novelties, the Sibelius Overture savors somewhat of band music, although it has a poetic melody of much lyric beauty. The Grieg Romances with its variations, 13 in number, after all lacks variety. The closing Adagio was by far the most worth while. Mme. Schumann-Heink sang as she has not sung for a Boston audience in some time. The resonance and purity of her upper tones and her breath control were remarkable, while her artistic handling of her songs was, as always, satisfying in the extreme.

TRAVELER, NOVEMBER 18, 1911. [75]

TRANSCRIPT— NOVEMBER 20, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

"SCHEHERAZADE" AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Joy of the Untroubled Hearer in It—The Rising Mr. Gilbert—The New Contralto of the Year—Mr. Dippel's Fortunes in Philadelphia—The Composers Have No Typewriters—Manufactured Applause—Mr. Baklanoff Engaged for Vienna—Mr. Beecham, Strauss and New York

SCHEHERAZADE, played again and warmly applauded at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, was music for the man who insists upon enjoying and not knowing why. If that man could ever get complete control of our concert halls and opera houses there would be a renaissance of amazing vitality, as when the Church got complete control of European music in the sixteenth century, or when the revolutionists got complete control of Russian literature in the nineteenth. Such a renaissance would do many things—crude, flamboyant, unprincipled things—but it would be a return to the conditions under which the phœnix of art re-arises from the ashes of its dead self. Whether such a consummation is desirable at present depends upon whether you consider modern music decadent or crescent, but if it is then the frame of mind induced by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" in the one which will vitalize it.

As on Friday afternoon, the Russian symphonic suite overshadowed all the rest of the programme, even Madame Schumann-Heink, who sang a remarkable group of songs with her finest common sense. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a genial old gentleman, with a face covered with smiles and whiskers, beams down on us, saying: "Now I am going to tell you a story." Technically he is a naval officer. But he sees the joke of being a cog in a stupid bureaucracy, surrounded with artillery and mediæval manifestoes. It is rather silly to shoot men down with big guns, but it is great fun to build up whole magical cities with music. Of all the neo-Russian "big five" Rimsky felt least the call to evangelize the world with the Russian folk-song. He wrote easily,, happily, too often thinly. But in "Scheherazade" he was at his best—a healthy, buoyant, story teller. Not for nothing had he experimented in "radical" chords with the protesting brass band on his warship, while the ocean heaved with its epic swell about him. No composer, not even Rubinstein, has written of the sea as he has. It is all there—the swell, the waves, the splash and the sense of an unseen power. And as for the prince and princess in the garden—why, here you have reality, the kind of reality that strong men and women will have time for when they have finished with their nursery play of big battleships and imperial ukases.

All this you may realize in "Scheherazade." You sit back and live it, and when you are told that it is not polyphonic you find the remark about as pertinent as though one were to complain that the wireless telegraph machine neglects to make use of the primary currents from its electric coils. The obvious answer is, "What of it? Any fool can be correct; it takes a man to be interesting." And besides, it is evident that with Rimsky, who had to squeeze in his music in odd hours of governmental service, there was no time to con learning for its own sake. If he had been a little man, he would have been obliged to do so.

So the man who insists upon enjoying and not knowing why, was master for a time. One can imagine so many interesting things if his mastership were continued and complete. We should certainly lose our æsthetic aristocracy. But we might also be rid of our æsthetic despotism.

H. K. M.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Mr. Gilbert's Progress

AS the signs go, Mr. [illegible] "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" to make it known, as he made known Mr. Strube's overture, "Puck," to the public of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in other cities. He played the piece at Cambridge last Thursday; he is likely to repeat it at other concerts in New England; and he may even carry it on one of the monthly "trips" of the orchestra to New York. The overture is beginning to be known by reputation, and no audience, probably, can be quite so much surprised at its freshness, vigor and generally pleasurable qualities as was that which first heard it in Symphony Hall on a Friday afternoon last spring. The listeners at Cambridge heard it amusedly and applauded it heartily; and there is no reason to doubt that other audiences will be as pleased and especially when Mr. Fiedler uses the overture for the "brilliant final number" that he likes. Moreover, the music bears repetition well. The negro melodies keep their freshness and tang; the handling of them seems as fertile and vigorous as it did at first, and the whole overture has a freedom, an incisiveness, a pervading "go" that are rare in the music of American composers. No doubt Mr. Gilbert took thought when he wrote and rewrote it, but he has skilfully hidden all sign of this labor, as he is never academic.

ADVERTISER, NOVEMBER 21, 1911

LONGY CLUB CONCERT DREW LARGE AUDIENCE

WHICH WAS THOROUGHLY ENRAPTURED BY ARTISTS

Posthumous Quintette by Rimski—Korsakoff the Most Ambitious Number of Varied Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Serenade, for oboes, clarinettes, horns and bassoons.

L. Diemer. Two pieces for oboe and piano. Op. 35.

Messrs. G. Longy and A. De Voto.

Rimski-Korsakoff. Quintette, for flute, clarinette, horn, bassoon and piano.

The concerts take place this season in Jordan hall, and gain much thereby, for there were certain "dead" places in the old Chickering hall where even the best playing would sound dull-toned. The Mozart serenade brings back to mind that a serenade in the 18th century was really a short orchestral suite, often very lightly scored, but closely akin to the partita. This composition too, is historically important, since it shows one of the earliest examples of good use of the clarinette.

In spite of the fact that Handel experimented once with the clarinette, it is to Mozart that the world owes the introduction of this important instrument into chamber-music and the orchestra. He did not, to be sure, grasp all the meaning of the new instrument; the glories of the Chalumeau register, spectral and foreboding, were sealed to him; these were first exploited by Weber and Mendelssohn; but in this work, and in his E-flat symphony, he gives the clarinette a good push into the orchestral scores.

The serenade is for a double quartette, there being two of each of the instruments in the score. It is not a real octette however. It had five movements, of which the adagio and the second minuet were the best. Its finale had a rollicking theme, not unlike the German student's song: "Was kommit dort von der Hoeh'."

Louis Diemer is one of the more conservative school of French composers and has shown such a lively interest in the antique school that he is almost a Parisian Pere Gevaert. As he is a pianist it is but natural to find a well-developed piano part in these pieces, which are rather duets than only oboe works with accompaniment. Yet it is evident that he understands the oboe thoroughly also. The oboe literature, or repertoire, is a very restricted one. Handel's concertos, composed so long ago, are still the chief works in the field. Schumann's Romances for the oboe are beautiful music, but almost unplayable upon the instrument. Schumann did not understand that the oboist emits his breath very slowly, and must, therefore, be given frequent chances to relieve his lungs by breathing normally. In some parts of the Schumann romances the oboist is almost smothered.

It was the treat of the concert to hear two such artists as M. Georges Longy and Alfred De Voto in ensemble work. What M. Longy is, all Boston knows, and all our readers know. It may be doubtful if his superior upon the oboe exists. But Mr. De-Voto too, is a pianist who is very near perfection in all ensemble work. He never crowds the weaker instrument, and always abnegates himself to the general effect. This he showed also in the Rimski-Korsakoff quintette, but it was more evident in these two beautiful duets.

Although the oboe is not given impossibilities by M. Diemer, the part is nevertheless a very difficult one. But all difficulties vanish when M. Longy is at one end of the tube. Such delicacy of tone, such English-horn-like breadth in the deeper register, such easy phrasing, are an old matter in these concerts, but they awaken ever new enthusiasm, even in the critic. Even the unusual (for oboe) key of E-flat minor, did not seem to bother the artist in the least. The Intermezzo was the ideal of delicacy and was a revelation in sweet oboe work. Both artists were enthusiastically recalled twice.

The posthumous quintette by Rimski-Korsakoff was the most ambitious number of the programme. By the way, it might be of interest to know how to pronounce this composer's name. Many authorities, Russians included, have informed the reviewer that it is spoken "Rimski-Kor-sakoff," but now there comes one of his pupils who assures us that he called himself "Rimski-Kor-SA-koff." The quintette by this nameless gentleman was something worth while. It was not all frenzy, nor wild dissonance, nor did it try to make an orchestra out of a wind quintette. It was glorious melodic beauty combined with much figure development.

Although the work is "posthumous," it was written as long ago as 1876. It is in three movements. Melody is present even from the beginning. Being an early work it is but natural that the young composer should display his knowledge of counterpoint, and there is a strong fughetta in the slow movement, on all the instruments, and one for the piano alone in the finale. There is much horn work in the second movement, from its very beginning, and the instrument was splendidly played.

An odd touch in the finale was a series of cadenzas for each instrument in turn, a technical display of flute, clarinette, etc., in a sort of dress parade. This was no great musical advantage, but it was interesting and novel all the same.

The work was refreshing and comfortably easy to listen to, which is something in these days when the auditor is expected to sit up and work, from one end of a concert to the other. It won applause only in a less degree than the oboe and piano pieces, and deserved it.

Its Andante is a gem. It has a quaint Oriental flavor and much figure treatment. We have spoken of the fine horn-playing; it remains, to speak of the bassoon, which had some very important and beautiful work, especially in a contrapuntal duet with the piano. The contrasts of the movements were sharply drawn and the quintette deserves a permanent place in the repertoire.

The audience last night was a large one—the largest we have ever seen at a Longy [illegible] beginning in au-

Mme. Schumann-Heink Objects to Foreign Opera in English

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink

Wagner, for Instance, Untranslatable, She Says—Likes English Songs.

FAVORS AMERICAN THEMES

Mme. Schumann-Heink, who for the second time has generously offered her services for the concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not a believer in foreign operas being sung in English.

"Especially is this ridiculous in the case of Wagner," she said to a reporter of The Boston Herald during her recent visit to Boston. "Not only are the most of Wagner's operas fundamentally German in theme—as for instance the 'Ring' and the 'Meistersinger'—but Wagner invented his own vocabulary for his operas and even went to the ancient legends and folks tales to find words which are now obsolete and utterly untranslatable, although a certain sense of their meaning may be given. No, by all means let German opera be sung in German, French in French, and Italian in Italian. But this does not mean that I do not like to sing in English. I love to sing English songs and I am perfectly willing to study oratorios in English. Why is it that American composers are not more ambitious to step forward and write American operas based on national themes? Surely the inspiration is not lacking, for there is a wealth of inspiration in the wonderful beauties of nature in America. Why do American composers, instead of being contented to stay at home and develop their art, rush off to Europe and try to imitate what has been done there, in the same foolish way that American millionaires are willing to pay thousands of dollars for a mere little hillside in Europe when they have at their command and at their very door the vast beauties of their own land? When American operas are composed on American themes, then foreign artists may reasonably be required to sing them in English, but for the present let it not be said—as Mr. Bispham has an unfortunate way of saying: 'Everything must be in English! The people want it!'"

No Social—Engagements.

Speaking of herself, the singer said that she considers her voice to be in better condition at present than ever before, while she is in perfect health. These two facts she attributes mainly to her habit of ordering her life entirely with regard to her art. It has been her inflexible rule to refuse all invitations of a social nature nor is her compliance to serve as after dinner entertainment at the houses of the rich to be bought with money.

"I have refused to sing at the houses of New York millionaires who would have gladly paid me $2000 for a few songs," she said scornfully, "but I respect my art far too much to demean myself by singing to a room full of empty-headed, overfed people in the act of digesting rich dinners; people who know little or nothing about art, but are only too apt to imagine that their pocketbooks are an unfailing inducement to artists. No, I respect rich people, of course, if they are decent, just as I do every one else, but love of my art and love for my children have been the two ruling passions of my life, and money has nothing to do with either!"

Furthermore, admirable artist that she is, Mme. Schumann-Heink considers herself—she thinks all artists should feel this—as belonging to the masses and not to individuals. Hence her determination to avoid all social intimacies.

She loves America now almost better than her own country, and confesses herself overcome by homesickness after a few weeks abroad.

"Last year," she explained, "after five weeks I felt so sick that I did not know what was the matter with me. The doctor told me my vocal cords were in perfect condition and that there were no signs of bronchitis. Even a cure did me no good. But the moment I got on the steamer to come home I felt better. My voice and spirits both came back at once. I was seasick, though; ach how seasick! " and she smiled ruefully.

Boston is especially dear to her heart because of the general expressions of sympathy shown her in this city some seven years ago, when, two days before her opening performance of "Love's Lottery," she received the news of her husband's sudden death.

Kindness Experienced.

"I shall never forget how kind every one here was to me at that time," she said with emotion. "It was holiday season, and out of respect to me the theatre was kept closed on Monday evening. But on Tuesday so many of the chorus came to me with pathetic stories of what would become of them and their relatives if the engagement was cancelled that I decided to appear all the same. Well, Tuesday evening came and there was a large audience, but such an audience, ladies in black dresses, and applause and waving of handkerchiefs, and all the time flowers and telegrams and notes of sympathy were being sent me. I especially appreciated a letter sent by one of the boys' colleges here—I am not sure which one—sympathizing with the stern duties of my profession that imposed themselves at such a time, and every evening during my engagement a delegation from the college occupied the front row in the theatre and sent me flowers."

Last summer Mme. Schumann-Heink sang at the Bayreuth and Munich festivals, when she heard Jacques Urlus, the Dutch tenor, who will sing this winter, for the first time in America, at the Boston Opera House.

"I cannot express how delighted I am that Boston is to hear him first. He is a truly wonderful artist. His singing in 'Goetterdaemmerung' last summer was remarkable. He sang it in a way that I had only dreamed it might be sung. He is an ideal Tristan. Then, too, his beautiful voice is strong and full and he loves to sing. He is also very versatile."

Mme. Schumann-Heink has herself had under consideration appearances at the Boston Opera House during the coming season.

SEASON OPENED BY LONGY CLUB

Masterly Performance of Diemer's Pieces for Oboe and Piano.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

Rimsky-Korsakow Selections Are Strong, with Rythm and Tonal Imagery.

The Longy Club gave the first concert of this season last evening at Jordan Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, "Serenade No. II.," for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; L. Diemer, two pieces for oboe and piano, romance, intermezzo, op. 85; Rimsky-Korsakow, quintor for flute, clarinet horn, bassoon and piano.

A large audience was present and gave enthusiastic evidences of its appreciation. The performance was marked by its accustomed finish in the matter of detail, finesse in tonal gradations and generally admirable ensemble playing.

A feature of the evening was the masterly performance by M. Longy of two pieces for oboe and piano by L. Diemer, the celebrated pianist. Of the two the romance was the more pleasing, and, while the composer evidently understood the instrument for which he was writing, they were for the most part only conventionally pretty, but rendered with Mr. Longy's aesthetic skill and delightful interpretation they became interesting and beautiful. The exquisite delicacy of phrasing and unerring sense of proportion displayed by M. Longy might well serve as a valuable lesson to many singers.

The "Serenade," by Mozart, is among his best works. The quintor by Rimsky-Korsakow is a posthumous work. The first movement is somewhat uninteresting and is apparently in imitation of strictly classical form.

The second movement is much more distinctive of the composer and vaguely reminiscent of "Snegoroutchka." Both second and third, in strongly marked rhythms and tonal imagery, are suggestive of the Orient. A feature of the Quintor was M. Maquarre's playing, while in this as in the pieces with Mr. Longy Mr. de Voto played as is his wont delightfully.

Mme. Schumann-Heink [illegible] in excellent vocal condition and made a deep impression by her singing of the songs with orchestral accompaniments. Even Bruch's stilted music was made deep and strong with dramatic import. The force and the dramatic intensity of declamation did not interfere with but was rather the inevitable consequence of clean, admirable phrasing, careful adjustment of values, and above all, sincerity that carried everything before it.

Not all singers would have had the courage to sing the curious song of Liszt's, nor was the song as effective as the music of Wagner and Schubert which had preceded. It may, nevertheless, be as great a song.

The wonder of the "Scherazade" suite is not only the remarkable fascination of the music itself but the economy of the scoring, the endless succession of strange and wonderful colors obtained with an orchestra that could satisfy neither Wagner nor Strauss.

The applause was so hearty after this performance that Mr. Fiedler returned several times to the front of the stage, and finally his orchestra rose with him. Nor was it only Mr. Witek, the concertmeister, who had played some solo passages as only a master can. The recalls of Mme. Schumann-Heink lengthened the concert, for she was called back repeatedly after Mr. Fiedler had mounted his stand to proceed.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 17, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

NEW AND DIVERSE MUSIC BY MR. CHADWICK

His Accompaniments to "Everywoman" in the Theatre and His New Ballad for Alto and Orchestra in a Symphony Concert—The Fitness of the Music to the Play, the More Dubious Outcome of the Ballad—Mrs. Low's and Mr. Seagle's Concert—The Settings of "Aida"—"La Fanciulla" Amended—News of the Dancers

TWICE this week this town has heard music by Mr. Chadwick that was novel to it—his accompaniment to the songs, dances, declamation and action of "Everywoman," that is played nightly at the Majestic, and his Irish ballad, "Aghadoe," for contralto and orchestra sung by Miss Ormond at the Symphony concert in Cambridge last evening. Mr. Savage has given the music to "Everywoman" an unusually large and capable orchestra, as such things go with a play in the theatre, and a painstaking conductor besides. Miss Ormond might have sung the ballad more expressively and Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra might have been far more secure in it. So, perhaps, the music to "Everywoman" seemed more nearly to compass its end than does the music of the ballad. Mr. Chadwick seldom exercises himself in the writing of incidental—or any other—music for the theatre; but he knows the necessities of it. His orchestral accompaniments to "Everywoman" are neither over-insistent or over-intricate. The music is of clear melodic line, of easily apprehended progressions and climax; it has warmth and color; it never clouds the dialogue or cumbers the action; it gives them more vitality of mood than do the playwright's words. The music to "Everywoman" is well-made music, too. The mere routine maker of incidental music reiterates his little tunes, repeats to weariness his plaintive or showy little phrases. Mr. Chadwick writes like a composer who can vary and develop his melodies and give them new aspects to the ear. He writes also with the essential sense of the theatre and in the style of it. His music makes its effects directly and quickly, and it accords willingly with whatever the play demands. Mr. Chadwick is a symphonist, but he can also write the ditties of the New Year's revel in "Everywoman" and write them characteristically. The songs of Conscience are pleasantly wistful melodies, with little scholarly intervals and once and again he turns an instrumental phrase into a whispering echo of the text. There is style in it all.

The ballad of "Aghadoe" as it was sung and played last evening at Cambridge gave less pleasure and seemingly less nearly accomplished its end. Miss Ormond, though the piece was presumably written for her, is at once too pallid and too sophisticated a singer to dramatize poetry and music designed to be of deep and simple emotion, and Mr. Fiedler had not rehearsed too diligently the orchestral interludes between the stanzas of the ballad. John Todhunter wrote in it the lament of an Irish lass for her dead lover. (It was easy to see and almost to hear Miss Allgood of the Irish Players as the eye followed the verse and the ear the music.) He was trapped in the glade of Aghadoe; he was basely betrayed and executed. There is none but the girl to "keen" him in the glen where they once loved. Her heart is sick with the woe of her wailing. The verse runs simply, a little severely, with imaginative echoes of popular ballad and folk-piece. Mr. Chadwick has clothed it with music according to the "common form" for such pieces—the orchestral introduction, the orchestal interludes, the orchestral enforcing and illuminating of the vocal part. He has written with a practised hand, "gratefully" for the voice, skilfully for the orchestra. The music follows the general course, the successive moods of the ballad, without pausing or drying in delineative details. It is elastic, fluent, well rhythmed, duly moody. Here and there in it the sympathetic ear may hear the voice of wild Irish folk-song "keening" the lover lost, dead, betrayed. Mr. Chadwick has less sophisticated than tamed it. His music is appropriately invented, ingenious to each turn of the ballad. The hearer admires the justice of it—but seeks vainly for the emotion.

H. T. P.

POST, NOVEMBER 18, 1911

6TH REHEARSAL BY SYMPHONY

Presence of Mme. Schumann-Heink Fills Hall

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Schumann-Heink was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall when there was held the sixth public rehearsal of the season. Her presence crowded the auditorium to the last seat, and from an early hour a large crowd had waited outside the hall to fill the upper gallery.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang Andromache's Lament, from Bruch's Achilles and these songs with orchestral accompaniments by Mottl and Liszt: Traume, Wagner; Die Junge Nonne, Schubert; and the singular song of Liszt, after Lenau, "Die Drei Zigeurner."

The orchestra played Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scherazade," symphonic suite after "The Arabian Nights," one of the unique samples of originality and perfection of style in all music; variations for full orchestra on an Old Norwegian Romance by Grieg (first time in Boston), and Sibelius' "Karelia" overture, also played here for the first time.

Grieg's piece is a series of tone pictures of varying interest and importance. The composition was first thought out for two pianos, but certain of the variations heard yesterday, such as the fourth, fifth, seventh and eighth, are more than piano music transcribed for a set of instruments. The thought is orchestral, the framework larger than in some other instances.

Grieg's lack of constructive power is shown forcibly in the conclusion of his piece. There, when he would follow the approved method, put a capstone upon his tonal edifice of material developed from what has gone before, he falls hopelessly short, and this struggling finale is a series of little episodes similar to the short variations which have preceded.

Sibelius wrote his Karelia overture in 1893. Karelia is a province of Finland, and the home of the Finnish myth. The people are well spoken of by Mrs. Rosa Newmarch. They are amiable, cheerful companions, also, we should imagine, large-mouthed and flat-flooted. There is nothing especially wrong about the "Karelia" overture. It is cheerful as a cow, and made according to the only au-

[76]

GLOBE-

OVEMBER 18, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Novelties From Sibelius and Grieg Are Played.

Mme Schumann-Heink Sings an Aria and Group of Songs.

The orchestral numbers at the sixth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon were as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"; Grieg, Old Norwegian Romance, with variations, op. 51, and Sibelius, "Karelia," overture op. 10, the two latter for the first time in Boston.

Mme Schumann-Heink was soloist and sang Andromache's Lament from Bruch's "Achilles" and these songs with orchestra: Wagner's "Dreams," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; Schubert's "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Liszt, and Liszt's "The Three Gypsies."

Rimsky-Korsakoff as a young Naval officer may have bemoaned the years spent in voyaging upon distant seas when he coveted every available moment for composition with Balakirev, but it may also have aided to make him a cosmopolitan. Tschaikowsky wrote in his "Romeo and Juliet" and elsewhere with an Italian grace and languor which might have been born under Southern skies, but he never forgot the implacable melancholy of the Slav.

Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote with optimism, virility and a fine sense of color. His touch is sure in dramatic description. He establishes his setting and its appropriate atmosphere with fine mastery and more exquisite imagination than any of his contemporaries of the Russian school.

The "Scheherazade" suite glows with the passion of the Orient, and is redolent with the perfumes of the harem. Whatever were the precise tales which the sultana told her lord to beguile him from his cruel purpose, that of taking the life of each of his wives, matters not. The four here chosen as themes have furnished an inspiration which the composer has developed with admirable fancy.

He does not attempt a laboriously minute program, nor yet approach the vagueness of French impressionism. There are appreciable figures of the elements, the sea, both in majesty and anger, the grotesque recital of the Kalendar-prince, and the airy graces of the alluring sultana, the latter performed with exquisite art yesterday by Mr Witek. The orchestra played and Mr Fiedler conducted with excellent regard for the contrasts and highlighted effects with which it abounds, and at the conclusion of the number were insistently applauded.

Grieg's "Norwegian Romance," first written for two pianofortes, is orchestrated with charm and poetic taste. The ornament is appropriate for the delicacy, refinement and lyric beauty of the style. It is in the contrasting concerts of the variations rather than in the pompous restatement of the songful theme that Grieg in his true vein is revealed.

In Andromache's "Lament," an air to try the powers of a mistress of dramatic song, Mme Schumann-Heink differentiated between the elegiac lamentation and the tragic exhortation to the son and to Ilium. It was a performance marked by breadth and intensity.

Wagner's exquisite lyric song was delivered with a tenderness, a repose, a fineness of sentiment and a withholding, as of an emotion too intimate and precious to be proclaimed aloud. The orchestration is expressive, save for the concluding measures, which intrude.

In the other songs Mme Schumann-Heink exhibited skill in the use of diction in the management of her voice, and in certain effects, as the employment of sustained soft tones, but it would be easy to question her choice of tempo and of rhythmic proportion in phrases both of "The Three Gypsies" and "The Young Nun." In Lizst's orchestration of the latter, the tone quality of the clarinet cannot be said to wholly satisfy in the notes of the peil. The singer was warmly applauded after her group and was recalled repeatedly to the platform.

Sibelius' overture is not marked by the bitter melancholy or grim inexorable daring that stamp the pages of his symphonies and tonepoems. He develops happily a finely rhythmical and martial theme which imparts an air almost of rustic jocosity, and again that of inspiring courage. There is also a songful contrasting subject. For the time he has escaped the twilight and oppression of his barren Finnish moors.

Harold Bauer, the soloist of the concerts next week, will play the Schumann concerto. The orchestral pieces will be Balakirev's Overture on a theme of a Spanish march (first time) and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor.

HERALD.

OVEMBER 18, 1911.

NEW PIECES BY THE SYMPHONY

Grieg's Romance and Overture of Sibelius Given First Performance in Boston.

SCHUMANN-HEINK SOLOIST

Rendition of "Scheherazade" by the Orchestra Worthy of the Organization.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth public rehearsal of t Boston Symphony orchestra, M Fiedler conductor, took place yeste day afternoon in Symphony Hall. me. Schumann-Heink was the loist. The program was as follows: Suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff Andromache's Lament.....Bruch Old Norwegian Romance with variations—Grieg Songs with orchestra—
(a) Traeume.....Wagner
(b) Die junge Nonne.....Schubert
(c) Die drei Zigeuner.....Liszt
"Karelia," overture.....Sibelius

Grieg's Romance with Variations and the overture of Sibelius were performed for the first time in Boston. The Variations, composed for two pianos, were arranged by Grieg for orchestra shortly before his death in 1907. They do not form a closely knit work, nor do they give the hearer any idea of continuity in thought. Thus they are unlike d'Indy's "Istar" or the variations by Brahms on a theme of Haydn. There are 13 of these variations, in which character, rhythm and color are varied so that they are contrasting little pieces, although the contrasts are not strongly marked. The 13th variation is the most elaborate, and it contains an apotheosis of the theme, after which the theme is repeated gently and simply in the manner of the first statement.

Variations Amiable Chatter.

This composition cannot be ranked among the more significant of Grieg's works. The first four variations are only amiable chatter. The fifth, in which the theme is given to horns in unison, has more character. There are pretty variations in minuet and waltz form, but as a whole the composition is not greatly to Grieg's credit either as a poet in tones or as a craftsman. The theme itself has pleasing naivete, and a quaint touch is given to it by the repetition of the closing cadence with a difference in the time.

The overture of Sibelius may have an ethnographical significance, as Mrs. Newmarch thinks; but it is without musical importance. We are informed that Karelia is the southeastern province of Finland; that it is "the stronghold of the national spirit"; that the Karelian peasantry are cheerful companions. These are interesting, no doubt, important facts, unsupported, however, by any evidence in the overture, which is even of less worth than the same composer's "Finland." "Karelia" is music for a brass band in the open air. The chief theme, which is worked to death, is a lusty vulgar tune; the other thematic material is commonplace. The development consists largely of repetitions. The orchestration is thick and monochromatic.

Source of Great Pleasure.

It was a great pleasure to hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous and entrancing suite again, one of the most brilliant examples of romantically imaginative orchestration in all music. It is not necessary for full enjoyment to inquire minutely into the tales of "The Thousand Nights and a Night" that inspired the composer; to ask which of the three Kalandars tells his strange story, or what prince and what princess are characterised, whether they are Kamar al-Zaman, Moon of the Age, and the beauteous Budur; or to question why the ship should go to pieces against the magnetic rock in the same movement with the Festival at Bagdad. Anyone that should insist on these questions would be ready to argue in all seriousness that the tales told by Scheherazade were not reasonable and some of them were probably untrue.

W. E. Henley in a magnificent rhapsody over "The Arabian Nights" said that their poets "stoop the universe to the slavery of a talisman and bind the visible and invisible worlds within the compass of a ring." Rimsky-Korsakoff caught the spirit of the wondrous tales, and vitalized with it the four movements of a suite and made them splendid with the barbaric splendor of the Orient.

Repetition Does Not Stale Motives.

How fortunate was this Russian, who had sailed the seas, in his thematic invention! Constant repetition does not stale the motives, nor is this due solely to the amazing ingenuity of the varied orchestration. The themes themselves are haunting, and in the repetition is the pleasing monotony that gives to oriental music a peculiar charm. There is little or no use of polyphony in this suite; but the rhythmic changes, the variety of orchestral expression, the pervading rhapsodic fervor, the sincerity of the sustained melodies, the constant suggestion of the tales that are as wild and pathetic and cruel as any in "the iron bound, melancholy volumes of the Magi," hold the attention of the hearer as though he himself were listening as the Sultan Schahriar to the sigh-breasted and accomplished Scheherazade, the daughter of the Chief Wazir.

The brilliance of this music may almost be seen, glittering, dazzling; and in this music with all its beauty, its richness, its pomp, its dramatic moments, there is also the reminder of what Henley characterized as the tedium of the East—the realization that the show is only passing. "This is indeed life; O sad that 'tis fleeting." And the Destroyer of Delights and the Severer of Societies, the Desolator of Dwelling Places and Garnerer of Graveyards will soon put an end to the feasting and the laughter, and Sultana and bathman, the voluptuous beauty of Bagdad and the gatherer of fagots will alike be translated to the ruth of Almighty Allah.

Sang with Classic Dignity.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang the lament of Andromache with the classic dignity that did not exclude emotional intensity. By her voice and art and by womanly feeling which gave life and deep expression, she raised Bruch's music, inherently feeble and meaningless, to a height where it was momentarily convincing. She sang the group of songs with fine appreciation of the character of each, though in Schubert's "Young Nun" she erred, if at all, on the side of restraint. Liszt's "Three Gypsies," a strikingly original and effective setting of music to Lenau's poem, was sung con amore, with a dramatic force that was not allowed to become theatrical or extravagant.

The performance of "Scheherazade" [illegible] worthy of this superb or-

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 25, 1911

FRANCK SYMPHONY HEARD WITH PLEASURE

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER'S READING WAS MEMORABLE

Harold Bauer, the Soloist, Gave a Musicianly Interpretation of Every Part of the Work.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. King Stephen Overture.
Franck. Symphony in D minor.
Schumann. Pianoforte Concerto, A minor.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.
Balakireff. Overture on a theme of a Spanish March.

It was a delight to hear the Franck symphony again. The modest Cesar Franck has been called the French Schumann, and it was interesting to hear his work in juxta-position with a large Schumann composition. Were we to define Franck we would call him a French Brahms, for he is much closer to that profoundly intellectual composer than to the very melodic and deeply poetic Schumann. There is a fine melodic sense in both Brahms and Franck, but in both it is dominated by intellectual power. Both studied and studied until every point of the composer's routine was child's play to them. Neither of them was naturally dramatic. Neither of them was intensely given to orchestral coloring. The shortcomings and the great merits of the two are very much alike.

Just as one would find in a Brahms symphony a great deal of ingenious figure treatment, so in this work from the very first there is this kind of development. At the very beginning there is a figure of three notes, which is an old acquaintance, being nothing more nor less than Wagner's "Fate-motif." This fact does not constitute plagiarism any more than the use of the same text by two clergymen would. The treatment of the figure is the thing, and Franck rings the changes on this figure by almost every device known to musicians. It is an intellectual pleasure to the auditor to chase the transformations. Even in the finale this figure returns. As the movement goes on there is another, longer, figure of 12 notes, that is worked up against the short one. The contrapuntal skill here displayed is tremendous, yet there is never anything ascetic or harsh, as one often gets in the ingenious counterpoint of modern Frenchmen. It is no depreciation, however, if we state that not once is the wonderful harmonization that Wagner gives to the Fate-motif attained. With Wagner it becomes the greatest three-chord musical idea ever written. But Franck's first movement is mighty all the same.

The slow movement is overshadowed by this first movement, and still more by the finale, which follows,—for the work has but three movements. This finale, like the finale of Brahms's C minor symphony, introduces subject matter that began earlier in the work. Best of all, in the midst of all the contrapuntal devices here displayed, Franck remains clear, intelligible and beautiful. His followers in France have attained his skill, but not these last-named qualities.

In the first and second movement one may pay tribute to the beauty of the horn-playing. Our first horn is doing some very artistic work in these latter days. The tenderness of the English horn in the second movement must also be recorded. Within this second movement the Scherzo is imbedded, so that there are practically four movements (the regular symphonic number) after all.

But the chief tribute must be paid to Mr. Fiedler's reading of the work. It was something glorious and memorable, something akin to Dr. Muck's reading of the first Brahms symphony a few years ago. And the audience recognized its excellence for there was a most unusual display of enthusiasm both after the first movement and at the end of the work. Recall followed recall and the orchestra was also obliged to rise to acknowledge the continued plaudits. It was all well deserved.

Schumann's concerto was a contrast to the foregoing in its construction. It had far less skill, but more direct emotion and poetry. Its very shape is freer than the ordinary concerto form. Its glorious chief theme dominates everything in the first movement. Schumann called the gentle, poetic and dreamy side of his nature—"Eusebius"—while he named his more radical and virile self—"Florestan." There is rather more of Florestan than Eusebius in this first movement, and Mr. Bauer played it with just that exultant triumph which is often a Schumann characteristic.

But Eusebius steps into the foreground in the delicate intermezzo which follows. Here the violoncello has a most beautiful theme which is accompanied by the piano, and this was very expressively played by the orchestra.

In the transition which follows, the clarinettes blew and bassoons the reentrance of the theme of the first movement with fine shading and then Mr. Bauer plunged into the fiery theme of the last movement. Exquisite was the contrast between the bravura of this and the syncopated mystery of the second theme as it entered in the orchestra. In short all the orchestral support was excellent and it evidently inspired the soloist. The result was a performance that was noble in the highest degree. Mr. Bauer gave a manly and musicianly interpretation of every part of the work. The cadenza of the first movement was Schumannesque in its treatment, not merely technical display. The octave work of the finale was very powerful, but never bangy. There was a clearness and a dignity to Mr. Bauer's performance that was most praiseworthy, and one felt the sense of reserve force, that was a delight in these piano-crashing days. It was the loftiest kind of Schumann-playing. Again the pu[illegible] showed full appre-

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 23, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

PLEASURE, TONE AND RECENT CONCERTS

The Easy Secret of Mr. de Pachmann's, Mr. Zimbalist's and Mme. Schumann-Heink's Hold Upon Their Audiences—Miss Farrar, the Metropolitan and Their Troubles—The Witeks' Dry Evening—The Philharmonic Society and the Pulitzer Bequest—A Conductor's Strenuous Life—A Discovery About Liszt—News of the Opera Houses

WITHIN a fortnight, here in Boston, we have had our pleasure of Mr. de Pachmann's playing of the pianoforte, of Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing, of Mr. Zimbalist's playing of the violin, of the voices of the Symphony Orchestra in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." Forth have come the audiences, buzzing with their comment. What a wonderful pianist Mr. de Pachmann is! How beautifully Mr. Zimbalist plays! What a singer is Mme. Schumann-Heink, and what a big piece is Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-poem! Audiences may have large and warm moods of appreciation; but they lack a varied vocabulary to express them. Perhaps, indeed, they best attest their pleasures by their numbers, their raptness of attention, their clapping of their hands. Inarticulate as they are, they do know that they receive a pleasure from the hearing of Mr. de Pachmann, Mr. Zimbalist, Mme. Schumann-Heink, and the Symphony Orchestra (when it plays as it did in "Scheherazade") that they do not receive from many another singer, virtuoso, or band. It lingers long afterward. They gladly return to it.

There is no need to soar into high æsthetics to find the reason for this pleasure. It is written large and clear. Mr. de Pachmann draws from the piano, orders and shades, an exceeding loveliness of tone. The tone with which Mr. Zimbalist plays is the beauty of sound itself. It is hard to remember when Mme. Schumann-Heink has sung with such regard to quality of tone and such attainment of beauty in it as she did at the Symphony Concerts last week. The richness and the euphony of the tone of the orchestra in "Scheherazade" glorified music that needs little glorification. Another pianist, another violinist, another singer, another orchestra may have characteristic virtues, but each, according to the kind, disappoints unless there is this attainment of beautiful tone. For such a tone is the secret, the end, almost the reason for being for all music and for all those that make it. The average auditor may know little of the technique of violin or piano, of singing or of orchestral playing; but if he has the receptive ear, which is his warrant for listening to music at all, he knows whether the tone it hears is beautiful. Then he "likes" the virtuoso or the singer or the orchestra that gives it to him and returns to them often and gladly. He is also, as he should be, a musical critic in his own right. H. T. P.

Items of the Day

Mme. Schumann-Heink has dropped the orchestral arrangement of Wagner's song, "Dreams," from the list of pieces that she will sing at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Sunday. She will be heard, then, only in fragments of three of Wagner's operas—"Rheingold," "Götterdämmerung" and "Rienzi."

The chief item of the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—Dec. 1 and 2—is Elgar's new symphony, which we shall hear within six months of the first performance in London. Miss Parlow playing Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," will be the assisting violinist, and Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," will end the

PROVIDENCE

NOV [illegible] 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two features stand out prominently in the program arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening. The first is the presence of the greatest of living contraltos, Madame Schumann-Heink, who will make her only appearance here this season.

Madame Schumann-Heink has been singing with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York and in Boston, and enjoying a veritable triumph everywhere. Here she will devote herself to excerpts from Wagner, singing first the great Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," the tragedy of the Trilogy of the Ring of the Nibelungs, and second Waltraute's Narrative from the "Dusk of the Gods." Her third number will be Adriano's aria from Wagner's early opera, "Rienzi."

The second feature will be an extraordinary "ragtime" overture by Henry Gilbert of Boston. This was played with enormous success by the orchestra in Boston last spring and Mr. Fiedler is going to use it much this coming winter.

Mr. Gilbert belongs to that young group of American composers who are devoting themselves to the development of negro music and he has written this overture on a number of well known negro tunes in which "ragtime," so called, is predominant. It is jolly and merry and at the same time very musical.

The symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat No. 1, his "Spring" symphony, which Schumann wrote in celebration of his marriage to Clara Wieck. The other number will be four parts of the delightful Goldonian intermezzi by Bossi for strings. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Schumann, symphony in B-flat major, No. 1; Wagner, (a) Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," (b) Waltraute's narra-

[77]

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 25, 1911.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Players Share Honors With Conductor Fiedler at Matinee Performance.

To many it seemed at yesterday's matinee that this week's Symphony program is the most enjoyable of all the seven so far offered. Of its four numbers, two alone, the Franck symphony, of which much of the new French music is the direct descendant, and the Schumann piano concerto in A minor, with Harold Bauer as solo performer, suffice to make this week's concerts red-letter events.

The performance of the symphony again showed the breadth of Mr. Fiedler's sympathies. The beautiful work was read with loving care and enthusiasm, and the orchestra seconded the conductor's efforts magnificently. The audience was quick to appreciate the great beauty of the performance—worthy in every respect of the work—and it insisted upon the players sharing the honors with their gifted and generous leader.

Mr. Bauer's performance of the Schumann concerto prompted the reflection that the visit of so well matured an artist, a man of marked temperamental gifts and of commanding artistry, makes up for the continued absence of the greatest pianist of the age. His success, while not so extremely popular as that made in the same work years ago by Joseffy and Paderewski, was uncommon, nevertheless, and thoroughly artistic. It was a performance remarkable for its artistic reserve no less than for its romantic feeling and its technical perfection. At its conclusion Mr. Bauer was recalled enthusiastically several times.

Balakireff's "Overture on a Theme of a Spanish March" proved to be a highly colored and entirely interesting novelty. The program unexpectedly began with Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture.

NOVEMBER 23, 1911

By EDITH BURNHAM.

WE are to have the first Symphony Pension Fund concert of the season on Sunday evening. The presence of visiting orchestras in our city emphasizes the superior personnel of our own orchestra to a very great degree. Listening to it weekly, and accustomed to the perfection of its players, we are apt to take it for granted that all metropolitan orchestras are made up of the same quality of artists—which is not true. A recent editorial in the New York Sun disparaged the creating of the new popular Symphony Orchestra in that city—which was organized merely to bring symphonic music within the reach of the music lovers who could not afford the higher price symphony concerts, and was not designed as an artistic perfection—saying that New York would do well to throw overboard its own existing orchestras, even the Philharmonic and New York Symphony, and depend upon the Boston Symphony's visits to that city.

The ground for this statement of the Sun editorial writer was that in this orchestra alone, so far as this country is concerned, do we have approximate perfection. This was scarcely a public-spirited attitude when viewed from the New York end, and hardly a fair discrimination when directed against the popular production of symphonic music, which is so much needed in this country, but it is most satisfying evidence to a Bostonian of justifiable pride in his own orchestra.

PENSION FUND MEANS GOOD ORCHESTRA.

The ability to maintain a body of players such as we have depends on a large variety of things, but upon none more than the maintenance of a pension fund. The term of years in which it is possible for a man to handle his instrument with sufficient skill to play in a symphony orchestra of high standing is necessarily short compared with the time in which similar years of preparation would fit him for in any other field of art. For the players of wind instruments the term is set at 10 years at the outside. This means a comparatively early retirement from an orchestra demanding such a standard as our own.

At present, and for many years, if not generations to come, we shall have to import, or at least recruit, our symphony orchestras in this country from Europe. Our advance in instrumental music, so far as native players are concerned, is far less than in vocal, and if we are to have the production of symphonic music we must lure artists from other countries.

The pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its fair compensation assured players on retirement, is the lever of the organization. That is why we can send out an orchestra to all the other large cities in the country which they await with eagerness from year to year.

Mme. Shumann-Heink, who has so many times sung with the orchestra, has offered her services a second time for a pension fund concert, and will appear twice on the all-Wagner programme which Mr. Fiedler will present. Mr. Fiedler's Wagnerian programme of one of last season's pension fund concerts will be remembered with pleasure by many.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEWS

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date NOV 1 4 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the second Boston symphony concert, which is to be given in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening, will open at Steinert's music store, Saturday morning. The soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink, whose only appearance in Providence it will be this season.

Madame Schumann-Heink will sing three Wagner excerpts, the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's Narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi." The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's symphony in B-flat No. 1, the Goldonian intermezzo of Bossi and Gilbert's comedy overture on Negro themes.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date NOV

Boston Symphony Orchestra Sale.

The sale of seats for the second Boston Symphony concert with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist opened this morning at Steinert's music store. There are only a limited number of seats available and those purposing to go to this concert will do well to apply early.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the second Boston Symphony Concert, which is to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will open at Steinert's music store Saturday morning. The soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, whose only appearance here it will be this season. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing three Wagner excerpts, the Erda Scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltraute's Narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods" and Adriano's aria from "Rienzi." The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony in B-flat No. 1, the "Goldonian Intermezzi" of Bossie and Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes."

Estab 84

From JOURNAL

Address PROVIDENCE

Date NOV

MADAME SCHUMANN-HEINK will make her only appearance here this season at the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Week before last Madame Schumann-Heink sang with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York, and yesterday and the day before she sang with it in Boston. A week from to-night she is to be the soloist at the pension fund concert of the orchestra in the same city.

On Tuesday night she is to devote herself to Wagner, singing three songs in which she has been most brilliant. The first will be the Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," wherein Erda, the earth-goddess, appears in the last scene of the prologue of the Nibelungen Trilogy, warning Wotan against keeping the fateful ring which rightfully belongs to the giants, Fafner and Fasolt. Her second will be Waltraute's narrative from the first act of "The Dusk of the Gods," the final episode of the Nibelungen tragedy. Siegfried, on going in search of further adventures, has left Brunnhilde in her mountainous home and given into her keeping the fateful ring, which he had won in battle from the dragon, Fafner. The well-being of the gods depends upon its return to its original possessors, the Rhine-daughters, and Waltraute, one of the Valkyries, pitifully begs her sister to give back the ring to the Nixies, that the curse may be raised from the gods in Walhalla. She tells how Wotan, surrounded by his gods and goddesses, sits waiting for the end of their rule. Her third aria dates back to Wagner's early period, while he was still influenced by Meyerbeer, and is purely an operatic aria.

The symphony will be Schumann's beauteous "Spring" symphony in B-flat, No. 1, which is really Schumann's wedding song, having been written at the time of his marriage to Clara Wieck. The other orchestral numbers will be Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani" and Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes. The "Goldoniani Intermezzi" for strings are delightful little dances written in memory of Goldoniani, the great Italian dramatist of the 18th century. Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes is a work by a Boston composer, in which he uses familiar "ragtime" and treats it in a symphonic fashion. It attracted much attention when played in Boston last year. The order of the programme is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1; Wagner—(a) Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," (b) Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung," Madame Schumann-Heink; Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi;" Wagner—Scene, "Just God," and aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Madame Schumann-Heink;" Gilbert—Comedy overture on negro themes.

GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 25, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Harold Bauer a Pianist of Rare Attainments.

Orchestra Plays Franck's Symphony With Great Beauty of Tone.

The program of the seventh Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Beethoven, "King Stephen" overture; Cesar Franck, symphony in D minor; Schumann, concerto in A minor for piano, Harold Bauer, soloist; Balikireff, overture on a theme of a Spanish march.

This overture, played yesterday for the first time in Boston, contains a theme given to Balikireff by Glinka, who had picked out the young Russian to succeed him in his endeavor to establish a national school of composition. According to a note upon the score, the author, in writing it, was mindful of the persecutions endured by the Moors in Spain at the hands of the agents of the Inquisition.

Neither the so-called "Oriental" first theme, which was original with Balikireff, or the second, which was the one Glinka gave him, have pronounced character, nor has the composer made more out of them than mere repetitions in various instruments and keys. The chants of the monks and the sounds of the organ are heard in lucid moments of choral suggestiveness, but the "popular rejoicing" is the disorganized din of the crowd. Balikireff has written an overture on Russian themes and a symphonic poem, "Tamara," which show more invention.

Harold Bauer's performance of the Schumann concerto should rank among the salient musical events of the season in Boston. Not often are temperament and intelligence blended in as fortunate proportion. Here is an art which does not make the piano merely an instrument for the dissemination of learning, nor does it run off on a tangent with this or that sentiment or emotional idiom. Yesterday this admirable pianist played with sanity, with repose, with a virile and masterful, though quiet authority, which suggested that he might have played Chopin, Liszt, Debussy, MacDowell and given to each an individuality.

Mr Bauer has retained and increased his power to grasp a composition, its symmetry of design, its import of feeling, its distinctive traits, its varying styles of speech, whether narrative, declamation or poetry. With what simplicity he rounds the curve of a phrase into a balance and proportion that seems its inevitable expression! He differentiates between accompaniment and melody without copying his melodic line after a steel engraving. He gives a just value to bravura, dash, verve and rhythmical integrity, and to cantabile the voice of lyric song.

Some may say he used too much the soft pedal in the slow movement. He drew from the piano its intimate confidence, as from one who spoke not for all, but for a trusted friend to hear. There was a tranquil, a subdued tonal color that suited the hush and intimate charm of these exquisite pages. The closing movement was spontaneous in its brilliance, even as the andante had been in its communion. The whole performance was marked by a technical mastery, plastic, subservient, and under the control of an unerring sense of proportion, a poetic imagination, and a fine musical intelligence.

Although Mr Bauer was recalled a number of times, his audience was less demonstrative than it has been in times past over prima donnas with graces and modish raiment.

Mr Fiedler is to be thanked for playing Franck's symphony as often as he does. There is not a page in this score across which a ray of sunlight and the blessed joy of living has not fallen. It is music which now gently exhales, and now proclaims with glad exaltation the sweetened, chastened spirit of the humble teacher who toiled with pupils faithfully and cheerfully, in an epoch of fickleness, blogtry and veneer, creating this noble symphony, one quartet and one quintet, which uplift the soul, teach of things spiritual, and prompt the pondering of the eternal mysteries, whenever they are performed with understanding as the symphony was yesterday.

The orchestra played with unfailing regard, individually and as an ensemble, for the symmetry of the work as a whole, for the clear exposition of the motives which make the movements one, and for euphony and color of tone.

Next week Elgar's new symphony in E flat, No. 2, will be played for the first time in Boston. It was produced, the composer conducting, during the musical congress last Spring in London at the same concert, May 24, which brought Bantock's "Dante and Beatrice" into the light. It was performed yesterday, and will be repeated tonight, by the Cincinnati Orchestra, for the first times in America. The soloist here next week will be Kathleen Parlow, and her number, Bruch's "Scotch" fantasy. The other orchestral piece will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

POST, NOVEMBER 25, 1911

Balakireff at Symphony

Russian's Overture to King Stephen Presented for First Time Here Yesterday Afternoon

BY OLIN DOWNES

Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen," Cesar Franck's Symphony, the Schumann piano concerto, and a new overture on the theme of a Spanish march by Mili Balakireff, made up the programme of the seventh public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra this season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Horald Bauer was the soloist.

The Balakireff overture was heard for the first time here. It is said that Balakireff had in mind the Moors and their expulsion from Spain by means of the Inquisition, that he thought of their oriental character when he made his opening theme, that in turn he conceived of the chants of the Spanish monks "the pyres of the auto-da-fe, with the ringing of bells and the rejoicing of the populace."

The theme of the Spanish march was given Balakireff by Glinka. He finished his overture in 1886. We need not concern ourselves with the nonsensical programme. The music is the thing. True, it has furnished the composer an excuse for the expression of his own savagery. His overture is vulgar, brutal, if you will. And yet, O staid matrons and bankers, there are men like this mad, vodka-ridden music man as valuable to the cosmos as you or I.

War! From the East and the West, the North and the South, blood, rum, the slaughtering of hordes. It was James Huneker who remarked, in his "Anarchs of Art," that music was ever the playground of great free souls; that a revolution could be incorporated in the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. And so yesterday in Symphony Hall an eminently respectable audience listened unawares to atrocities much higher, in the ladder of crime than the worst moment, for instance, in the debarred "Salome" of Mr. Richard Strauss, and they were none the wiser.

The performance was masterly and splendidly unpolished. If music of this kind is to be heard, let us hear it at its own worth. For 15 minutes yesterday rum and rebellion ruled in Symphony Hall. Vulgar? Alas, yes! And it is from such soil that the lilies spring.

Mr. Bauer gave an admirable performance of Schumann's concerto. If he sentimentalized certain passages, the blame was not wholly his. Schumann's music is seldom free from a certain German sentimentality. Yet the concerto takes rank as one of the loveliest of the compositions extant for piano and orchestra. It is a real piano concerto. It is no modern symphoric poem, wherein the pianist, given a sort of obligato part, fights against overwhelming odds with the orchestra. Schumann's concerto is intimate chamber music, and Mr. Bauer proved that he appreciated this. His pianism was worthy of the highest praise, and so was the rare combination of poetry and analytical logic in his conception. He was recalled many times with great enthusiasm.

Mr. Fiedler gave what was on the whole a very sympathetic reading of the Franck symphony, a work which seems to have grown upon him since he performed it here last season. This was especially true of the opening movement, which was very impressive, plastic in its rhythms, in the pulse and the moulding of the beautiful phrases, and symphonic in the greatest meaning of the term. Possibly the return of the music of the introduction, now in canonic form, would have been made more striking and proportionate by a slightly slower tempo, and certainly the pace taken in the second movement was a little too rapid and the coloring too vivid for the mood. There is a prevailing rich but monochromatic color in Franck's music, especially the orchestral music, which does not depend for its effect upon high contrasts of light and shade or accent. So the second movement lost a little of its mystic atmosphere, while the finale, which was also a little brighter and more vivid than Franck's native self, became exceedingly effective by means of Mr. Fiedler's brilliant and dramatic treatment.

The movement is in itself the least solid of the three, but it has passages which confound one with awe and emotion, especially the re-entrance, with the greatest pomp and splendor, of the melody of the slow movement, and the concluding pages, then the double basses, having descended to an F-sharp, setting upon a persistent basic figure, which suggests somehow the swinging of vast portals; the trombones calling at intervals and the rest of the orchestra responds with fragments of earlier themes, as they pass in review, and the final burst of radiant, blinding light.

How simple this work is, how sensitive in its harmonic scheme, how basic in its structure! Yet the great appeal of this wondrous music is its broad humanism, its eternal piety, its perpetuation of the beatitude that Franck loved so well, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

[78]

HERALD, NOVEMBER 25, 1911.

LONG PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

Fine Performance of Franck's Symphony in D Minor—Work by Beethoven.

HAROLD BAUER RETURNS

His Playing of Schumann's Concerto Refined and Polished.

By PHILIP HALE.

The seventh public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Harold Bauer was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Symphony in D minor.....Franck
Concerto for piano.....Schuman
Overture to a Theme of a Spanish March.
Balakirew

The overture to "King Stephen" was put on the program the day before the public rehearsal. The concert would have been long enough without it. Any concert of an hour and a half is sufficiently long, and any piece played after an hour and three-quarters falls on sated and dull ears. Yet it was pleasant to hear Beethoven's music again. The overture was last played at a Symphony concert in April, 1901.

King Stephen was a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown,
He held them sixpence all too dear;
Therefore he call'd the tailor lown.

But Beethoven's overture was composed for Kotzebue's prologue, "Hungary's First Benefactor," who was canonized because he was the first to bring his country under Christian domination.

The overture is chiefly noteworthy on account of the treatment of a little Hungarian theme, or at least a theme of Hungarian character. The composer Beethovenized it, and all through the overture there are evidences of a sportive mood. He was invited to provide music for the play, but he could not for the life of him write merely occasional, perfunctory music.

The performance of Franck's symphony was on the whole impressive and stirring. The audience was deeply moved, for the applause after each movement was spontaneous, hearty and prolonged, and at the end Mr. Fiedler was recalled two or three times. How different the reception when this symphony was played here in 1899! To many the music was "unintelligible"; to some it was anarchistic, even "immoral." Yet the work was as beautiful, as noble, as eloquent as it is today. And so in time Vincent d'Indy's symphony in B flat major will be fully appreciated in this city and placed with Franck's among the greatest works of the kind, if not the greatest, after the symphonies of Beethoven. There are supreme qualities in Franck's symphonies that are not to be found in the symphonies of Schumann, Brahms, Tschaikowsky. Now and then there is a page in a symphony by Bruckner that has a lofty imaginative flight and suggests visions of things celestial, but the page is as an oasis in a desert, for Bruckner's technical skill was far inferior to that of Franck, and he had little continuity of thought. As far as workmanship is concerned, Franck's symphony stands fully abreast of Beethoven's, and like Beethoven's this symphony is profoundly human in its spirit and expression. Music of infinite compassion! Music of abiding faith and love!

It is a dangerous compliment to say that any pianist has made a certain composer peculiarly his own. Mr. de Pachmann is not merely an incomparable interpreter of Chopin. Mr. Bauer is not merely an admirable interpreter of Schumann. He is remarkable when playing compositions by Cesar Franck and the more modern Frenchmen, and we all have heard him play music by Handel in the true spirit, as though he were improvising, now pompously, now singing a tender air, and now displaying agility in rapid passages shaped in the approved mould of the period. Furthermore, if a pianist is constantly told that he is above all others an interpreter of this or that composer, he may finally fall into disturbing mannerisms or cherish resentment against the god who is said to favor him. Mr. Bauer's performance of Schumann's concerto has been praised here, as elsewhere, and deservedly.

Yesterday there was again an exhibition of fine qualities; purity of thought, clarity of expression, warmth that was not too sensuous, a romantic spirit that was lyrical and not mistakenly epic. And Mr. Bauer did more than give delight by a noteworthy display of polished mechanism, fluent, crystalline runs, delicate nuances in color and dynamics; he established and maintained the intimate relationship between the composer and the hearer, without which Schumann stands aloof and refuses to confess his thoughts, reflections, aspirations. Yet there were moments in the first movement when Mr. Bauer was more sentimental than Schumann.

Balakireff's overture was played here for the first time. It is a singular, barbaric piece, professedly oriental, undeniably coarse and at times as blatant as though it had been written in vulgar western circus style. Seldom is there a fine thought; seldom is there anything that charms the ear or stirs the soul. Balakireff had in his mind a program: the Moors persecuted by the Spaniards, organ music, the chant of monks, and general jubilation at an auto-da-fé. He himself was priest-ridden, superstitious, a bigot, as Tschaikowsky and others inform us. Was he in his heart pleased at the recollection of the festivals when Jews and infidels were burned alive? Or did he look on the ceremonies only with a view to musical delineation, to panoramic music?

We have yet to hear orchestral music by Balakireff that justifies the opinion of his ardent admirers who claim for him a commanding position among the Russians. Moussorgsky surely had more native genius, crude as his expression was, Borodin had a finer nature. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a gorgeous colorist. Will not Balakireff be known in future as a merciless critic of his friends' work and a helpful influence?

The program of the concerts next week will include Elzar's symphony No. 2 (first time in Boston); Bruch's Scottish Fantasie for violin (Miss Kathleen Parlow); Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

GLOBE—
NOVEMBER 27, 1911

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Mme Schumann-Heink Gives Her Services.

Great Artist Surpasses Herself in Emotional Power of Her Singing.

A concert for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last night. There was an audience filling every seat, and some stood along the outer aisles of the floor. It was an audience fully in the spirit of these concerts, honoring by its presence a great organization which has long honored Boston, and last night attracted also to hear a singer whom the public has long held in admiration, both as artist and as woman.

Mme Schumann-Heink had offered the orchestra her services for the concert, and to a great degree it was her The program was entirely from Wagner. The four numbers preceding the intermission had been orchestral. After it, when audience and players had resumed their seats, Mme Schumann-Heink appeared and there was applause. The members of the orchestra rose to their feet and stood applauding. The handclapping in the audience redoubled and continued. Obviously, the singer was deeply touched, bowing first to the men upon the platform, then to her hearers. It was a moment not to be forgotten, either by those who participated or those who witnessed, a beautiful tribute paid by a great singing actress of our time and a great orchestra, the one to the other.

Mme Schumann-Heink was heard in the music of Erda, the earth goddess in "The Rhinegold," in which she warns Wotan not to withhold from the giants, Fasolt and Fafner, the magic ring, the ransom which they demand for the goddess Freia. The second number was the petition of Waltraute in the "Dusk of the Gods" to restore the ring to the Rhine daughters; her third, the "Just God" and aria from Rienzi.

The singer has not appeared in Boston in recent years in such complete control of all the splendid resources of her voice and art. She sang with a beauty and opulence of tone, a mastery over all the technical devices of the dramatic interpretation of a text, and with a just and profound sensing of the mood. It was deeply moving, and at times made the singer, her voice, and her face in its illumination of the thought, a presence truly majestic.

It would be unfortunate if the concert field should so engross Mme Schumann-Heink that she should not be heard again, and not merely in a few sporadic appearances in Wagnerian repertory in the opera. Where is there one to stand beside her, in the dignity and nobility of her conception, in the hightened vividity and searching power of her diction? Her delivery of the Waltraute music and text was vital with color and emotional power.

After the "Rienzi" an enormous wreath was borne up to her, which occasioned the touch of spontaneous and intimate good fellowship that usually marks some moment of her concerts. The wreath was acknowledged, then swung sturdily over the singer's shoulder, and then there was more applause at the characteristic manner of the exit. Many recalls followed.

The orchestral numbers included the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried's funeral music from the "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolda," the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

The men of the orchestra could not have been other than inspired by such an audience, and they gave of their best. Their tone has never been more golden in its matchless euphony, nor their sense of ensemble and of proportion more unerring. In the concert arrangement of the "Love Death" the orchestra was its own prima donna, and the violins with notes of soaring, spiritualing purity, sang the ascent with impassioned fervor. At the conclusion of the number there was hearty applause for Mr Fiedler and the players, all finally standing together in acknowledgement.

It was a program such as the public hears with gladness and with understanding, for here is music, whatever the message of more recent school or idiom, that speaks to the heart, rich in that beauty which is imperishable, for [illegible]

AMERICAN—
NOVEMBER 26, 1911.

SCHUMANN-HEINK TO AID PENSION FUND

Prima Donna to Be Soloist at Symphony Hall Concert To-night.

All traditions will be overturned if Symphony Hall is not packed to the doors to-night when the first Pension Fund Concert of the season is given. The Pension Fund concerts of themselves always bring out many loyal friends of the orchestra and to-night the programme is particularly attractive because not only will the music be devoted entirely to the music of Wagner but the soloist will be Madame Schumann-Heink, who for the second time within a few years has graciously given her services to this good cause.

Madame Schumann-Heink to-night will sing three songs, the Erda Scene in the last scene of "The Rhinegold," Waltraute's Narrative from the first act of "Dusk of the Gods" and finally the scene, "Gerechter Gott" and air, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from the third act of "Rienzi."

The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "Lohengrin," the Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

At this week's Symphony Concerts Kathleen Farlow, the young violinist who made so profound an impression on the musical public of Boston last Spring, will be the soloist. She will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie. The interest in the orchestral part of the program will centre in the performance of Elgar's Second Symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston. The first performance of the work in this country has just been given by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and on the 10th of December Walter Damrosch is to give the first performance of the work in New York.

This Second Symphony of Elgar's was performed for the first time in London last spring, having been heralded in advance with all the eagerness that greets each new composition in England of the composer. It is written in a light vein and is intended to be decidedly a cheerful, joyous work. Its reception in London was not altogether favorable, the work having caused a great deal of discussion for and against, as seems to be the fate of every new work by a distinguished composer. Elgar is undoubtedly the foremost composer of England and, therefore, every new work of his merits a respectful hearing. The other number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

The following week there will be no Symphony Concert, as the orchestra will be on its regular December trip.

JOURNAL—
NOVEMBER 27, 1911

GREAT OVATION FOR SCHUMANN-HEINK

Singer Wildly Applauded by Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Shouldering a laurel wreath as big as a cartwheel, Mme. Schumann-Heink marched off the stage at Symphony Hall last night in a storm of laughter and applause that furnished a perfect climax for one of the most successful pension fund concerts the Symphony Orchestra has ever held.

Three numbers the heroine of the evening had sung in a program devoted entirely to Wagner. Erda's warning to Wotan, from "The Rhinegold," came first; then Waltraute's story, told to Bruennhilde, of the war god sitting grave and mute on his throne in Walhalla, waiting for the return of the ring that would free the Rhine-maidens from the spell; and then the scene and aria from "Rienzi," in which Adriano bemoans his fate. There was in the delivery of the first two selections the truly Wagnerian power and dignity which have long kept Mme. Schumann-Heink among the foremost interpreters of the composer whose fame is enshrined at Bayreuth. But there was an additional charm about the florid music which Wagner wrote in his youth for the Paris Grand Opera that thawed all reserve.

To cap the enthusiasm came the huge laurel wreath, decorated with the singer's native Austrian colors, offered by the members of the orchestra as a token of their thankfulness and admiration. What to do with the wreath was the question that puzzled her for a moment. Then, with a knowing nod to an audience that filled the hall, she lifted the offering up on her right shoulder and disappeared through the doorway, where Librarian Sauerquell was waiting to help her and congratulate her.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" and to "Lohengrin," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the Good Friday music from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture were the orchestral numbers.

POST—
NOVEMBER 27, 1911

TRIBUTE TO GREAT SINGER

Mme. Schumann-Heink Honored at Pension Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who had volunteered her services, was assisting soloist last night at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, and Mr. Fiedler had arranged a Wagner programme. The hall was filled, and a number stood in the aisles. The programme included the "Meistersingers" prelude, the prelude to "Lohengrin," the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture for orchestra alone; and Mme. Schumann-Heink sang the great scene of Erda from "The Rhinegold," Waltraute's narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods," the scene, "Just God" and aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from the third act of "Rienzi."

Like all of the concerts given for the maintenance of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony, this was a festive occasion, the orchestra playing surely authoritatively, as is its wont, especially in the performance of this magnificent and familiar music. Music which, after the compositions of the ultra-moderns who have succeeded Wagner, seems elemental, classic, antique in its greatness. This is the more remarkable when the extreme richness and the subtle harmonic style of the scores is taken into consideration. But once every few centuries a man is born who bears within himself the seeds of the past and the future, and the music played last night was a sort of apotheosis, not so much of what had passed, as to what has come since Richard Wagner lived, an ungrateful rascal, and died, having brought into existence at least six music dramas, each one in itself a cosmos of tone and of exhaustless vitality.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang Erda's music and the narrative of Waltraute as very few singers now before the public, save herself, can sing it. With the earnestness of one who no longer saw an audience before her, but was deep in converse with the gods, and like a splendid woman with a great voice. The voice lacks great sensuous richness or smoothness of quality, but, had there only been the scene on the stage last night, one would have thought it the voice of Erda, the earth-mother, herself. The lines of Waltraute, lines requiring the greatest thinking and feeling, were fully as impressive. When Mme. Schumann-Heink entered the hall for the first time the orchestra rose en masse to receive her. Well might it, and the large audience present, rejoice in such an interpreter for such an occasion. Enthusiasm was at its height throughout the evening, and Mr. Fiedler, not to be outdone, caused his men to make acknowledgments with him.

HERALD,
NOVEMBER 26, 1911.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

All traditions will be overturned if Symphony Hall is not packed to the doors tonight when the first pension fund concert of the season is given. The program is particularly attractive, for it will be devoted to the music of Wagner, and the soloist will be Mme. Schumann-Heink, who for the second time within a few years has graciously given her services to this good cause.

The fund will not be nine years old until next March, but over 20 pensions are now being regularly paid. While there have been a number of gifts from friends of the orchestra, the great bulk of the fund is drawn from two concerts, and the annual dues paid by the members of the orchestra.

The establishment of this fund by Mr. Gericke was not one of the least benefits he bestowed upon the Boston Symphony orchestra. His was the idea, and it was chiefly from the impetus given by him that the fund stands where it does today. Other orchestras in this country have attempted something of the kind, but in no case have they had great success. The fund is admirably administered, and as time goes on its benefits will become more marked.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing three songs, first the Erda Scene in the last act of "The Rhinegold," wherein the earth goddess warns Wotan to give the ring of the Nibelungs to the giants, to whom it properly belongs, as a part of the ransom of Freia; Waltraute's narrative from the first act of "Dusk of the Gods," and finally the scene and air from the third act of "Rienzi."

The orchestral numbers will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

This evening Symphony Hall should be packed tonight when the first pension fund concert of the season is given. The pension fund concerts of themselves always bring out many loyal friends of the orchestra, and tonight the programme is particularly attractive, not only because it will be devoted entirely to the music of Wagner, but on account of the appearance of Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist. For the second time within a few years she has graciously given her services to this good cause.

Although the fund itself will not be nine years old until next March, such progress has been made that over 20 pensions are now being regularly paid. While there have been a number of gifts from friends of the orchestra, the great bulk of the fund is drawn from two sources. The chief of these is the two concerts given each season; the other is the annual dues paid by the members of the orchestra.

The establishment of this fund by Mr. Gericke was not one of the least benefits he bestowed upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His was the idea and it was chiefly from the impetus given by him that the fund stands where it does today. Other orchestras in this country have attempted something of the kind but in no case have they had great success. The fund is admirably administered and as time goes on its benefits will become more marked.

Madame Schumann-Heink tonight will sing three songs, first the Erda scene in the last scene of "The Rhinegold," wherein the earth goddess warns Wotan to give the ring of the Nibelungs to the giants to whom it properly belongs as a part of the ransom of Freia; Waltraute's narrative from the first act of "Dusk of the Gods," and finally the scene, "Gerechter Gott" and Air, "My Life Fades in Its Blossoms" from the third act of "Rienzi."

The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

JOURNAL—
DECEMBER 2, 1911.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST CHARMS AUDIENCE

Kathleen Parlow Heard in "Fantasia on Scottish Folk-Melodies."

Kathleen Parlow, whom San Francisco claims to have discovered, is this week's Symphony soloist. Like Elman and Zimbalist, she is a pupil of Auer, the Russian violinist, and in spite of her Burne-Jones or Du Maurier appearance, she has more of Elman's vivacity than Zimbalist's somewhat statuesque serenity.

The last time she was here she played the big Tschaikowsky concerto in D major. This time she has chosen Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Folk-Melodies." Zimbalist played the same piece at his recital two weeks ago and made it seem strangely uninteresting. Yesterday, with Miss Parlow's lively spirit and the orchestra's brilliant support, the none too familiar work seemed well worth an occasional revival. There is a little of everything in it—technical intricacy, sentimental simplicity, orchestral solidity. It is not a big work at that, but Miss Parlow and the orchestra managed to extract many appealing qualities. Besides a spirit that showed a racial sympathy for the subject, Miss Parlow again revealed her command of beautiful tone and extraordinary technique. The audience recalled her again and again at the end of the number.

This week's novelty, Sir Edward Elgar's second symphony, which the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra managed to produce just a week ago and so get the credit of a first American performance, proved to be about the flattest offering of the season. Ernest Newman, the English critic, who, in a sense, speaks for the composer, admits that the work has its enigmas. It has, indeed, and little else. There is a semi-ecclesiastical motive toward the end that recalls the pomp which characterized Elgar's first symphony, but generally speaking this tribute to Edward VII. is dull and unprofitable. Yesterday it received applause that was unmistakably perfunctory and polite.

The big number on this eighth program—which will be repeated tonight—is Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," with its melodic opulence and its intensely romantic spirit, interpreted admirably and enjoyed thoroughly by the large audience.

TRAVELER,
DECEMBER 2, 1911.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal and concert next week. The orchestra starts on its second southern trip tomorrow (Sunday), playing in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Miss Kathleen Parlow, who was the soloist at this week's concerts, will be the soloist on this tour.

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 21 1911

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall, with Mme. Schumann-Heink, soprano, as soloist.

Established: London, 1881, ... 1884

From NEWS
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 21 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tonight brings the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall at 8:15 precisely, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as the soloist. The program is as follows:

Schumann. Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.
Wagner. (a) Erda' Scene from "Das Rheingold."
(b) Waltraute's Narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods."
Bossi. "Goldonian" Intermezzi.
Wagner. Scene "Just God" and aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi."
Gilbert. Comedy overture on Negro themes.

Established ... 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 21 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-night will be given the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15 precisely. The programme is as follows: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Schumann; (a) Erda's Scene from "Das Rheingold;" (b) Waltrante's Narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods," Wagner; Goldonian Intermezzi, Rossi; scene "Just God" and aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Wagner; Comedy Overture on Negro Themes, Gilbert; soloist, Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Established ... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From TIMES
Address Cambridge Mass.
Date NOV 18 1911

First Pension Fund Concert.

The first concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, November 26, at 8 o'clock. Arrangements for this concert have just been completed and Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink has volunteered her services as soloist on the occasion. Madame Schumann-Heink gave her services once before, four years ago, for a pension fund concert which was one of the most successful that the orchestra has ever had.

Mr. Fiedler will announce the programme early in the week, but the probabilities are that it will be made chiefly, if not entirely, of Wagner.

Tickets went on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, on Friday morning.

Established ... York, 1884

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date NOV 24 1911

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

Established ... 1884

From INQUIRER.
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date NOV 26 1911

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, who had such great success with the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. She is to play Bruch's "Scotch" Fantasie. The principal orchestral number on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The regular ...

Established ... York, 1884

From COURANT.
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date NOV 17 1911

Pension Fund Concert.

The swift passing of time is signalized by the announcement that the first of the two concerts given annually for the benefit of the Pension Fund Institution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night, November 26. For this first concert Madame Schumann-Heink has generously offered to give her services, as she did for the pension fund concert four years ago in Dr. Muck's last year.

With Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist the opportunity was too valuable to miss to give a concert of Wagner's music. Certain excerpts from the music drama seem to belong solely to her and these she is going to sing next Sunday night. The first of these is the Erda episode from the fourth scene of "Das Rheingold"; the second, Waltraute's narrative from the first act of "The Dusk of the Gods." These will be bracketed together as the first number. The second number will consist of two parts. The first will be the orchestral setting of Wagner's song, "Dreams," the second, Adriano's Recitative and Aria from "Rienzi."

Established ... 1884

From COURANT.
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date NOV 17 1911

Lights and Scenery at the Symphony Concert.

To the Editor of The Courant:—

I note that your reporter of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Bijou Theater last Monday evening, spoke of the annoyance caused by the carelessly placed lights on the stage, and I am glad he mentioned the fact. I sat at the right of the stage and could not see Mr. Fiedler at all, those lights fairly blinded me. And incidentally I nearly froze.

Not far from me there was seated a well-known physician who wore a fur coat most of the evening, and the majority of the women in that part of the theater wore their wraps throughout the concert.

Now the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the very best offerings at the theater during any season and the audience gathered is always of huge proportions, so it would seem that every possible provision should be made for the comfort of patrons. A little care on the part of those who arrange the stage for the concert would make the lighting satisfactory all to players and audience and the ... might easily be sufficiently heated. And one more thing, Mr. Editor, absolutely painful many people who want to enjoy splendid music in proper environment—and that is the disgusting, dirty and inartistic scenery that is used as a setting for an orchestra that ranks second to none. More than one music lover is praying that before the next symphony concert there will be a new set of scenery discovered in Mr. Parsloyhouse.

"Music."

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 25 1911

Boston Symphony At Lyric On December 6

Baltimore is to have the rare privilege of hearing Liszt's great "Dante" symphony at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric on December 6.

Liszt's work occupied the principal place on the program given by Mr. Fielder in Boston in celebration of the centenary of the master's birth. It is in two movements, ending with the female chorus. In the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Philharmonic Chorus of this city.

Equally interesting will be the first appearance here of Kathleen Parlow, the extraordinary young violinist who made such a sensation in this country last season. She will play Saint-Saens' B minor concerto. The other orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

Established ... York, 1884

From EVENING BULLETIN,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 25 1911

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4, with Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, as soloist.

Established: London, ... 1884

From HERALD,
Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 26 1911

The Boston Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 5. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the remarkable violinist, who will be heard in this city then for the first time.

There have been few violinists who have had such astounding success in America as this young Canadian girl. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, and the principal orchestral number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Established ...

ADVERTISER - GLOBE
NOVEMBER 27, 191 - DECEMBER 2, 1

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Usual Capacity Audience Paid Handsome Tribute to Mme. Schumann-Heink, the Soloist.

The first of the two annual concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra gives for the benefit of its pension fund, occurred last night in Symphony hall, with Mme. Schumann-Heink for the assisting artist. The usual capacity-audience at these affairs attested to the popularity of the singer, the orchestra and the all-Wagner programme. For instrumental pieces there were the overture to "Tannhauser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Meistersinger" and "Tristan," the "Good-Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Funeral Music" from the last act of "Gotterdammerung." Madame, the large-hearted contralto, sang arias from "Rienzi," "Rheingold" and the "Dusk of the Gods."

This town, nowadays, hears too little Wagner. The public likes and supports his music as they do nothing else, and yet their craving remains unappeased, except for this single Pension Fund concert, and an occasional poor representation of one of his music-dramas. "Tristan" will receive gala performances at the opera house this season and it is certain to receive strong backing from the audiences. The hearers last night quaffed long and pleasurably at the Wagnerian springs. With an orchestra that is second to none in their rendition of Wagner and with excerpts sung by a masterful interpreter of his music, the familiar pieces were possessed of such power and appeal that they seemed to touch the very limits of emotional and dramatic possibilities, beyond which further advancement is inconceivable. His is no longer the music of the future, and excepting Beethoven, none stirs or strikes with so sure a hand as Wagner. His appeal is universal; all nations and classes will find in him the sublimest expressions of humanity.

Wagner's music wears well. The selections of his works for concert performance are necessarily few, and these are played and replayed each season, yet the audiences do not weary of them. Every pension fund concert is an exhilarating affair and this one received a double portion of inspiration. It was a night of revels for the rabid Wagnerite. Mr. Fiedler's readings were masterly; he neither underdid nor overdid. Every man in his orchestra played as he seldom played before. The volume of applause put the Harvard-Yale game in the shade.

Once again Walter's "Prize Song" fought and won its hot battle with the pompous Mastersingers; and again the remarkable polyphony of this work and Wagner's supreme skill in the handling of these great tonal masses sounded even more spontaneous and marvelous than formerly. The transparent purity of the "Lohengrin" prelude contrasted well with the somber, majestic gloom of the "Funeral Music." Tristan and Isolde were once again consumed by their fiery passion, only this time their agitation was more natural and more in control than is usually the case. The calm tranquility of the "Good Friday" music was succeeded by that masterpiece of masterpieces, the "Tannhauser" overture. Just to think that this piece with its immortal theme should have been termed by some "authorities" as an ill-harmonized chorale without a spark of melody!

Mme. Schumann-Heink discriminates carefully in the choice of her pieces. A Sunday night audience (even Wagner enthusiasts) like to be stunned by explosive tones, and our famous contralto abundantly gratified their wishes. The full power of her magnificent voice she uses sparingly, but when she condescends to do so it shows the same power and brilliance as of yore. Erda's Warning from the "Rheingold," sung wholly in half-voice, was followed by Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung." This is the stormy scene in which Waltraute entreats her sister, Brunhilde, to restore the fatal ring to the Rhine daughters. Every shade of emotion, however slight, was portrayed perfectly by the singer's splendid command of vocal tone-color. Singing-actresses may be the "rage" these days, but give us, every time, Mme. Schumann-Heink with her consummate mastery of the purely vocal side of her art. Adriano's bombastic aria from "Rienzi" showed the singer at her best. The florid music was executed brilliantly, while the fortissimo tones fairly took the roof from the hall. But greater than these was the perfection of the great contralto in her creation of "atmosphere." From the expression of misery and despair at the beginning of her song she took us through moods of resolution, reminiscence, love and honor, finally to a great religious ecstasy. Madame received the usual ovation. Much merriment was caused at the end when she was compelled to carry off on her shoulders a huge floral wreath as tall and even broader than herself.

G. S. M.

NEW ELGAR SYMPHON

First Performance of Work in This City.

Miss Parlow Plays Bruch Concerto With Fine Mastery of Style.

Elgar's second symphony, in E flat, was played yesterday at the eighth public Symphony rehearsal, for the first time in Boston. It is in four movements and occupied between 50 and 55 minutes. The reception given it was not a cordial one; indeed, it is not easy to remember when applause was so perfunctorily brief at any Friday afternoon concert, this notwithstanding the fact that the British press, the usually sane, well-poised and intelligent Mr Newman included, gave devout thanks that the muse had descended once more upon their isle.

To the Briton this symphony may be a repository of noble thoughts, a casket of gems, whose exterior is wrought in rich and graceful design, yet even the Briton himself was present in scant numbers at the repetitions which followed the first production of it at the International Congress in London last May.

The material out of which Elgar builds his work is ordinary, without melodic or rhythmic significance. Now and then one grasps at a musical idea which might flower into something when straightaway the composer strips if of whatever illusive or imaginative quality it may have contained and, through barren and monotonous development by the baldest sequence, beats out the last drop of blood and leaves it a husk, rather than the ripened fruit which is the pride of the husbandman.

In movement after movement the man meanders on, though mediocrity and stuff, uttering the verlest platitudes—worse than that, for a formula has some identity—repeating himself into oblivion, while the hearer gropes through the London fog trying to find an enduring or an impressive thought, a poetic fancy or an appeal to the imagination, unless he be so fortunate as to fold the hands in sleep.

To be sure there is a certain contrapuntal skill displayed, and an acquaintance with orchestral technic, but there is a woeful lack of contrast, both in dynamics and in timbres. The fantasia of the first movement derives a certain exotic effect from the contending tonalities, but it is a labored style, making due acknowledgment to Mr Puccini's version of the whole tone scale, incongruous with the preceding section and approaching the recapitulation as if in great travail.

The rondo begins with brightening hope, which is quickly dispelled by the same heavy hand. Then there are pages of sheer emptiness, or of crass and bumptious bathos, which might imply that humor was an attribute only of bucolic bumpkins and loutish clowns, and yet the only motto which we are permitted in this piece is "joyousness." Mr Fiedler and the orchestra obviously took pains to make the most of it.

Miss Parlow was most welcome, even in Bruch's Scotch fantasia. She played with even a riper and more mature mastery than last year in the superb virility of her style, her brilliant bravura and ravishing cantilena, in the thoughtfulness and dignity of her interpretation of music that is often inherently cheap, and in the ease with which she tossed off technical difficulties. Tschaikowsky's "omeo and Juliet" closed an overlong program.

[80]

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 21 191

...st year abroad.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall, with Mme. Schumann-Heink, soprano, as soloist.

Established: London, 1881, ...k, 1884

From NEWS
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 21 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tonight brings the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall at 8:15 precisely, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as the soloist. The program is as follows:

Schumann.	Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.
Wagner.	(a) Erda' Scene from "Das Rheingold." (b) Waltraute's Narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods."
Bossi.	"Goldonian" Intermezzi.
Wagner.	Scene "Just God" and aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi."
Gilbert.	Comedy overture on Negro themes.

Es ...1884

From ...
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-night will be given the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15 precisely. The programme is as follows: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Schumann; (a) Erda's Scene from "Das Rheingold;" (b) Waltrante's Narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods," Wagner; Goldonian Intermezzi, Rossi; scene "Just God" and aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Wagner; Comedy Overture on Negro Themes, Gilbert; soloist, Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Esta ...884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ...
Address ...
Date NOV 18 191

First Pension Fund Concert.

The first concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, November 26, at 8 o'clock. Arrangements for this concert have just been completed and Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink has volunteered her services as soloist on the occasion. Madame Schumann-Heink gave her services once before, four years ago, for a pension fund concert which was one of the most successful that the orchestra has ever had.

Mr. Fiedler will announce the programme early in the week, but the probabilities are that it will be made chiefly, if not entirely, of Wagner.

Tickets went on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall, on Friday morning.

...rk, 1884

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date NOV 24 191

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

Es ...1884

From ...
Address ...
Date NOV 26 191

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, who had such great success with the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. She is to play Bruch's "Scoteh" Fantasie. The principal orchestral number on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

The regular ...

E ...rk, 1884

From ...
Address ...
Date NOV 18 191

Pension Fund Concert.

The swift passing of time is signalized by the announcement that the first of the two concerts given annually for the benefit of the Pension Fund Institution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night, November 26. For this first concert Madame Schumann-Heink has generously offered to give her services, as she did for the pension fund concert four years ago in Dr. Muck's last year.

With Madame Schumann-Heink as soloist the opportunity was too valuable to miss to give a concert of Wagner's music. Certain excerpts from the music drama seem to belong solely to her and these she is going to sing next Sunday night. The first of these is the Erda episode from the fourth scene of "Das Rheingold"; the second, Waltraute's narrative from the first act of "The Dusk of the Gods." These will be bracketed together as the first number. The second number will consist of two parts. The first will be the orchestral setting of Wagner's song, "Dreams," the second, Adriano's Recitative and Aria from "Rienzi."

Esta ...1884

From ...
Address ...
Date NOV 17 ...

Lights and Scenery at the Symphony Concert.

To the Editor of The Courant:—

I note that your reporter of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Parsons Theater last Monday evening, spoke of the annoyance caused by the carelessly placed lights on the stage, and I am glad he mentioned the fact. I sat at the right of the stage and could not see Mr. Fiedler at all, those lights fairly blinded me. And incidentally I nearly froze.

Not far from me there was seated a well-known physician who wore a fur coat most of the evening, and the majority of the women in that part of the theater wore their wraps throughout the concert.

Now the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the very best offerings at the theater during any season and the audience gathered is always of huge proportions, so it would seem that every possible provision should be made for the comfort of patrons. A little care on the part of those who arrange the stage for the concert would make the lighting satisfactory alike to players and audience and the place might easily be sufficiently heated. And one more thing, Mr. Editor, the absolutely pains many people who want to enjoy splendid music in proper environment—and that is the disgusting, dirty and inartistic scenery that is used as a setting for an orchestra that ranks second to none. More than one music lover is praying that before the next symphony concert there will be a new set of scenery discovered in Mr. Parson's playhouse. "Music."

Est ...1884

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date ...

Boston Symphony At Lyric On December 6

Baltimore is to have the rare privilege of hearing Liszt's great "Dante" symphony at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric on December 6.

Liszt's work occupied the principal place on the program given by Mr. Fielder in Boston in celebration of the centenary of the master's birth. It is in two movements, ending with the female chorus. In the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Philharmonic Chorus of this city.

Equally interesting will be the first appearance here of Kathleen Parlow, the extraordinary young violinist who made such a sensation in this country last season. She will play Saint-Saens' B minor concerto. The other orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

Es ...k, 1884

From EVENING BULLETIN,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 25 191

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4, with Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, as soloist.

Established: London, ... 1884

ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 27, 191

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Usual Capacity Audience Paid Handsome Tribute to Mme. Schumann-Heink, the Soloist.

The first of the two annual concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra gives for the benefit of its pension fund, occurred last night in Symphony hall, with Mme. Schumann-Heink for the assisting artist. The usual capacity-audience at these affairs attested to the popularity of the singer, the orchestra and the all-Wagner programme. For instrumental pieces there were the overture to "Tannhauser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Meistersinger" and "Tristan," the "Good-Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Funeral Music" from the last act of "Gotterdammerung." Madame, the large-hearted contralto, sang arias from "Rienzi," "Rheingold" and the "Dusk of the Gods."

This town, nowadays, hears too little Wagner. The public likes and supports his music as they do nothing else, and yet their craving remains unappeased, except for this single Pension Fund concert, and an occasional poor representation of one of his music-dramas. "Tristan" will receive gala performances at the opera house this season and it is certain to receive strong backing from the audiences. The hearers last night quaffed long and pleasurably at the Wagnerian springs. With an orchestra that is second to none in their rendition of Wagner and with excerpts sung by a masterful interpreter of his music, the familiar pieces were possessed of such power and appeal that they seemed to touch the very limits of emotional and dramatic possibilities, beyond which further advancement is inconceivable. His is no longer the music of the future, and excepting Beethoven, none stirs or strikes with so sure a hand as Wagner. His appeal is universal; all nations and classes will find in him the sublimest expressions of humanity.

Wagner's music wears well. The selections of his works for concert performance are necessarily few, and these are played and replayed each season, yet the audiences do not weary of them. Every pension fund concert is an exhilarating affair and this one received a double portion of inspiration. It was a night of revels for the rabid Wagnerite. Mr. Fiedler's readings were masterly; he neither underdid nor overdid. Every man in his orchestra played as he seldom played before. The volume of applause put the Harvard-Yale game in the shade.

Once again Walter's "Prize Song" fought and won its hot battle with the pompous Mastersingers; and again the remarkable polyphony of this work and Wagner's supreme skill in the handling of these great tonal masses sounded even more spontaneous and marvelous than formerly. The transparent purity of the "Lohengrin" prelude contrasted well with the somber, majestic gloom of the "Funeral Music." Tristan and Isolde were once again consumed by their fiery passion, only this time their agitation was more natural and more in control than is usually the case. The calm tranquility of the "Good Friday" music was succeeded by that masterpiece of masterpieces, the "Tannhauser" overture. Just to think that this piece with its immortal theme should have been termed by some "authorities" as an ill-harmonized chorale without a spark of melody!

Mme. Schumann-Heink discriminates carefully in the choice of her pieces. A Sunday night audience (even Wagner enthusiasts) like to be stunned by explosive tones, and our famous contralto abundantly gratified their wishes. The full power of her magnificent voice she uses sparingly, but when she condescends to do so it shows the same power and brilliance as of yore. Erda's Warning from the "Rhiengold," sung wholly in half-voice, was followed by Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung." This is the stormy scene in which Waltraute entreats her sister, Brunhilde, to restore the fatal ring to the Rhine daughters. Every shade of emotion, however slight, was portrayed perfectly by the singer's splendid command of vocal tone-color. Singing-actresses may be the "rage" these days, but give us, every time, Mme. Schumann-Heink with her consummate mastery of the purely vocal side of her art. Adriano's bombastic aria from "Rienzi" showed the singer at her best. The florid music was executed brilliantly, while the fortissimo tones fairly took the roof from the hall. But greater than these was the perfection of the great contralto in her creation of "atmosphere." From the expression of misery and despair at the beginning of her song she took us through moods of resolution, reminiscence, love and honor, finally to a great religious ecstasy. Madame received the usual ovation. Much merriment was caused at the end when she was compelled to carry off on her shoulders a huge floral wreath as tall and even broader than herself.

G. S. M.

From HERALD,
Address Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 2...

Establis ...

The Boston Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 5. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the remarkable violinist, who will be heard in this city then for the first time.

There have been few violinists who have had such astounding success in America as this young Canadian girl. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, and the principal orchestral number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

GLOBE-
DECEMBER 2, 191...

NEW ELGAR SYMPHONY

First Performance of Work in This City.

Miss Parlow Plays Bruch Concerto With Fine Mastery of Style.

Elgar's second symphony, in E flat, was played yesterday at the eighth public Symphony rehearsal, for the first time in Boston. It is in four movements and occupied between 50 and 55 minutes. The reception given it was not a cordial one; indeed, it is not easy to remember when applause was so perfunctorily brief at any Friday afternoon concert, this notwithstanding the fact that the British press, the usually sane, well-poised and intelligent Mr Newman included, gave devout thanks that the muse had descended once more upon their isle.

To the Briton this symphony may be a repository of noble thoughts, a casket of gems, whose exterior is wrought in rich and graceful design, yet even the Briton himself was present in scant numbers at the repetitions which followed the first production of it at the International Congress in London last May.

The material out of which Elgar builds his work is ordinary, without melodic or rhythmic significance. Now and then one grasps at a musical idea which might flower into something, when straightaway the composer strips if of whatever illusive or imaginative quality it may have contained and, through barren and monotonous development by the baldest sequence, beats out the last drop of blood and leaves it a husk, rather than the ripened fruit which is the pride of the husbandman.

In movement after movement this man meanders on, though mediocrity and stuff, uttering the veriest platitude—worse than that, for a formula has some identity—repeating himself to oblivion, while the hearer gropes through the London fog trying to find an enduring or an impressive thought, a poetic fancy or an appeal to the imagination, unless he be so fortunate as to fold the hands in sleep.

To be sure there is a certain contrapuntal skill displayed, and an acquaintance with orchestral technic, but there is a woeful lack of contrast, both in dynamics and in timbres. The fantasia of the first movement derives a certain exotic effect from the contending tonalities, but it is a labored style, making due acknowledgment to Mr Puccini's version of the whole tone scale, incongruous with the preceding section and approaching the recapitulation as if in great travail.

The rondo begins with brightening hope, which is quickly dispelled by the same heavy hand. Then there are pages of sheer emptiness, or of crass and bumptious bathos, which might imply that humor was an attribute only of bucolic bumpkins and loutish clowns, and yet the only motto which we are permitted in this piece is "joyousness." Mr Fiedler and the orchestra obviously took pains to make the most of it.

Miss Parlow was most welcome, even in Brudi's Scotch fantasia. She played with even a riper and more mature mastery than last year in the superb virility of her style, her brilliant bravura and rarishing cantilena, in the thoughtfulness and dignity of her interpretation of music that is often inherently cheap, and in the ease with which she tossed off technical difficulties. Tschaiowsky's "omeo and Juliet" closed an overlong program.

[49]

From SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

TO PLAY LISZT SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra To Give The "Dante" At Coming Concert.

Baltimore is to hear Liszt's "Dante" Symphony at the next Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric Wednesday evening, December 6.

Liszt's work occupied the principal place on the program given by Mr. Fiedler in Boston in celebration of the centenary of the master's birth. It is in two movements, ending with the female chorus.

In the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Philharmonic Chorus, of this city.

Equally interesting will be the first appearance here of Kathleen Parlow, the young violinist, who made such a success in this country in the past season. She will play Saint-Saens' "B Minor Concerto."

The other orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

Est... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date NOV 26 1911

At Symphony Concert.

A very large and brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening. In the audience were noted Mrs. William Grosvenor, Mrs. S. P. Colt, Miss Rose Grosvernor, Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Harry P. Cross, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. William B Weeden, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hoppin, Mr. and Ms. Frank Hail Brown, Miss Ellen Anthony, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mrs. Henry Bowen, Mrs. Cook of Trenton, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Rev. and Mrs. Frank W. Crowder, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mrs. George Hail, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Miss Amy Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Prof. and Mrs. Albert G. Harkness, Miss Helen Chase, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs Frank G Hall, Mr. E. C. Ostby, Miss Helen Ostby, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Mr. and Mrs. William Ely, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Brayton, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Hunt, Mrs. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dorothy Dempster, Col. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs Ernest Fischer, Mrs. William M. P. Bowen, Mrs. John R. Tillinghast, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr and Mrs. Albert Babcock.

Mayflower Reception.

Establish

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date NOV 27 1911

Social Doings

At Symphony Concert.

A very large and brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall for the second concrt by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. In the audience were noted Mrs. William Grosvenor, Mrs. S. P. Colt, Miss Rose Grosvernor, Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Harry P. Cross, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. William B Weeden, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hoppin, Mr. and Ms. Frank Hail Brown, Miss Ellen Anthony, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mrs. Henry Bowen, Mrs. Cook of Trenton, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Rev. and Mrs. Frank W. Crowder, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mrs. George Hail, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Miss Amy Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Prof. and Mrs. Albert G. Harkness, Miss Helen Chase, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara Hess, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs Frank G Hall, Mr. E. C. Ostby, Miss Helen Ostby, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Mr. and Mrs. William Ely, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Brayton, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Hunt, Mrs. W. W. Dempster, Miss Dorothy Dempster, Col. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs Ernest Fischer, Mrs. William M. P. Bowen, Mrs. John R. Tillinghast, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr and Mrs. Albert Babcock.

Supper for Bridal Party.

Es... 18...

From TRIBUNE

Address ...

Date NOV 2 1911

THE EVENING TRIBUNE, PHI...

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF UNUSUAL MERIT

Orchestral Work Highly Enjoyable and Mme. Schumann-Heink's Singing Delightful.

An even larger audience than usual gathered in Infantry Hall last evening to hear the second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There had been special anticipation of enjoyment in connection with this event because Mme. Schumann-Heink was to be the soloist and something rather out of the ordinary was promised from the orchestra, and this anticipation was not disappointed. The singer is no stranger to Providence audiences and she was assured in advance of the warm welcome she received on making another appearance here. She always captivates her hearers by her charm of personality and she did not fail to do so last night. The audience was enthusiastic over her singing and she was in good voice and sang with the freedom, ease and skill which make it a rare pleasure to listen to her. The orchestra, too, was in excellent condition and under the masterly hand of Conductor Fiedler played with a fire and force and also with a delicacy and smoothness that won for the members of the company heartiest applause.

It was a delightful programme that was presented, opening with Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, known as the composer's spring symphony, and also as his wedding song, as it was written in celebration of his marriage. It is a beautiful production full of the harmony, sweetness and freshness of the spring and also with the joyousness to be expected of a composition written under such conditions, and it was played with the sympathetic feeling and nicety of tone and technique that characterize the work of these musicians. The second orchestral umber was Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi" for strings, of which four parts were rendered. These delightful little dances offered an excellent contrast to the more pretentious work of the symphony and were played in such a manner as to set the pulses tingling in unison with the music. Last of all was Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes, which gave a new note to the work of the orchestra in this city for selections of this sort have never before been rendered here by this organization. It is a novel combination, this rendition of "ragtime" in symphonic style and musicianly manner. The effect is pleasing, however, and these merry, jolly negro melodies in their new dress were enjoyed and gave an unusual ending to a programme of more than ordinary variety.

Mme. Schumann-Heink selected for her offerings three songs from Wagner. First was the great Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," then Waltraute's narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods" and for the third number Adriano's aria from Wagner's early opera, "Rienzi." These three selections were admirably chosen to show the range, power and sweetness the singer's voice still retains, the skill with which she can handle it and the long and careful training which has made her one of the great singers of the world.

The entire programme, both vocal and instrumental, was of that high character and enjoyable quality which those who attend the Symphony concerts have learned to anticipate with the confidence born of experience that they will suffer no disappointment.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date NOV 29 191...

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Dec. 7 and 9. The evening symphony will be Brahms's Fourth. The principal matinée piece will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." 884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From RECORD

Address PHILADELPHIA

Date

—The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, violinist, who had such great success with the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. She is to play Bruch's Scotch Fantasie. The principal orchestral number on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Estab. 884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date ... 1911

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, violinist, who had such great success with the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. She is to play Bruch's Scotch Fantasie. The principal orchestral number on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade." Es... 84

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given at the National on Tuesday afternoon, December 5. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the remarkable violinist, who will be heard in this city then for the first time. There have been few violinists who have had such success in America as this young Canadian girl. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, and the principal orchestral number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Es... 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, violinist, who had such great success with the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. She is to play Bruch's Scotch Fantasie. The principal orchestral number on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Esta 84

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, who will be heard in this city then for the first time. There have been few violinists, it is said, who have had such astounding success in America as this young Canadian girl. She will play Saint-Saens' "Concerto in B Minor," and the principal orchestral number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Establisl

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

The Boston Symphony's second concert of the season is scheduled for December 4 in the Academy of Music. Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, will then play Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie." The chief orchestral number will be Runsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade." Estab 84

The Theodore Thomas Orchestra, of Chicago, under the direction of Frederick Stock, will give a concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 11. This will be the first time that this organization in its entirety will be heard here. Mr. Stock has chosen the following program: Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Jaun"; Elgar's new Violin Concerto, to be played by Albert Spalding, ... in D major.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

MUSICAL NOTES.

Second Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Evening.

Two features stand out prominently in the programme arranged for the second Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. The first is the presence of the greatest of living contraltos, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will make her only appearance here this season. Mme. Schumann-Heink has been singing with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York and in Boston and enjoying a veritable triumph everywhere.

Here she will devote herself to excerpts from Wagner, singing first the great Erda scene from "Das Rheingold," the tragedy of the "Trilogy of the Ring of the Nibelungs," and second Waltraute's narrative from the "Dusk of the Gods." Her third number will be Adriano's aria from Wagner's early opera, "Rienzi."

The second feature will be an extraordinary "ragtime" overture by Henry Gilbert of Boston. This was played with enormous success by the orchestra in Boston last spring and Mr. Fiedler is going to use it much this coming winter. Mr. Gilbert belongs to that young group of American composers who are devoting themselves to the development of negro music and he has written this overture on a number of well-known negro tunes in which "ragtime," so called, is predominant. It is jolly and merry and at the same time very musicianly.

The symphony will be Schumann's in B-flat No. 1, his "Spring" symphony, which Schumann wrote in celebration of his marriage to Clara Wieck. The other number will be four parts of the delightful "Goldonian Intermezzi" by Bossi for strings. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B-flat major No. 1, Schumann; (a) Erda's scene from "Das ... (b) Waltraute's narrative ...

Estabi ... 4

[81]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From Providence R

Address

Date Nov 22 11

Established 1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Interesting Programme.—Mme. Schumann-Heink, Soloist.

The reviewer of musical events not infrequently finds it a convenient expression to describe some particular thing as the "feature" of a concert programme. There was more than one feature to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night, the second of this winter's series. The programme, out of its three orchestral numbers, presented two interesting novelties; the soloist was one who enjoys an extraordinary popularity with concert audiences; and last—but by no means least as a "feature" worth noting—the audience was the largest that ever attended a symphony concert in this city. Every seat in Infantry Hall was taken, thus setting a new record, though the steady increase in the attendance at the symphony concerts during the past year or two has testified to the growing appreciation of these admirable performances. The programme offered last night was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.....Schumann

(a) Erda's Scene from ("Das Rheingold")
(b) Waltraute's Narrative ("Gotterdammerung") .....Wagner

Goldonian Intermezzi. Op. 127.....Bossi
Preludio e Minuetto
Gagliardi.
Serenatina.
Burlesca.

Scene and Aria, "My Life Fades" ("Rienzi").....Wagner

Comedy Overture on Negro Themes (MS).....Gilbert

The critics have never been able to agree as to which is the finest of Schumann's four symphonies. This much may be said, that though the first may suffer on the score of workmanship when compared with one or two of the others, none of them exceed, or perhaps equal it, in point of freshness, buoyancy and even in distinctive originality. It has been asserted, and not without some degree of truth, that Schumann was not at his best in symphonic writing. Certainly he has not Beethoven's power of orderly and effective development of his themes; nor is his orchestration as smooth and clear as that, for instance, of Mendelssohn. Indeed, he had no such knowledge of the orchestra as these and even some lesser composers of his time. But he had vivid imagination, a melodic gift second only to that of Schubert, and he was not in the least afraid to try new effects. All this is shown in the B-flat symphony, his first work of the kind, as clearly as in those written in his maturer years.

Of the two other orchestral numbers on the programme the group of four intermezzi by Bossi was the most interesting. The set was composed, as its title indicates, in honor of Carlo Goldoni, a famous Italian playwright of the 18th century. Their form follows appropriately that of the old suite, though they are modern enough in coloring and cunning use of present-day orchestral resources. Played by the orchestra with fine spirit and delicacy they formed a most agreeable and entertaining novelty.

The comedy overture on negro themes by an American composer, Mrs. Henry F. Gilbert, seemed hardly dignified enough for a place on a symphony programme. Still, the material is worked up cleverly enough, though hardly in as effective a fashion as that set by Dvorak in dealing with negro melodies. The overture does not impress one as having the vitality which would betoken a very long or useful life.

The soloist was Mme. Schumann-Heink, who sang three excerpts from the operas of Wagner impressively and with much of her old-time power. Time has been good to this veteran singer, and she can still charm her audience, though the freshness of her voice and something of its once wonderful volume have passed away. To one who had not heard her in her prime she must still seem a great singer, and she will always be the capable and conscientious artist. She was applauded with great warmth.

The next concert by the orchestra and the third in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, January second.

W. A. P.

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7 and Saturday afternoon, December 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4, in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

EVENING GLOBE,

From

New York City.

Address

Date

Miss Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

From NEWS

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date

Established

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The appearance of that magnificent vocalist, one of the idols of the Wagnerian opera lovers, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was the soloist at the second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, resulted in calling out an audience which completely filled every seat in Infantry hall, upstairs and downstairs.

Grand as was the orchestral programme offered by Dr. Max Fiedler and his band of unexcelled musicians, and all three of the composition given were gems in their own lines, there is no doubt that it was the singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink that was the real feature of the delightful concert, and the representative audience was evidently of this mind, for the great vocalist and finished artist received the heartiest marks of appreciation.

She is no longer a young woman and naturally, to those who heard her in the past, there is, perhaps, something missing, but in spite of all, she is still the dramatic vocalist, filled with the true spirit of musical genius and evidently possessing a great admiration for Richard Wagner and his works. Some there were, perhaps, in the audience, who are not ardent lovers of the Wagnerian opera, but even these bowed before the great artist as revealed by Mme. Schumann-Heink.

The program of the concert, which was marked by an unusual variety, was:

Symphony in B-flat, Major No. 1, Op 38. Schumann

(a) Erda's Scene from (Das Rheingold")
(b) Waltraute's Narrative ("Gotterdammerung") .....Wagner

Goldonian Intermezzi, Op. 127.....Bossi
Preludio e Minuetto
Gagliardi.
Serenatina.
Burlesca.

Scene and Aria, "My Life Fades" ("Rienzi") ..... Wagner

Comedy Ovetrure on Negro Themes (MS) ..... Gilbert

Of the Schumann symphony and the Goldonian Intermezzi, it is enough to say that all that was best in Schumann, and is best in Bossi was brought out in the manner that always distinguishes the splendid organization, under Dr. Feidler's direction, the work of Bossi being given with a spirit and delicacy that formed a delight for every lover of music.

The comedy overture on negro themes by Mrs. Henry F. Gilbert seemed somewhat out of place, although the work is a clever one, and it is plain that an unsuccessful attempt has been made by the composer to follow the style of Dvorak in dealing with negro melodies. The overture seems to lack in vitality.

The next concert by the orchestra and the third in the series will be given on Tuesday evening, Jan. 2.

From STAATSZEITUNG.

Address New York City. NOV 26 1911

Date

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Abend des 7. und am Nachmittag des 9. Dez. bringen Kathleen Parlow als Solistin. Im Abend-Konzert dirigirt Hr. Fiedler die Brahms'sche Vierte, während das Hauptwerk am Samstag Nachmittag Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonische Suite „Scheherezade" ist.

Kommenden Donnerstag Abend resp. Freitag Nachmittag wird Herr Stransky in einem philharmonischen Konzert die große Schubert'sche C-Dur-Symphonie und Smetana's symphonisches Poem „Vyšehrad" dirigiren. Herr Harold Bauer spielt als Solist mit Orchesterbegleitung Brahms' D-Moll-Konzert. Der genannte Künstler wirkt auch im 2. Brooklyner-Konzert der Philharmonie in der dortigen Academy of Music am 3. Dez. mit, wobei er das Schumann'sche Piano-Konzert zur Aufführung bringt.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

[82]

From SUN.

Address New York City.

Date

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 25 1911

Date

Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," will be the principal number at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 8. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist. She will play Bruch's "Scotch" fantasie. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Weber's "Oberon" overture complete the programme.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7 and Saturday afternoon, December 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Braam's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

From

Address

Date NOV 26 1911

Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," is to be the piece de resistance of the program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, December 9, at which Miss Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, will be the solo performer. Miss Parlow will play, also, at the concert on the Thursday evening preceding, when Brahms' Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, will be the main offering.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 25

The next Boston Symphony concerts, to occur December 7-9 at Carnegie hall and December 8 in Brooklyn, will have no novelties. The Thursday evening symphony will be the Brahms's number 4 in E minor, and in the afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," will be played. Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist.

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 26 1911

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next two Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9, next. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4 in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be given to the Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 2, 1911.

SYMPHONY'S 8TH REHEARSAL

Composer Elgar's New Work Is Played for the First Time in Boston.

MARKED BY SONOROUSNESS

BY PHILIP HALE.

The eighth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Kathleen Parlow was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, E flat op 63.....Elgar
Fantasie on Scottish Airs for violin and orchestra.....Bruch
"Romeo and Juliet" Overture Fantasia after Shakespeare.....Tschaikowsky

Elgar's new symphony was played for the first time in Boston. The first performances in this country were by the Cincinnati orchestra at Cincinnati, the 24th and 25th of last month. The symphony was produced at the London Musical Festival the 24th of last May.

It is in four movements, and the scherzo is called a rondo. The symphony is long and orthodox. It has no program, but there is this motto from Shelley's "Invocation":

Rarely, rarely comest thou,
Spirit of Delight.

And these lines may well be repeated by the hearer at the end of the performance.

Mr. Ernest Newman has written an analysis of this symphony, an analysis which is at the same time an exuberant eulogy. He finds that the music is "untroubled by any of the darker problems of the soul"; that for the most part "it sings and dances in sheer delight with life." Mr. Newman is an able and interesting writer; an independent thinker, courageous and felicitous in the expression of his opinions and beliefs; he is also a good friend.

For this symphony is chiefly distinguished by the sonorousness of the instrumentation. The purely musical contents are middle-class. The themes have not so marked a profile as those of the composer's first symphony, which were either sentimental with the English sentimentalism that disfigures even many hymn tunes of the Church of England, or conventionally brilliant after the manner of a page by Miss Marie Corelli.

This second symphony sounds well. There are passages that are uncommonly fine in this respect, as the opening measures and the exposition of the first theme in the Larghetto. When this is said, praise must cease, except the doubtful praise paid the composer's facility and knowledge of routine.

The musical thought is neither profound, nor beautiful, nor stirring in itself. There is a lack of contrasts; there is rhythmic monotony. The attention of the hearer is easily and often distracted—yet he is aware that this music playing is eminently correct and self-satisfied.

[illegible] not profitable to inquire too curiously into the causes of prevailing dul-

[illegible] early 100 years ago William Hazlitt [illegible] a few words concerning a speech [illegible] India affairs by the Marquis Wellesley, the eldest brother of the Duke of [illegible]ington. These words may be justly [illegible]led to Sir Edward Elgar, composer of "The Dream of Gerontius," two symphonies, the popular marches "Pomp and Circumstance" and other works which have been performed here:

"[illegible]seeming to utter volumes in every [illegible], and yet saying nothing; retaining the same unabated vehemence of [illegible] and action without anything to [illegible]e it; still keeping alive the promise and the expectation of genius without once satisfying it—soaring into mediocrity with adventurous enthusiasm, harrowed up by some plain matter of fact, writhing with agony under a truism, and launching a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt."

It is to be regretted that Miss Parlow, a violinist of indisputable talent, chose Bruch's disarrangement of Scottish airs. Nevertheless in this shop-worn Fantasia she displayed brilliant technic, including her remarkably rapid and even trill, and the species of emotional quality that suited the sentiment of the airs in the first and third movements. Her performance of the more robust passages was virile. The accompaniment was not worthy of the reputation of the orchestra, and at times one or two of the wind instrument players were sadly at sea.

It is perhaps the greatest compliment to Elgar's instrumentation to say that after his symphony certain pages of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" seemed thin, meagre or coarse. But the middle section still remains a thing of beauty with its murmured confessions, its rapturous chant of love that triumphs over strife and death.

The program of the concerts of Dec. 15 and 16 will be as follows: Beethoven, symphony in B flat No. 4; two 'cello pieces, Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Boellmann's Symphonic Variations, played by Alwin Schroeder; Strauss, "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot" and "Till Eulenspiegel." There will be no concerts next week.

2, 1911

Y'S

EARSAL

New Work Is he First ston.

ROUSNESS

HALE, ehearsal of the stra, Mr. Fiedler yesterday after-
Miss Kathleen
The program

op 61.....Elgar rs for violin
.....Bruch
ture Fantasia
....Tschaikowsky was played for
. The first per-
tty were by the Cincinnati, the nonth. The sym-
the London Mu-of last May.
ments, and the
ndo. The sym-
dox. It has no
this motto from nest thou,

l be repeated by of the perform-

has written an ny, an analysis me an exuberant he music is "un-larker problems
e most part "it eer delight with n able and inpendent thinker, s in the expres-
d beliefs; he is s chiefly distin-ness of the inely musical con-

The themes have as those of the ny, which were e English senties even many ch of England, after the man-
urle Corelli.
y sounds well.
rs uncommonly opening meas-
the first theme n this is said,
t the doubtful
's facility and is neither pro-stirring in itontrasts; there he attention of ten distracted—music playing self-satisfied.

faire too curi-prevailing dul-

William Hazlitt
rning a speech
Marquis Welles-
f the Duke of may be justly lgar, composer lus," two symurches "Pomp other works
ed here:
mes in every thing; retainvehemence of anything to ive the prom-genius with-soaring into urous enthune plain mat-agony under a common-of a thunder-

Miss Parlow, talent, chose Scottish airs, p-worn Fan-nt technic, in-pid and even notional qual-
iment of the movements. more robust accompanihe reputation times one or ment players

st compliment to say that ath pages of and Juliet" arse. But the s a thing of l confessions.
ove that tri-
h.
certs of Dec.
: Beethoven,
4; two 'cello
" and Boell-dens, played rauss, "Love and "Till Eu-
e so concerts

From ____
Address ____ NEW YORK CITY
Date ____ NOV 26 1911

Vor-Anzeigen.

Frau Schumann-Heink hat kürzlich ihre Tour mit dem Boston Symphonie-Orchester in Boston beendet, und ist über Springfield, Mass., und Wilmington, Del. nach New York zurückgekehrt, um hier am 28. November, Dienstag Nachmittag, in Carnegie Hall in einem Recital zu singen. Das Programm enthält 29 Lieder von Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann und Brahms, sowie 3 englische Lieder.

From EVENING JOURNAL,
Address New York City.
Date ____

The next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York—always notable occasions—will occur on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, December 7 and 9. Miss Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both concerts. At the first Conductor Max Fiedler will play the fourth Brahms symphony and at the second, Rimsky-Korsakow's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

ork, 18

From STANDARD UNION,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 26 1911

Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade" will be the principal number at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 8. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist. She will play Bruch's "Scotch" fantasie. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and W. "Overon" overture complete the gramme.

18

From ____
Address ____
Date Nov 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4, in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties in either programme.

From WORLD
Address New York City
Date ____

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's No. 4, in E minor. At the afternoon concert there will be no symphony, but the principal place on the programme will be taken by Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic Suite "Scheherazade." There are no novelties on either programme.

84

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 2, 1911

ELGAR AS NATIONALIST

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gave the eighth concert of the season Friday afternoon in Symphony hall, with Miss Kathleen Parlow as the soloist. The interest of the orchestral part of the program centered in the symphony, Elgar's second in E flat, which was played for the first time in Boston. The audience gave close attention to both the new work of the famous English composer and to the playing of the young Canadian violinist. It gave restrained applause to the symphony or to its interpretation; it gave the enthusiastic hand clapping that a matinee assemblage is wont to bestow on the performance of a brilliant solo artist of attractive platform presence.

The program in full was as follows: Elgar, Symphony No. 2 in E flat, Op. 63 (first time in Boston); Bruch, Fantasia, on Scottish airs for violin and orchestra, Op. 46; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia after Shakespeare. Soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow.

The new Elgar symphony was a pitfall for the Symphony orchestra conductor. It misled him by its rare ingenuousness. Yes, a symphonic work simple in conception has come out from under the pen of a modern master of orchestral technique. And Max Fiedler, whom no symphonic poem of Richard Strauss, no towering edifice of Brucknerian scoring can daunt, failed to catch the meaning of a composer who is writing the gigantic style of instrumental expression out of fashion.

Perhaps the snare for the Symphony conductor lay in the simplicity of the problem of execution which the piece offers for his men. Merely to play this work seemed one of the lightest tasks the orchestra has undertaken in a long time when bringing a novelty to the attention of their patrons. And the wonder of new productions in the Symphony concerts of latter seasons has been, as most listeners will attest, in overcoming the physical difficulties of performance. It has been as though the composer and the men of the orchestra were playing a game, the composer trying to write something so difficult that the performers could not make anything out of it except by the utmost virtuosity, and the expert tone makers proving that no combination of string, wood and brass having harmonic warrant could be built into a symphonic texture but they could make clear the logic of it. Now comes Elgar without the virtuosity hold-up and the men slide along as if they were reading a piece of orchestration put together 60 years ago. Handsomely done, if it were only a question of playing the music.

Handsomely done, if it were only a question of paying formal regard on occasion to the composer's mass effects when he piles his tone layers high and to the contrasting moments when he brushes his color thin. But all that is the mere beginning of the task that Elgar has set in his second symphony. And farther than this beginning the Boston orchestra does not go. It approaches these simply conceived movements in its biggest virtuoso mood and makes easy spoil of them.

If the work is inspired with any idea greater than can be expressed in terms of violin, flute and trumpet execution, it quite escapes the virtuoso consciousness. And why does it? Because of the problem in national appreciation that enters into the reading of the symphony. There is a people across a stretch of stormy sea from Teuton and Gallic territory that is expressing itself through the orchestra. It is expressing itself one day in the idiom of Germany, another day in the idiom of France and still another day in its native idiom, All very fine at Symphony hall on the first two days; not so fine on the third. Everything goes all right when the composer is Bantock; everything goes smoothly when the composer is Delius; but not when he is Elgar of the symphony in E flat. A new outlook on the world is presented in this music, and the company of instrumentalists that interpret it must be awake to something not found in the tonal thinking of Berlin, Paris or St. Petersburg. And that is the thing which escaped the orchestral experts who made a technical holiday of the music on Friday afternoon.

The Symphony men took care of the great moments which the composer has scattered through his work. To heavy scoring they gave big tone. To crescendo and climax they gave what Mr. Fiedler has taught them to give, a volume of sound, the largest in power that can be developed within the limits of purity. They set off choir against choir with that boldness of contrast which only players sure of their color qualities can affect without overpassing acoustic approval. In a word, the Fiedler orchestra read the transparent English diction of Elgar as though it was the complex German diction of Strauss. It was as if the men said that all modern composers who go in for straight symphony writing take their idea of the hundred-man orchestra from the composer of "Don Quixote." All composers try, at any rate, the Boston artists seemed to say, to follow the Berlin lead, and perhaps Elgar is succeeding as well as any of them.

A more clearly orchestrated score a Boston audience has not had opportunity to hear read in a long time than this one of Saxon make. Mr. Fiedler's men could not scrape or blow holes in it, if they tried their Teutonic and Gallic best. An honestly written work and an ingeniously conceived one, it does not need virtuoso belaboring to make it give up its secret. The genius of the E flat symphony is not Proteus that it must be surounded, captured, held down through one change of shape after another until it tells you your way home. Here is something of fresher date than the Strauss tone poems, something that tells of a new day in orchestral expression. Here is none of your tone realism. Elgar is an idealist, and that symphony conductor who does not approach the work as an idealistic view of life will miss its point and fail to im-

On the second question it is well that listeners of the Boston opportunity do not affect too much superiority of standard. The Harold Bauer type of soloist is the one that the ear attuned to the modern concert note will prefer to all others. But we must occasionally return to the solo artist who plays not to impress on us a new message but who plays simply to delight us. Symphony audiences help the orchestra develop its circuit programs; they must give their heartiest welcome to the home appearance of a circuit soloist.

Leopold Auer, the Russian violin master, puts the seal on the youthful artist who is competent to go the great American musical highway, and he is generally right in judging the temper of the dwellers along that gold-paved road. Perhaps he missed it in Zimbalist, but in Elman and Miss Parlow he did not err. Beautiful tone and neat execution, perfect platform command and much tact for conveying the general thought of her music distinguished the interpreter of the Scotch fantasia at the Symphony matinee. The true Scotch accent of the inner section of the work she did not appreciate as keenly as did Mr. Zimbalist at his reading of it in recital. It were pertinent to say that she did not touch the scholastic purport of the piece as did Mr. Witek at his concert, but that comparisons of youthful circuit soloists with wise concertmasters are never in order.

GLOBE—
—NOVEMBER 26, 19

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Pension Fund Concert.

Handel and Haydn Season—De Pachmann Recital.

Happenings of Current and Coming Interest.

All traditions will be overturned if Symphony Hall is not filled tonight when the first Pension Fund concert of the season is given. These concerts always bring out many loyal friends of the orchestra and tonight the program is particularly attractive because not only will it be devoted to the music of Wagner but the soloist will be Mme Schumann-Heink, who for the second time within a few years has graciously given her services to this good cause.

Although the fund will not be nine years old until next March, such progress has been made that more than 20 pensions are now being regularly paid. While there have been a number of gifts from friends of the orchestra, the great bulk of the fund is drawn from two sources. The chief of these is the two concerts given each season; the other is the annual dues paid by the members of the orchestra.

The establishment of this fund by Mr Gericke was not one of the least benefits he bestowed upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His was the idea and it was chiefly from the impetus given by him that the fund stands where it does today.

Other orchestras in this country have attempted something of the kind, but in no case have they had great success. The fund is admirably administered and as time goes on its benefits will become more marked.

Mme Schumann-Heink tonight will sing the Erda scene in the last act of "The Rhinegold," Waltraute's narrative, from the first act of "Dusk of the Gods," and the "Gerechter Gott," and air, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from the third act of "Rienzi."

The orchestral numbers comprise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," "Funeral Music," from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude, and "Love's Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," the "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this week's Symphony concerts Kathleen Parlow, the young violinist who made so profound an impression last Spring, will play Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie." The interest in the orchestral part of the program will center in the performance of Elgar's second symphony, which will have its first performance in Boston.

The first performance of the work in this country has just been given by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and on Dec 10 Walter Damrosch is to give the first performance of the work in New York.

This second symphony was performed for the first time in London last Spring. Its reception was not altogether favorable, the work having caused a great deal of discussion for and against, as seems to be the fate of every new work by a distinguished composer.

Elgar is undoubtedly the foremost composer of England and, therefore, every new work of his merits a respectful hearing. The other number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

[83]

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 2, 1911

KATHLEEN PARLOW SYMPHONY SOLOIST

MADE SWEEPING SUCCESS OF HER WORK

This Week's Programme Comprises Works by Elgar, Bruch and Tschaikowsky.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Elgar. Second Symphony.
Bruch. "Scotch Fantasie." Violin and Orchestra.
Soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow.
Tschaikowsky. "Romeo and Juliet." Overture-Fantasie.

Let no one imagine that with three numbers only, the concert was too short. A modern symphony is a very serious matter and no self-respecting composer nowadays will write even a sinfonietta that does not last over an hour. Yet in his second symphony Sir Edward Elgar is more concise than in his first. The system of forcing homogeneity into a symphony by transferring thematic material from one movement to another is another device which all modern symphonists use, and we expected to find it in this work,—and were not disappointed. But none of the latter-day musical creators seems to manage this in such a natural and beautiful manner as Brahms did in his C minor symphony, or Beethoven in his ninth, although the Finale is much the best movement in Elgar's second symphony.

When Elgar burst upon the world with his "Dream of Gerontius" all the world (the present reviewer included), believed that the greatest English composer had arrived, that Purcell was dethroned as the chief musical Englishman. Since that time Bantock has advanced and Elgar has receded, so that it is now a divided consulship even if the most favorable verdict is rendered.

For one thing we are grateful. Elgar in this symphony keeps well to a definite form and shows that the symphonic shape is not a dead letter even in the 20th century. The first and last movements have the recognized architecture which Haydn founded, Mozart developed, and Beethoven and Brahms culminated, although the return of themes after development have some freedom, as is proper in a modern work. The slow movement, too, is akin to sonatina-form, in which the themes are stated, and then, after a short transition, restated. This slow movement is a worthy part of the symphony, being spontaneous in character, well-contrasted in themes and ending with a climax. The Scherzo, or Rondo, presents derivations from the first movement. The finale gives more than occasional reminiscences, it broadly develops figures which were first heard in the opening movement and a noble climax is made with the very first figure or phrase of the work, which serves to bind the whole together. The end of the work is very beautiful.

So much for the forms employed. The orchestration is not altogether so effective as one might demand in a great work in these days when there are a dozen tone-colorists who could give lessons to even Beethoven in this particular field.

The earnestness of the work no one may doubt, but its fragmentary style is not to be doubted either. One would not want an oratorio to be all recitative, nor does one wish a symphony to be all figure treatment. There were many passages that suggested an English Debussy flavored with Wagner. Such an involved symphony makes us feel that Music, who was once, according to Collins, a "Heavenly Maid," has not kept the promise of her early years, but has become a decided blue-stocking.

Great credit must be given to Mr. Fiedler and his merry, merry men, for the work was tremendously difficult,—we wish (like the old Greek), that it had been impossible. But the finale made amends for all the prolixity and rambling that had preceded it, for it is really great music. One feels here that the symphony is the work of a powerful composer who has not yet mastered his style of utterance. Yet Elgar is nearer to definite attainment in this symphony than in his first one. But such music is a severe strain upon the listening faculties of an audience. Some day our concert auditors will strike for shorter hours of labor.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 3, 1911.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal and concert this week. The orchestra leaves Boston tonight on its second southern trip to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, will be the soloist at each of these cities.

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday, Dec. 14, will include these compositions: Franck, symphony in D minor; Saint-Saens, concerto in B minor, No. 3, for violin (Miss Kathleen Parlow); Tschaikowsky, overture Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare).

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Dec. 15, and Saturday evening, Dec. 16, will be as follows: Beethoven, symphony in B flat major No. 4; 'cello pieces—Bruch "Kol Nidrei" and Boellmann's symphonic variations (Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist); Strauss, Love scene from "Feuersnot" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

HERALD, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1911.

Miss Kathleen Parlow Discusses Russian Music

Kathleen Parlow, Who Will Play at the Symphony Concerts This Week.

Distinguished Violinist Makes an Impassioned Defence of Glazunoff's Concerto.

SKETCH OF HER CAREER

"The Glazunoff Concerto is really 'the drama of Russia,' as Glazunoff has himself called it," said Miss Kathleen Parlow yesterday to a reporter of The Herald, in impassioned defence of a work which has been received with only moderate rapture in America and England.

But the distinguished young violinist who will play in Boston this afternoon at the Symphony public rehearsal has reasons for her predilection. To begin with, she has a consuming enthusiasm for Russia and everything Russian—not to mention that migration to the excessively cold climate of St. Petersburg was the means of permanently restoring her health. Then this concerto was dedicated to her teacher, Leopold Auer, and besides the fact of her having studied the work with him there is the added association of gratiture on her part for many kindnesses shown her by the eminent master, and Miss Parlow is among like phenomena in the world of art—an appreciative pupil.

The violinist was born in the province of Alberta, Can., but left there at 5 years of age to make her home in San Francisco, where her musical education began, first under the direction of a cousin and later under Henry Holmes of the Royal College of Music, London. Through the assistance of Lord Strathcona she was sent to St. Petersburg, where her lessons with Auer began.

It was hoped that the young woman would give accounts of her impressions of student life in the Russian city and tell wild tales of Nihilistic orgies and midnight revelries, but apparently this side of her early life was neglected, not to say scorned.

"The time for my studies was limited to 15 months," she said, in speaking of her work, "and as I knew I must finish in that time I worked unusually hard. Besides my lessons and the added labor of learning an entirely new repertory I played in nine concerts in St. Petersburg and six in Helsingfors. These engagements were obtained for me through the kindness of Auer, because, although I had thought the amount of money allowed me sufficient for a year's work, I discovered I had been mistaken. Of course he could have asked some one to give me the money, but he preferred to have me earn it, which was much nicer.

"For a while I pretended to study piano at the Conservatory, as it is necessary to take two studies in order to be admitted, but as I hate to practice, this work was soon given up. I should like to have taken harmony in Glazunoff's class, but that was impossible, as I could not speak Russian.

"All the Russian students in the Conservatory seemed to me to be real geniuses, they were so extraordinarily intelligent and musical. Zimbalist was a classmate of mine.

"All my time appeared to be taken up with my work, and I did very little else outside of that except to walk and read. What I suffered from most in Russia was the bad food. We lived in lodgings, and the meals were very badly prepared, which, I think, accounts for their unpleasantness, for I have eaten native dishes at friends' houses that I thought delicious.

"The living in Russia is decidedly expensive."

When questioned as to her favorite composers, Miss Parlow said that she had a special fondness for Brahms and Tschaikowsky. She delights in playing sonatas, and her dream is to have a quartet of her own made up not of amateurs but distinguished players.

"The main difference between the teaching of Auer and Sevcik, is, I think, that the latter lays entire stress upon the technique of a pupil, and frankly says that it does not matter to him whether a pupil is of an emotional temperament or not, for he can make him produce the effect of emotional playing, while the former dwells particularly in his teaching upon the musical side of violin playing," and Miss Parlow dilated earnestly and at length uppn the admirable qualities of the eminent master.

Of unusual height, the young artist's excellence of carriage makes this fact apparently unobtrusive. She is self-possessed, modest and unassuming, while she speaks of herself and her playing with a total lack of conceit, and with engaging frankness and sincerity.

POST, DECEMBER 3, 1911

No Symphony Concert This Week

There will be no Symphony rehearsal and concert this week as the orchestra leaves Boston tonight on its second Southern trip to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Miss Kathleen Barlow, the violinist, will be the soloist at each of these cities.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 1, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE BESETTING PROBLEM OF THE CONCERTS

The Need of Better Distribution and Coordination — The Conditions Here in Boston—Miss Garden and a Pack of Cards —New Operas at the Metropolitan—Mr. Bauer's Rich Maturity—"The Knight of the Rose" in Berlin—Items as They Pass

THE regular Symphony Concerts aside, there were seven concerts last week in this town that addressed themselves —more or less—to the general public. Within the present week there are two; and in the week to come five. In theory, since yesterday was a domestic holiday, requiring time for preparation and time for recovery, any concerts, unless they fell as early as Sunday or as late as Saturday, were inadvisable. True, but is it not also inadvisable to crowd seven concerts into the six working days of one week and five into as many days of another? The concert-going public of Boston, outside the Symphony Concerts, requires careful nursing, and the more since a new public is gradually replacing the old. The elder generation of concert-goers still lingers in the more costly seats, and as every one knows who goes often and observantly to concerts, tends to repeat itself. Is it advisable, then, to cloy it with seven concerts or with five in a single week? Assume that no more than six of these twelve concerts are likely to attract it. Yet are any human beings except reviewers of music and a few devotees, going to six concerts within twelve days? Not until human occupations and engagements diminish, human purses have fewer calls upon them and human capacity for the pleasurable hearing of music increases. The newer public of concerts happily becomes more and more numerous in the cheaper seats, but it still needs to be tempted and fostered. It is easily repelled, easily confused. It wishes to be neither stuffed nor starved, nor yet put to difficult and puzzling choice. We in Boston do not have too many concerts, when they bring us distinguished or interesting singers and virtuosi. We do have them unwisely distributed. November has been full of them; December, until Christmas time, will be as full; but by the precedent of recent years, February and March will be relatively bare, because most of the touring singers, virtuosi and quartets have departed Westward. The fault is not with the local managers who must often take what dates are assigned to them by general managers acting independently. Their difficulty, in turn, lies in the lack of coördination and distribution in what is called "musical management" in these United States. Nobody wishes to see a "musical syndicate" on the model of the "theatrical trust." But there ought to be some coördination of concerts here and elsewhere, so that they should not be in each other's and in the public's way.

H. T. P.

POST, DECEMBER 2, 1911

MISS PARLOW MAKES DEBUT

Canadian Plays Brilliantly With Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist who was so successful when she made her Boston debut with the Symphony Orchestra last season, played again at the public rehearsal of this orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, with the most brilliant success. Miss Parlow's vehicle was Bruch's "Fantasie on Scottish Airs," op. 46, a piece which is or is not valuable, according to your standpoint as a symphonist or a soloist. The Fantasie has some fine musical moments, though these are scattered, but the solo part and the orchestral measures are very skilfully and effectively put together. The Scottish airs on which the composition is based, according to description, are "Auld Rob Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herrin'" and "Scots Wha Hae Wi' Wallace Bled." The themes given to the violinist are rather derived from than reproductions of the old Scotch tunes, and they are ingratiating to the ear.

Miss Parlow gave an astonishing performance. Last year she played the Tschaikowsky concerto, vigorously enough, but her performance yesterday was even superior to that of last season, in its sureness and brilliancy, in the superb, virile quality of the tone, on whatever string, in whatever register, the purity of intonation, even in the most difficult passages of double-stopping, the complete technical adequacy, whether of the left hand or the bow arm.

Miss Parlow played with a mastery and fire almost masculine, and her tone seemed to color itself in accordance with the mood and the inflection of the passage. It was as warm, as big, as sonorous, as a 'cello, or it was crisp and brilliant, like the trumpets in the orchestra, or it had the beauty and the coldness of a flute. It is seldom that a slender violin appears such an equal to the resounding orchestra, but Bruch's admirable orchestration and the vitality of Miss Parlow's tone combined to achieve this effect. No wonder that the audience was enthusiastic. Miss Parlow was recalled again and again. Her performance will surely stand out as one of the events of this Symphony season.

Elgar on Programme

Elgar's Second Symphony was played for the first time in Boston on this occasion. Both are high-priced compositions, and while it is a grievance when a Strauss charges a prohibitive price for a cosmic page, it is an injury and an imposition when an audience is compelled to sit through an Elgar symphony. The work heard yesterday is superior to the first symphony in its first two movements on account of a far greater transparency of instrumentation and musical style and a more frank, unaffected attitude on the part of the composer. The last two movements seemed very poor music yesterday.

If the first symphony is both ponderous and bourgeois, it is, in its mundane way, meat. In our humble opinion the second symphony peters out when two movements have passed by. Emptiness of ideas may sometimes be concealed by distinction of style, but when there is emptiness and mediocrity in expression in one and the same composition then indeed is the composer's own inscription over his first movement justified: "Rarely, rarely comest thou, spirit of delight." No wonder that the audience did not applaud.

The most valuable musical moment of the afternoon came with the middle portion of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet Overture."

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 2, 1911

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ELGAR'S DISAPPOINTING NEW MUSIC

A Symphony That Is Dull of Idea, Snappy of Treatment and Monotonous of Execution — The Rich Orchestration That Warms, Colors and Occasionally Animates It—Miss Parlow Does Full Justice to Bruch's Scottish Fantasia—Auer and His Violinists—A Fading Tschaikowsky?

THE London audience hid its disappointment when it heard Elgar's new symphony for the first time last spring, and the few other audiences that have heard it since in Britain have been as circumspectly mannered. Being intelligent audiences also, they were quite aware that it was not interesting, imaginative or in any way remarkable music; that it was much inferior to Elgar's first symphony and to his violin concerto; and that it was written in the composer's laboring, self-conscious and mannered vein. Even the professed "Elgarites," except the intrepid Newman, who has taken refuge in enigmatic meanings in the music, have chastened their praise of it. Here in Boston, where the new symphony was performed for the first time yesterday at the Symphony Concerts the audience had no mood or mind to such circumspection. There is no severer critic of one's own clothes than one's own brother; and similarly and reciprocally minded, perhaps are Americans and Britons in their impression and estimates of each other's music. A piece by an American composer creeps on occasion into the programmes of orchestral concerts in London or in Manchester; and forthwith the audience, and especially the reviewers, become as transported Missourians. "Show us," they say to the composer, "whether you can accomplish anything worth while," and they are prone to conclude that he has failed to accomplish it. Like-minded is the more sophisticated public of our symphony concerts. "Interest us —if you can," they say to Elgar and Bantock and the rest of the Britons. "We hardly believe that you in your island can write remarkable music." And usually they find that it is not remarkable, even if they have been interested, in spite of themselves. They were not even that, yesterday afternoon, while the major part of the audience, careful as always to receive or reject the correct thing, was like the young auditor who inquired of a gray-haired reviewer: "Ought I really to be pleased with that?" Plainly many were not pleased. No such tepidly polite applause has been heard at a Symphony Concert for new music in many a day. Debussy, d'Indy, Reger, even Bantock, have been enthusiastically received beside poor Elgar yesterday. And it was not for lack of pains, understanding and eloquence in Mr. Fiedler's performance of the symphony. He toils ardently at every composer's music; he admires Elgar's; and he toils only the more ardently with it.

Even at a single hearing, some of the reasons for the dulness of the new symphony—it is useless to mince words—were clear enough. Either on the engraved page or in the orchestral voices, it lacks distinctive, striking, even interesting musical ideas. There is not a theme in it upon which the reading eye or the hearing ear fastens with quick impression and eager curiosity, until the fourth and final movement begins. Worse still, in each of the preceding movements, the ear and the comprehending faculties behind instinctively resent a certain delusion. Each movement begins interestingly; the hints of the musical thought promise well; but when it finally emerges, the melodic ideas are dull, labored and insignificant—those of the finale only a little less so than the rest. The disentangling analysts hint at a phrase that recurs like a "motto theme" in the various sections of the symphony. It has so little character that the ear neither seizes it when it first appears nor readily recognizes it when it returns in various shapes and guises. When a composer's imagination thus lags in the invention of ideas, he almost invariably takes refuge into workmanship and that workmanship is as invariably mannered. Even so does Elgar. Since musical imagination has refused him response, the more does he restrot to musical intellect.

[84]

Most of us have seen a boy [illegible] whittling at a piece of broomstick and slicing many sorts and kinds of shavings from it. By this homely analogue does Elgar whittle his themes into musical shavings of many shapes and voices; but he is not content to let them fall forthwith. He must turn and twist them together, tie and retie them, cut, notch and curl them, worry them, as the students' phrase is, until the sympathetic hearer pities the hard contrapuntal and instrumental lot of these much-enduring scraps of musical ideas. No doubt there is intellectual faculty in all this, but the process is not interesting or fruitful to ear and imagination. Worse still, it becomes tedious. He has tricks of sequence—a certain see-sawing—that many times repeated exasperates the ear. He lacks variety of rhythm. There is a stolid and self-approving monotony. He is platitudinous laboriously, almost proudly. It is possible to be academic in music of deliberately modern cast. Elgar is. He does not perturb, or excite, or even irritate. In this new symphony he merely leaves the listener trying to be attentive.

In only one respect does this workmanship tell. The symphony is richly scored, more resourcefully, variously and imaginatively than any of Elgar's pervious music. Everywhere in his instrumentation his hand is free and sure. He has mastered at last the fine sonority with which composers like Franck or d'Indy or Rachmaninoff score their "absolute" music and which falls richly-voiced upon contemporary ears. He has gained, too, the deep, warm, gloomy color which suffuses music so scored, and which in this particular symphony is like a glamorous mirage behind which there is no substance. In mass and detail Elgar is sensitive now to the individual timbres of separate instruments and groups of instruments and of the range in which they best reveal their characterizing voices. He no longer lets one blur another; he no longer merely juxtaposes them. He is adroit, too, in keeping his instrumental voices, and so his music, in constant motion. For a moment, the pomp and stir of sound at the beginning of the symphony holds the ear. So does the melancholy and veiled voice, very adroitly harmonized, of the second and the soberer melody of this allegro. Often in it, instrumental details keep the scraps of themes in colorful motion. At the beginning of the slow movement the soft chords, the insinuating advance of the grave melody are imaginatively contrived, only to fall away into dry workmanship.

Even the "Elgarites" confess that the rondo that replaces the scherzo is "enigmatic." It is, for it is not a fantastic play with a theme and scraps of themes like many a scherzo in a contemporary symphony. It has neither lightness nor grace, definite mood or playful fancy. It is an exercise in thematic intricacies in promising beginnings that lead only in new obscurities, new restlessness. Only the warmth and the vanity of the instrumental voices saves it from becoming a mere puzzle in tones. It may be "enigmatic," it certainly is inarticulate. The melody, the momentarily telling melody of the finale is richly dressed, and nearly to the end, the archestral voices keep their deep, warm glow until it fades into the subdued coloring of the end. The symphony belongs in Sir Edward's portfolio as a long and fruitful study for his own behoof in the art of orchestration, as so much advance in the, imaginative and effective use of tonal color. Grant him the musical ideas that at least are vivid and interesting in the earlier symphony and the concerto for violin, he will be better able next time to give them rich and expressive voice.

Upon Elgar's symphony, as Miss Parlow must have discovered in the course of her playing of Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," Mr. Fiedler had spent his pains. He and the band with him accompanied her roughly, carelessly, as though they were making their way, in a rather spiritless rehearsal, through this hackneyed piece. There were even slips in entrances and clear oversights—a very rare thing where our orchestra is concerned. Yet Miss Parlow's playing gave no hint of such embarassments, and she herself seemed quite tranquil under them, smiling her honest, cheerful, modest smile upon her applauding audience. She, like Mr. Zimbalist, is a pupil of the Russian, Auer, and she gave new occasion to admire the distinctive qualities of his teaching—the evenness of technique and the feeling for beautiful and poised tone that he imparts. Like Mr. Zimbalist, Miss Parlow is equal mistress of her brow and her fingers and no more expert in any one intricasy of the technique of the violin than in another. She may not quite match the youth in his harmonies or in the singing quality of her tone; but in a general flawnessness, ease and sureness of technical accomplishment, she falls little below him. Out of Auer's studio have come in her and in Mr. Zimbalist poised ad perfected violinists—and in what youth. And their perfection has not dried them. For he has cultivated in Miss Parlow feeling for beauty of tone, alertness to each shading and accent that she may give it, and a sense of the peculiar quality of tone, the particular music may require.

Of course, Bruch's fantasia is as conventional show-piece, making its play with Scottish folk-tunes and with much conventional padding that it may range through the voice and the technique of the violin. It is not at all a subtle or an imaginative music; when it is not ostentatious it is sentimental in honest hausfrau fashion. By those tokens it asks a warmn and rather robust tone, an honesty of interpretation as of a violinist revealing his accomplishments in free and cheerful style; a sure and easy skill, occasional rhythmic intuitions, an agreeable play of elementary emotion. Quite as though she were a man and a nature virtuoso, Miss Parlow so made her may through the music. The breadth and warmth of her tone gave it substance; her incisive rhythms kept in motion; her playing flowered time and again into little dexterous ornaments like her trills. She gave hearty pleasure, yet she has yet to play here in Boston a concerto that will measure her finer powers. Last spring Tschaikowsky's was alien to them, yesterday Bruch's was beneath them.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 29, 1911

ELGAR AND HIS MUSIC

NOTES TO PRECEDE HIS NEW SYMPHONY

The Piece That Mr. Fiedler Will Produce at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—The Mistrust of Elgar's Work in America and a Reason or Two for It—The Harm That Self-Advertising Has Done Him—The British Traits in Elgar—His Substantial Achievements

IN spite of the fact that American reviewers officially disposed of Elgar's first symphony three years ago, Elgar has perversely not retired to private life, but has since composed a concerto and another symphony, the latter of which we in Boston are to hear at the next rehearsal and concert of our orchestra. The task of preparing a preliminary analysis of this work is delicate, for England and America are alike in this—neither nation feels sure that it is musical, but each is sure that the other is not; and, while some of us are not only willing to admit that some good thing may come out of Nazareth, but also delighted when it comes, there are, on the other hand, many whose sole pleasure in entertaining a work of art which emanates from a quarter against which they are prejudiced, is the joy of finding that it is as bad as they had expected.

All this applies especially to Elgar: for, rightly or wrongly, to the general public Elgar represents English music, and it is therefore difficult for a critic to consider his music apart from certain settled policies on the critics' part with regard to English music in general. At present the misguided efforts of English journals to boost Elgar whether or no have aroused the fight in American critics; and the comparative failure three years ago in this country of Elgar's first symphony seems due less to any demerit of the work than to a desire on the part of our reviewers to scoff at British boasting, and to their fixed prejudice against British music in general.

Elgar, the Advertiser

True, nobody can say that Americans have ever misjudged Elgar's music through lack of advance information, for we have been systematically led by English reviewers to expect, and helped by them to detect, every good trait possessed by previous composers, and more besides, in each of Elgar's works as they appeared—or rather some time before they appeared; for Elgar, unlike most composers, has mastered the difficult art (or should I say craft?) of securing favorable reviews of his works not only after their première, but before they have been either published or performed, almost even before they are composed. The effect of these methods upon American critics has usually been that of making them decry the music itself partly no doubt because some of them have deserved it, and partly also because it is always pleasant to catch one's colleagues in other faults than one's own.

Now, of course, Elgar's tendency to sanction, or at least to wink at, the unseasonable smoothing of his path by his over-zealous friends (or agents!) is disgusting. Equally disgusting is the series of anonymous letters which appeared in English papers just after Elgar's concerto was hissed in Frankfurt, letters which were so surrounded by carefully worded editorials, prefaces, and footnotes as to leave no reasonable doubt as to their authorship, and which simultaneously denied the alleged Covent Garden boycott against German works while pleading that such a boycott would be justified by German treatment of English music, and so forth, and so onward. Of course, too, the extraordinary coincidence of Elgar's concert tour in America with Yale's sudden interest in the academic recognition of musical talent, culminating in a doctor's degree for "the greatest living composer" (!!!) provoked excusable mirth. Nor were judicious men pleased when Elgar talked so long and so loud to American reporters concerning his accomplishments as a man of science and letters, all of which was frankly designed to show that he was a much more versatile and scintillating person than the "mere musician" they supposedly had imagined him to be.

Elgar, the Briton

While these social and ethical traits of "Sir Edward," as the English papers love to call him, are extremely displeasing, we must remember that they have yet no more to do with the merits of his compositions than his taste in neckties; and while of course we should not allow his press-agents to mislead us into overestimating the quality of his music, neither should we allow the supposition he employs press-agents to mislead us into underestimating it. We cannot determine the relative value of Beethoven and Wagner as composers by comparing their records as marrying men; nor can we invariably expect to find coupled with a special talent those moral qualities which we admire, or at least which we affect to admire, in others. If Elgar, the composer, is the superior of Elgar, the social individual, who would wish that the reverse were the case? In fairness, also, to a self-made man, it should not be forgotten that when Elgar began to compose, the English, like the Americans today, had an undiscriminating and relentless prejudice against music signed with the name of any home-born and bred composer; and one may well ask, had Elgar not pushed his way to the front and pushed hard, where would he now be? "Echo answers, 'Where,'"—indeed one can but sadly reflect that had Edward Macdowell possessed, in addition to his admirable qualities as man and artist, a dash of the undeniably "seamy" [illegible] now be

Elgar, the Composer

It is time to turn from Elgar's personality to his music. His chief significance would seem to be that he is a successful exponent in music of the English character; and if this involves defects as well as virtues, there is still no reason why his work should be rejected as a whole. It is true that English life is full of the most surprising contradictions: to an outsider, for instance, it is difficult to see how so essentially masculine a race, distinguished for singleness of purpose and energetic accomplishment, can take seriously the most trivial forms of amusement, the most banal conventions in social matters, and the most artificial divisions into inflexible "classes" of people who individually and collectively pride themselves on their love of freedom; or, to come nearer to our art, it is difficult for an outsider to see how a race which attentively sits through symphonic programmes much longer and often more serious than are tolerated in any other country can also find delight in concerts consisting entirely of mawkish "ballads" composed and performed in the most stereotyped manner. It is therefore not surprising to find the composer of "Gerontius" writing abominably trashy salon music, for a man must necessarily be influenced by his environment; and it is as unreasonable to impugn the merit of his serious music because he has written some unworthy sugarplums as it would be to deny that the English are a successful nation in commerce because a certain proportion of them are paupers.

Grant cheerfully the sickish quality of such amiable nonsense as the "Salut d'Amour" (no pianola is complete without it), as well as the total absence of ideas in some of the cantatas, oratorios, and suites, yet Elgar has produced much music in which good thematic ideas are coupled with individuality of style and firmness of treatment. This individuality consists in an exceptionaly high development of the more rugged qualities of modern music—such as dissonance, wide intervals in the themes, heavily marked rhythms, persistent reiteration of single motives, sonorous instrumentation, and a comparative neglect of the sensuous, except in certain mystical passages, of which Elgar is decidedly fond. Such a combination of reserve in expression with power in conception inevitably suggests the analogous traits of the English racial character. It must be remembered that nothing in art is more dangerous, or less just, than to judge A's work by a rigid standard of conformity, to the work of B; yet most of Elgar's unfavorable critics have complained not at any fault of his work other than that they missed the "love-interest" which every post-Wagnerian composer is expected to wallow in, or the refined self-consciousness which the French and Russians have been suffered to put forward as the only orthodox modern alternative. Certainly in the "Cockaigne" and "In the South" overtures Elgar shows great vitality, and it is a satisfaction to see that both of these pieces still appear from time to time on concert programmes. The "Variations" are less fortunate; there is too much mere prettiness in them to make them long-lived, though parts of the work are deeper. The "Pomp and Circumstance"marches are not so well known, partly no doubt because the average symphonic conductor trembles for his dignity in putting a march on his programme, while the average band leader religiously excludes everything serious from his; but the novel and significant use of the march rhythm to be found in the first three of these pieces is no mere experiment in "popular" vein, but a highly impressive glorification of the military idea, comparable in purpose though not in style, to Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." Best of the earlier music, however, is the "Dream of Gerontius," which is an effective, faithful, and adequate setting of a subtle and elusive poem; this oratorio, which might have been called, like Mr. Converse's "Job," a "dramatic poem," wears exceedingly well, and should not have been dropped here after a first performance, but, as in England, performed often enough to overcome the preliminary shyness of the public. Add to this list the first symphony, which was several times played in this country, but always under some unfavorable circumstances, such as short preparation, unsympathetic interpretation, or the fixed policy of some of the critics to ridicule Elgar and his reviewers. Yet the music itself is excellent, and should, in common fairness, be properly presented to the public of this country.

The New Symphony

Last May, in London, I heard the first performance of the new second symphony, which we in Boston are about to hear. Elgar, who conducted, was evidently aware that all the Elgarites had come to "root" for him, and it may be truthfully said that he conducted the audience rather than the orchestra, a practice which naturally obscured many of the finer points of the symphony. Equally naturally, neither public nor critics, except the pledged "Elgarites" were especially pleased with the symphony; and even the pledged "Elgarites," to raise a proper "hurrah" had to resort to curious semi-apologetic "explanations" of the composer's aims and purposes, such as that offered by a loyal reviewer, characterizing the symphony as "a series of climaxes of hysterical, frenzied pleasure," an episode in it as resembling "a flash of shrieking fauns seen in a forest glade," and "Sir Edward" himself as a "riotous bacchanalian" composer.

"I appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober"—from the social-Elgar conducting at (I use the preposition after proper reflection and selection) his artistic "backers," to the creative Elgar composing in the privacy of his study. The frenzied, bacchanalian, hysterical elements, as well as the shrieking fauns, are purely local symptoms, and indicate not an organic trouble but merely an acute attack of "first-night-itis." The symphony itself is an agreeable work, with some good points and some bad, inferior in the quality of its ideas to the first symphony, superior to it in flexibility and conciseness of treatment; its worst fault is one from which Elgar occasionally suffers—a tendency to repeat, watered, successful ideas from the composer's previous music. Thus the first movement opens with a mood resembling that of the opening of "In the South," but less spontaneous and inevitable; a phrase of this first theme is used as a sort of motto later. The first theme, with various subsidiaries, is developed at some length, then passes by a transitional theme to the quiet second theme, which I find totally lacking in character. The development is episodic, and much of it is in a mysterious vein unlike the expansiveness of the exposition; in one episode a theme is set forth which later appears in the scherzo. The recapitulation is brilliant, and sticks to the material and treatment of the exposition.

The first theme of the slow movement is one of the best in the symphony, and it is impressively orchestrated. Of two transitional themes, the first is watered "Gerontius," the second an effective bit of impressionistic scoring; the second principal theme in trying to be "noble"—Elgar's favorite word—drops into the Ercles vein. There is no development, but only a short transition and an almost literal recapitulation, with a good climax.

The scherzo is successful more because of clever treatment than thematic distinction, except for an episode in which the theme hinted at in the development section of the first movement is broadly set forth over an accompaniment in which the scherzo rhythm is retained. The movement is in a very loose rondo-form.

The finale, in a modified sonata form with coda, is the most ingenious movement of the symphony. It begins quietly with a cleverly orchestrated theme of unpretentious and flowing character, and then proceeds to a transitional theme in the subdominant and a second theme in the dominant, as in sonata form; instead, however, of the traditional development section, there ensues a long middle portion based on the transitional theme. At the climax of this section, however, the first theme is heard, and after a long modulation in which the first theme assumes more and more importance, the recapitulation, which is almost literal, sets in. The coda is the most beautiful part of the symphony; it consists of a gradual sinking away to rest of the motto from the first movement, and leads of course to a quiet ending.

It is beside the mark to ask if this symphony is epoch-making. It certainly is not. Why should it be? If every symphony were epoch-making, there would be too many epochs and not enough symphonies in any given epoch. Individual, well-written, and effective Elgar's new symphony is; it is rather fortunate among modern pieces in being cheerful without being trivial, and the public should find it, if not great, at least highly enjoyable. Whether they do so find it, and whether if so the critics will let them persist in supposing they liked it, doth not yet appear.

P. G. C.

[85]

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK, WAGNER AND FRANCK

Unusual Honors to the Singer at the Pension Fund Concert — The Fashion in Which She Has Newly Merited Them—Wagner and the Public—The Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler Excel Themselves — Franck's Symphony and Tonal Drama —Two Memorable Evenings at Symphony Hall

AUDIENCE and orchestra paid just honors to Mme. Schumann-Heink at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening. For the second time within four years she had given her services for the pleasure of her hearers and for the increase of the Pension Fund of the band. When she came first to the stage the orchestra received her standing, while the strings tapped their bows upon their instruments and the other men applauded as best they could when they had to hold clarinets or horns or tubas. At the end of her "numbers" they gave her the hugest wreath that has passed in recent years over the footlights of a theatre or a concert-hall in Boston. It was larger than the proverbial cart-wheel; it was tied with great black and gold ribbons—the colors of the Bohemia where the singer was born—and upon them was an inscription appropriate to the occasion. Even Mme. Schumann-Heink quailed at first before such a "tribute"; then she half shouldered, half trundled the wreath off the stage. The audience, in its turn, filled every seat in the house and was a very representative company. It applauded the singer so heartily at her first appearance that even she, the poised, needed a moment or two to recover her composure, and at the end of each one of her "numbers" it swelled its clapping long and loudly. Any other audience, especially on the Continent, would have cheered her; but to do so is not the Bostonian way.

The Matured Singer

All this, moreover, was the just desert of Mme. Schumann-Heink, not only because she has been lavish of her services to the Symphony Orchestra, "without money and without price," and because her personality in the concert-room is both dignified and ingratiating; but still more because she has sung in Boston in the last fortnight as she has never sung here before. To appear with the Symphony Orchestra has often put her to her mettle, but sometimes the stimulation has expressed itself only in a fuller opulence of tone and in new vigor of emphasis and largeness of style. In her present visit, alike in the Symphony Concerts of a week ago and in the Pension Fund concert of last evening, she has sung with a new ripeness and discrimination of artistry. Recall the long list of her "numbers": Andromache's Lament for Bruch's "Achilles"; Schubert's "Young Nun," Liszt's "Three Gypsies," and Wagner's "Dreams" for orchestrated songs; Erda's warning to Wotan in "Rheingold" of the fate that awaits the gods; Waltraute's picturing of it in "Götterdämmerung," and the Page's declamatory tune from the early "Rienzi." In all these she has sung with her familiar richness of tone which seemed only the richer because she often, as the music demanded, kept it subdued to middle voice. Then its musical and emotional glow has been like the deep and sustained glow of coals that burn slowly, deeply, intensely, without flare but with a warming heat. Never before have her tones seemed to possess so mellow, so poised a beauty, such imparting quality, because there were just understanding and deep feeling for her music behind them.

Mme. Schumann-Heink has so stood in the full maturity of a great singer by the justest of titles; a voice that preserves its sensuous opulence and yet attains to new and grave beauties of sustained song; a command of artistry that enriches her singing with largely moulded phrases and with significant inflection that yet keep the shaping and the quality of the tone flawless, and a matured response to the large mood and the detailing accents of her music. The voice, the song are now very full, very true, very perfect expression of them. The woman, remarkable figure that she is, almost vanishes in the rounded maturity of her singing. In every singer's career there comes an occasion whereby her audiences choose to remember her best and longest. Perhaps such a moment came to Mme. Schumann-Heink in her concert last evening. So long as she remains in her present maturity—and the years should be merciful—the grand style, in all the nobility of its best estate, is still upon our stage.

Boston and Wagner

A programme of fragments of music from Wagner's operas helped not a little to assemble this notable audience and gave the second proof within a fortnight of the existence here of an eager public for his music. Twice within that time it has flocked to Symphony Hall to hear excerpts from these operas that by this time it must know by heart and that it would be easy to label hackneyed did they not ever renew themselves—the Preludes to "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin"; the overture to "Tannhäuser," the apotheosis of Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung"; the "Good-Friday Spell" from "Parsifal." On one occasion the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and Mr. Stransky played them; on the other the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler; but the performers, though the second concert much excelled the first in quality of execution, seemed in a sense to matter little. It was the music that the audience came to hear and that engrossed it. Yet not for two years has this town heard even "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" on the stage of its opera house. There has been no "Ring Cycle" here since the spring of 1889. "Rheingold" was then performed for the first, the second and the only times in Boston. We barely know "Götterdämmerung," "Siegfried" and "Die Meistersinger." With "Die Walküre," "Parsifal" and "Tristan" we have been more fortunate; but not one of these operas has been heard here for two years; and only one is promised at the opera house this season. Yet Boston likes to believe itself an operatic capital. And the reason for this neglect of Wagner's operas is commonly repeated as "the indifference of the public." Would it flock as it does to "Wagner concepts," if indifference were its mood? In the light of common sense and common experience, it would not. Crusading is a weariness to the flesh of those who write and those who may read. It is also sometimes an obligation.

Memorable Performance

Not always, however, even in the best of opera houses, does an audience hear those fragments performed as it heard them last evening. The orchestra was at the top of its form, as it has been very often of late—in "Zarathustra" in "Scheherazade," and in many another piece. The horns, in particular, throughout the numbers, outdid themselves in the varied beauty, the adroit range, the perfect surety of their tones, and the horns are coming more and more to divide with the strings the tonal life, the expressive power of the modern orchestra. The rest of the winds were at one with them, and the gradual suffusion of their tone over the strings in the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Good-Friday Spell" was of the beauty that makes the pure emotion of sound. The brass of the orchestra was choral in its richness and magnificence of tone. The strings sang with one voice and yet a voice that could range from the sustained shimmer of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" to the broken cries of passion of the Prelude to "Tristan." The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" seemed to swell endlessly in its pomps of tone; and Siegfried had his clangorous requiem. And the orchestra did all this better because Mr. Fiedler has become a more expert and sensitive conductor of Wagner's music than he was when he came first to Boston. Like all his predecessors, he has ripened under his work here. He was more dramatically incisive of phrase last evening than he has usually been in Wagner's music; he caught better its advances, its recessions, its rhetorical pauses; he kept it more songful, more molten than he has ever kept it before. There were dramatic, musical, even epic eloquence in it, as he read.

Franck and Tonal Drama

There is a drama in "absolute" music, too, and a drama that, as some of us like to believe, is finding fuller and freer expression in the newer symphonies that will not be bound by the old conventions of form. Some ears detected it and stirred to it in the relation and the play of the musical ideas—otherwise the themes—the characterizing melodies, of Mr. Rachmaninoff's fine symphony of last year. It runs surely, clearly, most impressively and thrillingly through Mr. d'Indy's second and greater symphony, and as surely, though in a different voice, it was possible to feel it in Franck's symphony on Saturday evening. The "cyclic form" of Franck and his disciples, their use of germinating themes and of variations of them, are far more susceptible to these dramas in tones than is the old symphonic form developed from the sonata, even when Mr. Rachmaninoff is bending it to his dramatizing will. Not a "programme" for the music to follow not even such a cross between the contemporary tone-poem and the old symphony as is Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" is such a liberating force as is this "cyclic form" of Franck and d'Indy. To hear either of their symphonies is almost to believe with them that Beethoven would have gone forward to it from the quartets of his final years.

For in this symphony of Franck or in that symphony of d'Indy's, what does one hear but a contest of melodic ideas, and is not contest the essence of dramatic effect? Follow the course of the great melody of Franck's symphony through all its transformation, hear it ascend from the low voice, the shadowed color in which it begins, hear it conquer the other, the hindering, the clouding, the contesting themes that would hinder its progress and overcast its light; hear it finally merge victorious in the fullness of its powers, in the glory of its effulgence, in broad choral-like song of triumph. And what has the ear heard but a drama in tones in which it serves the answering mind, the enkindled imagination, as the eye serves mind and spirit in the theatre. Like this symphony of Franck, and far more epic in its quality as a drama in tones, is Mr. d'Indy's. The listener returns to it, whenever it is performed at the Symphony Concerts, as he returns to a great and triumphant drama of the masters in the theatre.

The dramatic impulse has transformed the music of the opera house almost in our immediate time. It has given us Wagner and Strauss, the later Verdi and Puccini, Dukas and the other innovating Frenchmen. It has sent us back open-eared to Gluck, even to the Beethoven of "Fidelio." Symphony music could not escape the change; the Russians like Tschaikowsky, a whole swarm of other composers helped to find the dramatizing voice. Fate willed that the obscure Franck, because he had the open mind of a child and the courage of a man, because he loved the beauty and the power of music for their own sake, should find in his "cyclic form" the symphonic way to this glorious end. His symphony in D minor is a "great charter" of musical liberty.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 4, 1911

Symphony Hall: Elgar's Symphony Again

ELGAR'S new symphony, especially after the slow movement, was a little more warmly received at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening than it had been on Friday afternoon, but the applause at the end of the opening Allegro and of the Rondo-Scherzo was as frigidly polite at the second as at the first hearing; while even Mr. Fiedler must have stretched his conscience a little when he took what passed for a recall at the end. And a second hearing and a no less penetrating and eloquent performance did not much alter the impression of the first. There was fresh cause to admire the vigor, the variety and the aptness of the scoring and to feel its firm and glowing sonority, especially in the long chain of sequent phrases that rises into the songful proclamation toward the end of the last movement and then fades into the mellow close. There Elgar has written music that ranks with the better parts of his first symphony and with his better overtures. There, too, the richness of the orchestral dress and the sustained intensity of the musical idea cloak the monotony of these endlessly enchained phases.

Such sequence is the method that Elgar follows throughout the symphony and too often in the rest of the music he merely threshes about, sonorously and restlessly, in them, beginning and ending nowhere and yielding little musical or emotional impression. They rise, they swell, they droop, they rise again and so forth and so onward. This reiterated procedure was characteristic of Elgar's first symphony, too, but there he did not push it to such monotony and he also made it a part of a large musical and emotional design. Whatever may have been in his imagination, as he wrote the second symphony, it is hard to discover any such ample and cumulative planning in it. It seems to have been written by musical rule o' thumb. Perhaps Elgar, to escape this monotony of voice, needs new tasks. That ballet, after Rabelais, that he has been meditating long, might so free him. Yet, with all the disappointment that the symphony brought, it is not quite fair to reproach Mr. Fiedler with his zeal for it. Elgar is an eminent composer; his new pieces, whatever their merits to variously listening ears, deserve a hearing. Moreover the performances here far excelled those under Sir Edward himself last spring in London.

H. T. P.

Miss Morena, the soprano of German operas at the Metropolitan, who has not appeared here in two or three seasons, will be the singer at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 29 and 30.

Orchestra for Orchestra

A full page of the programme-book of the Symphony Concerts last week, printed conspicuously in clear black type with wide white margins, contained this persuasive suggestion to the audiences: "The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra bespeak the cordial and substantial support of its subscribers for the concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Tuesday evening, Dec. 12, by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, Frederick Stock, conductor, as the representative orchestra of the West and in recognition of services in the cause of good music in Boston, in earlier days, by its founder, Theodore Thomas." Very rarely, indeed, has the management of one orchestra thus urged its public to attend a concert of another. The Boston Orchestra is broad-minded, and in particular it recalls the warmth with which the public of the Thomas Orchestra has received it when, on occasion, it has visited Chicago. It would have Mr. Stock and his band so received here. They deserve to be welcomed heartily, but to be persuaded to hear a "foreign" orchestra this town requires a "power" or stirring.

As in years past, the Aborn Company has taken the Boston Opera House for performances of opera in English and "at popular prices" through eight weeks beginning on Easter Monday, April 8. It will widen its repertory with "Hänsel and Gretel," "Louise," "Cendrillon," "Tosca" and other operas.

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 5, 1911

The "Symphony Trip"

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" is the most conspicuous item on the programmes of the concerts that the Symphony Orchestra will undertake in other cities this week. It will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, New York and Brooklyn. New York will also hear Mr. Fiedler's admirable performance of Brahms's Symphony in E minor, and in Baltimore, with the assistance of a woman's chorus, he will repeat Liszt's "Dante" symphony. Brahms's "Academic" overture and Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," are the other frequent pieces in the programmes for the journey. Miss Parlow, the violinist, will play with the orchestra at each concert, sometimes in Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," sometimes in Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor.

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 3 1911

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give on Friday evening, December 8, in the Academy of Music, will be made up of four numbers. Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made a profound impression, not merely on the music loving public of Brooklyn, but of this country wherever she has played, will be the soloist. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, has the credit of contributing three astounding violinists in Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist. While the three violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher, each has a distinct individuality, and none more distinct than Miss Parlow. She has the complete technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, have and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. She also has a profound musical insight that seems to be characteristic of Auer's pupils. In addition to this she is richly temperamental and gifted with fine taste. Miss Parlow has got beyond the point where she may be regarded simply as a great "woman" violinist. She is easily able to hold her own with any violinist. Here she will play Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie."

The principal offering on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade," Symphonic Suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental. The composer knew his Orient well and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a most vivid delineation of the subject. The suite is in four parts and is written in supreme virtuoso style, not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the various solo instruments.

The last two numbers on the programme will be Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. DEC 5 191

Date

The programme the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give next Friday evening, Dec. 8, in the Academy of Music will be of four numbers. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made such a profound impression not merely on the music-loving public of Brooklyn, but of this country wherever she has played. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such astounding violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist, has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of teachers of the violin. While all three of these violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher, each has a distinct individuality, and none has a more distinct one than Miss Parlow. She has the complete technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist have, and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. She also has a profound musical insight that seems to be characteristic of Auer's pupils. In addition to this she is richly temperamental and gifted with fine taste. Miss Parlow has got beyond the point where she may be ragarded simply as a great "woman" violinist. She is easily able to hold her own with any violinist in the world, be they man or woman. Here she will play Bruch's Scottish fantasie. The principal offering on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and A Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his Orient well, and as "picture-music" his "Scheherazade" is a most vivid delineation of the subject which is its programme. The suite is in four parts and is written in the most supreme virtuoso style, not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the various solo instruments. The last two numbers on the programme will be Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, as soloist, will give concerts at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. The overture to Cherubini's "Lodoiska," Brahm's E minor symphony (No. 4), Saint-Saëns's B minor viola concerto, and Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" make the programme for Thursday evening. Friday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie," and Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture will be heard.

The Marum Quartet, assisted by Paolo Gallico, pianist, will give its opening concert Thursday evening, Dec. 7, at Cooper Union. Quartets by Haydn and Tschaikowsky and Grieg's C minor sonata for piano and violin are on the programme.

From

Address

Date

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give next Friday evening in the Academy of Music will be made up of four numbers. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made such a profound impression not merely on the music-loving public of Brooklyn, but of this country wherever she has played. The principal offering on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade" symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night."

[96]

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 3 1911

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7 and Saturday afternoon, December 9, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow.

The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cherubini's almost forgotten but exceedingly charming overture "Lodoiska," Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor for violin and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Fiedler resurrected the "Lodoiska" overture of Cherubini for his fourth concert in Boston. It is one of the many works of its period that have been almost forgotten and most undeservedly so. The opera "Lodoiska" was produced at the Theatre Feydeau, in Paris, on July 18, 1791. It was this opera that made the composer famous throughout Europe and on account of it he was hailed as the revolutionizer of Italian opera and the reformer, if not the founder, of the French school.

LEONARD BORWICK.
English pianist who makes his first appearance here in Carnegie Hall on Friday.

On the Saturday afternoon programme the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade," in which the Russian composer, inspired by the "Thousand Nights and a Night," has written one of the most brilliant works in orchestral literature. Nothing that the orchestra plays exhibits to such advantage its virtuosic qualities and its lovely tone color. At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie.

The final number on the programme will be Brahms's Academic Festival Overture.

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 3

Symphonie-Konzerte.

In den beiden dieswöchigen Konzerten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, welche Donnerstag Abend resp. Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall stattfinden, ist Frl. Kathleen Parlow die mitwirkende Solistin, und zwar spielt sie im erstgenannten Konzert „das Saint-Saëns'sche H-Moll-Violinkonzert resp. am Samstag Bruch's Schottische Phantasie". Im Donnerstag-Konzert dirigirt Herr Fiedler Cherubini's „Lodoiska"" - Ouverture, Brahms' Vierte Symphonie und Tschaikowsky „Romeo und Julie"-Phantasie, im Samstags-Konzert Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonische Suite „Scheherazade" und Brahms' „Akademische Fest-Ouverture".

Herr Damrosch wird im Konzert der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft am Nachmittag des kommenden Sonntag im Century-Theater als eine Novität, welche gewiß das höchste Interesse für sich in Anspruch nehmen darf, Sir Edward Elgar's neueste, Zweite Symphonie, welche ihre Erstaufführung am 24. September in London erlebt hat und letzte Woche in Cincinnati und Boston gespielt wurde, dem New Yorker Publikum vorführen. Auf dem Titelblatt der Partitur liest man den Vermerk: „Dem Andenken des verstorbenen Königs Edwards VII. gewidmet." Eine Fußnote besagt ferner, diese Anfangs 1910 ausgelegte Symphonie sollte ein Tribut der Treue sein und trägt ihre gegenwärtige Widmung mit der gnädigen Zustimmung Sr. Majestät des Königs." Als Motto sind dem Werke die ersten zwei Zeilen aus Shelley's „Invo-[illegible]" vorgesetzt: „Rarely, rarely comest

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date DEC 3 - 1911

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow.

The programme for Thursday evening comprises Chernbini's overture, "Lodoiska," Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saens Concerto in B-minor for violin, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Fiedler revived the "Lodoiska" Overture of Cherubini for his fourth concert in Boston. The opera "Lodoiska" was produced at the Theatre Feydeau, in Paris, on July 18, 1791.

On the Saturday afternoon programme the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a violinist and teacher, but the credit of having turned out three such violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of teachers of the violin. While all there of these violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher each has a distinct individuality and none has a more distinct one than Miss Parlow.

The final number of the programme will be Brahm's Academic Festival [illegible].

Estal ... 84

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 3 1911

Daniel Gregory Mason will give the lecture recital on the programme of the philharmonic concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the opera house, Academy of Music, on Friday evening next. The lecture recital is set for the music hall of the Academy, on Thursday, at 4 P. M.

Esta ... 1

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date

Brahms is the lion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall. The Thursday programme includes Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," which made a great noise in Paris just before the French Revolution; the Brahms symphony No. 4, the Saint Saens concerto for violin and Tschaikowsky's fantasy of "Romeo and Juliet."

Kathleen Parlow is the soloist for three days, finishing at the Saturday matinée, when the music will be the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scotch" fantasy, Bruch, and "Academic Festival" overture, Brahms.

Establishe ...

From

Address

Date

Mme. Schumann-Heink is to be the special feature of the popular concert at the Metropolitan Opera House this Sunday evening. After this appearance she will take her usual vacation until after the Christmas holidays. On November 26 she was the soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Mass. and was presented with a loving cup two feet high on which was inscribed the following: "Madame Schumann-Heink from the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in everlasting gratitude and admiration. November 26, 1911." Mme. Schumann-Heink will renew her tour on January 5 and 6, when she sings with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia.

Esta ... 884

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City.

Date DEC 2

Kathleen Parlow, the Canadian violinist, will be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The symphony at the evening concert will be Brahms's fourth. In the afternoon there will be no symphony. Rimsky - Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" will be the principal number.

York

[97]

From POST

Address WORCESTER, MASS.

Date NOV 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT BRILLIANT SUCCESS

That the Ellis concerts are the important musical events of the season in Worcester, was demonstrated last night by a large and enthusiastic audience that assembled in Mechanics hall, for the second concert in the course.

The Boston symphony orchestra made its first appearance in the city this season at the concert and with Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, gave a program that included works familiar and pleasing to concert goers. The orchestra opened the program with Beethoven's "Eroica," symphony in four movements.

The skill with which the different instruments were handled was delightful and the applause which followed the finale appeared to be for the musicians rather than for the work rendered.

The welcome given the Boston symphony orchestra is said to be different from that given any other band of musicians and the audience seemed determined to impress it upon them last night.

According to a rule of the orchestra there were no encore numbers, but Conductor Max Feidler returned to the stage several times to bow acknowledgements.

Miss Parlow appeared after intermission and made her debut before Worcester music lovers. The young violinist made a pleasing impression and her playing was a rare treat. Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, was the selection.

Scottish folk songs were interwoven in the four movements and the gentle tones of the cradle songs and the stirring notes of the highlanders were sounded by violin and orchestra. Miss Parlow is slender and graceful and made a charming picture as she stood on the stage. She wore a white satin gown made simply and trimmed with gold lace.

The closing numbers for the orchestra were the Debussy prelude to "The afternoon of a faun," which was played at the music festival, last autumn and "Einlandia," a symphonic poem by Sibelius.

The orchestra will give its second concert Tuesday night, January 23, and Josef Hofmann will be the soloist.

Estal ... Establis

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 3 -

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cherubini's almost forgotten but exceedingly charming overture "Lodoiska," Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saens's Concerto in B minor for violin, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Fiedler resurrected the "Lodoiska" overture of Cherubini for his fourth concert in Boston. It is one of the many works of its period that almost have been forgotten, and most undeservedly so. The opera "Lodoiska" was produced in the Theatre Feydeau, in Paris, on July 18, 1791. It was this opera that made the composer famous throughout Europe, and on account of it he was haled as the revolutionizer of Italian opera and the reformer, if not the founder, of the French school.

On the Saturday afternoon programme the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade," in which the Russian composer, inspired by the "Thousand Nights and a Night," has written one of the most brilliant works in orchestral literature. Few things the orchestra plays exhibit to such advantage its virtuosic qualities. At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie. Leopold Auer of St. Petersburg has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of teachers of the violin. Although all three of these violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher, each has distinct individuality, and none more so than Miss Parlow. She has the complete technique her colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, boast, and the large tone characteristic of both. The final number on the programme will be Brahms's Academic Festival Overture.

Es ... 18

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cherubini's almost forgotten Overture to "Lodoiska," Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saens's Concerto in B Minor for Violin, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The opera 'Lodoiska" made the composer famous throughout Europe. On the Saturday afternoon programme the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," inspired by the "Thousand Nights and a Night." At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie." The final number will be Brahms's Academic Festival [illegible]

Es ... 188

From Daily Citizen,

Address Jamaica, N. Y.

Date DEC 2 1911

On the evening of Dec. 6 Mme. Nordica will formally open the singing class of the Political Equality League at the league's new quarters in East Forty-first street, Manhattan. She has promised to sing several songs for the eighty students who are already enrolled for the year's work.

Until Dec. 14, when she will be heard with the Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall in the first of a series of three concerts, the prima donna will rest. Her programme with the society will include the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," besides, probably, several songs with her own accompanist, Romayne Simmons. These will be the only appearances the diva will make in Manhattan this season, singing only once, March 3, in Brooklyn. She will give a number of concerts in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra, in February, however.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 8, 1911

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Symphony Orchestra in New York

THE first of the two concerts by Mr. Fiedler and the Symphony Orchestra in New York this week befell last evening at Carnegie Hall. On the programme were Brahms's symphony in E minor, Cherubini's overture to his opera, Lodoiska," Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" and Saint-Saëns's concerto for violin in B minor in which Miss Parlow played the solo part. The performance of the symphony, in particular, stirred the audience to very warm applause and the reviewers to very warm praise. Says Mr. Henderson in the Sun this morning: "It would be difficult to recall a more inspiriting performance of this beautiful symphony. The tonal qualities of the Boston Orchestra were heard at their best, and although there were a few moments of uncertainty in attack in the first movement the customary unanimity and precision of the organization were restored before the movement came to a close. The glorious third movement was played superbly, but the climax of the interpretation was reached in the last movement, which was delivered with something very like inspiration. Such a proclamation of the gospel according to Brahms Mr. Fiedler has not given us before and it ought to remain in the memory of every one who heard it." Mr. Krehbiel in the Tribune is as well-disposed: "The conductor and the orchestra not only played the symphony, but played it gloriously, as if they themselves found delight in the pleasure which they knew they were providing for their hearers. As for the audience, there was no chance to debate for a moment whether or not it was appreciative of the composition and its performance; the applause which followed every movement settled that question. The reading on the part of Mr. Fiedler and the exposition on the part of the orchestra were equally eloquent and admirable, and the incident of its performance will be underscored with a broad line in the memory of all the lovers of symphonic music who heard it."

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

Establish

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cherubini's almost forgotten but exceedingly charming overture "Lodoiska," Brahms's fourth symphony, Saint-Saëns's concerto in B minor for violin and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." On the Saturday afternoon programme the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," in which the Russian composer, inspired by the "Thousand Nights and a Night," has written one of the most brilliant works in orchestral literature. At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's Scottish fantasie. The final number on the programme will be Brahms's academic festival overture.

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date DEC 2 1911

Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, when she will play the Saint-Saëns violin concerto in B minor, and also on the following Saturday afternoon, when her number will be Bruch's Scottish Fantasia. The orchestral pieces to be conducted on Thursday are the overture to the opera "Lodoiska" (which made Cherubini famous throughout Europe), Brahms's fourth symphony, and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Saturday's orchestral numbers are Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeously colored suite "Scheherazade" (on the "Thousand and One Nights") and Brahms's Academic Festival Overtu

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 9 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH MISS PARLOW

Canadian Violiniste Plays the Bruch Concerto.

EXOTIC PROGRAMME HEARD UNDER FIEDLER'S BATON

Rimsky-Korsakoff and Debussy in Strange Contrast to the More Solid Music of Weber's Immortal "Oberon."

For the second time this season Max Fiedler brought his Boston Symphony players to the Academy of Music last night with Miss Kathleen Parlow as soloist. The big opera house was filled to the last seat—orchestra, both balconies and even the impossible top boxes, which on opera nights are as empty as father's pocketbook after Christmas. But the Bostonians always were wizards.

Last night's programme contained the now famous "Scheherazade" suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Bruch's Scottish fantasie, in which Miss Parlow showed herself both at her best and at her worst; Debussey's bewitching "Afternoon of a Faun," and the incomparable "Oberon" overture. The Russian's musical version of the Thousand and One Nights has been heard quite often last and this season, and is no longer a subject for discussion. Mr. Fiedler's wonderful authority and ability to conjure up colorful pictures, gave it a meaning which readings by some other conductors have failed to impart to it, and the brilliant finale, played with rare depth of tone and sonorous power, proved one of the finest bits of the evening's artistry.

Miss Parlow's rendition of the first three movements of the Scottish Fantasie, the second and third being played as one—was a rare delight. This slim girl possesses the fine gift of cantabile playing without maudlin sentimentality and consequently the melodic beauties of both the Adagio and the Andante sostenuto were brought out with most charming effect. But her limitations became disturbingly apparent in the last movement—the stirring allegro guerriero. No warlike, rousing notes came from her instrument. There was no tramping of marching Campbells and no swing of highland enthusiam. True, she played the kirls with rare skill, and in almost perfect imitation, but the breadth of tone, the virile power which every note of this movement imperatively demands, were missing. Miss Parlow's youth, her sex, perhaps, or some other reason, prompted her to present an almost inconceivable conception of this number.

Debussy's sketchy, cobweb-like and bewilderingly beautiful "Faun" prelude, was played by Fiedler's musicians with a finesse and clarity of tone that brought out every one of the song indications with marvelous beauty against the background of gossamer orchestration. Weber's "Oberon" overture came as a fitting finis of old-fashioned flourish and immortal harmony.

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 2 1911

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give next Friday evening, Dec. 8, in the Academy of Music will be made up of four numbers. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist who has already made such a profound impression, not merely on the music-loving public of Brooklyn, but of this country, wherever she has played. Miss Parlow has the technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, have—and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. She also has a musical insight that seems to be characteristic of Leopold Auer's pupils. In addition to this, she is temperamental and gifted with fine taste. Miss Parlow has got beyond the point where she may be regarded simply as a great "woman" violinist. She is easily able to hold her own with any violinist in the world. Here she will play Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie."

The principal offering on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his Orient well, and as "picture-music" his "Scheherazade" is a most vivid delineation of the subject which is its programme. The suite is in four parts and is written in the most supreme virtuoso style, not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the various solo instruments.

The last two numbers on the programme will be Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

From _____

Address _____

Date NEW YORK HERALD DEC 3

ORCHESTRAL concerts by native and by visiting orchestras, song recitals in almost every sung language, chamber music and instrumental recitals—all go to make a wealth of music that seems to touch the musical high water mark of the year this week.

First there are the two Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Carnegie Hall, Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, with Miss Kathleen Parlow, Canadian violinist, soloist on both occasions. On Thursday night Mr. Max Fiedler will conduct Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Cherubini's "Lodoiska" overture and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," while Miss Parlow will play Saint-Saëns' violin concerto.

At the Saturday matinee the Boston Orchestra will play Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Suite Scheherezade," and Brahms' "Academic Overture," and Miss Parlow will contribute Bruch's Scotch Fantasie.

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date DEC 3 1911

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9 respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow.

The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cherubini's overture, "Lodoiska," Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saëns Concerto in B Minor for violin, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Fiedler resurrected the "Lodoiska" overture of Cherubini for his fourth concert in Boston. The opera "Lodoiska" was produced at the Theatre Feydeau, in Paris, on July 18, 1791.

On the Saturday afternoon programme, the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie." The final number on the programme will be Brahms's Academic Festival Overture.

Arthur Whiting, harpsichord, assisted

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date _____

Boston Symphony.

The second pair of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9, respectively. At both concerts the soloist will be Kathleen Parlow.

The programme for Thursday evening comprises Cherubini's almost forgotten but exceedingly charming overture "Lodoiska," Brahm's Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saens's concerto in B minor for violin, and Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Fiedler resurrected the "Lodoiska" overture of Cherubini for his fourth concert in Boston. It was this opera that made the composer famous throughout Europe, and on account of it he was hailed as the revolutionizer of Italian opera and the reformer, if not the founder, of the French school.

On the Saturday afternoon programme the principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous symphonic suite "Scheherazade," in which the Russian composer inspired by the "Thousand Nights and a Night," has written one of the most brilliant works in orchestral literature. Nothing that the Orchestra plays exhibits to such advantage its virtuosic qualities and its lovely tone color. At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie.

The final number on the programme will be Brahms's Academic Festival Overture.

From EVENING STAR,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date DEC 2 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Baltimore is to have the rare privilege of hearing Liszt's great Dante symphony at the next Boston Symphony Concert in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 6th. In the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Philharmonic Chorus of this city. Equally interesting will be the first appearance here of Kathleen Parlow, the extraordinary young violinist.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date _____

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme will include Cherubini's overture, "Lodoiska," Brahms' Fourth symphony, Saint-Saens's violin concerto and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist, as also on Saturday afternoon, when she will play the Bruch Scotch fantasy, and the rest of the programme will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade, and Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture." Friday evening the orchestra, with Miss Parlow as soloist, will appea in Brooklyn.

From EVENING SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date DEC 2

SECOND BOSTON CONCERT

Soloist Will Be Kathleen Parlow, A Young Canadian Violinist.

The program which Max Fiedler has arranged for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, to be given at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, will introduce to Baltimore as soloist Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor No. 3.

Liszt's "Dante" will be the symphony. It is in two parts, the first being the "Inferno" and the second the "Purgatorio" and "Magnificat." The conclusion, which is the "Magnificat," will be sung by the Women's Philharmonic Chorus of this city. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's overture "Romeo and Juliet."

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 10 191

MUSIC

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Miss Parlow and Bruch's Scottish Fantasia.

There was no new music at the second afternoon concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday, and the solo performer repeated a composition which she had played before another local audience a month ago; but the concert was none the less an interesting one, fascinating by reason of the qualities which make all the concerts of the Boston Orchestra, whether or not some of their features invite discussion or even dispraise (which is seldom), interesting, perhaps not in despite of the fact, but because they invite discussion. The elements which are seeking just now more successfully than ever to prey upon the purveyors of music for the reason that the rampant spirit of commercialism has seized upon managers, performers, conductors and the backers of large musical institutions (those who would like to appear as philanthropists, but are too often seekers after polite notoriety), alike, are putting forth strenuous efforts to stifle honest criticism, but the musical public, upon whose support everything that is sound, sane, sweet and healthy must forever rest, as yet shows no disposition to be deceived by the braying of asses or the yelps of hounds after blood money, and there is no cause for discouragement. "The year's at the spring, And day's at the morn. . . . God's in his heaven, All's [illegible] with the world," up to the present

Perhaps the Boston Orch[illegible] need no such introduction, but it may serve a purpose in the way of contrast. At any rate, the audiences which gather in Carnegie Hall to listen to them disclose that healthy appreciation of good music which justifies confidence in the honesty, taste and intelligence of the people which honest, intelligent and impartial criticism seeks to promote in the face of the forces which are seeking to discredit it.

Mr. Fiedler, as he has done before, sought to make a larger appeal to the popular liking for easy entertainment than he did at the concert on Thursday evening. He brought forth the fascinatingly picturesque "Scheherezade" of Rimsky-Korsakow, with its glowing colors and its invitation to the fancy; the "Scotch Fantasia," for violin and orchestra, by Max Bruch, so well calculated to warm and also to irritate in a way the lovers of British folksong, and the "Academic Festival Overture," by Brahms, equally interesting as artistic music and as a celebration of German university life, with its fantastic functions and its ingratiating melodies. In all this there was nothing that called for profound reflection. Instead, every measure proclaimed and promoted peace of mind, contentment and joy in life. Of course, the virtuoso qualities of the orchestra shone resplendent in the music of the arch Oriental soloist, Rimsky-Korsakow, but without working an estoppal to the conviction which many of the keen listeners must have felt that, so far as the solo wind instruments are concerned, New York has superior artists in both the Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestras. The Boston men benefited greatly, however, from the excellence of the ensemble of which they formed a part, and Mr. Witek deserved fragrant guerdons for the manner in which he played the solos.

Miss Parlow, who is set down to be a particularly pervasive factor in this season's activities, played the Bruch Fantasia more effectively than she did a month ago at a concert of the Symphony Society in the Century Theatre; but she had the advantage of a better concert room acoustically and greater confidence in her own powers, resulting from her experience in the tour which she has just concluded with the Boston organization. The fine sweep of her bow arm, her fearless attack, her delicate sensibility, all made their accustomed appeal to the admiration of her hearers. Yet her intonation was not flawless. Has any player's ever been in this composition? Ysaye's was not when he introduced the composition here as a novelty, and of all the violinists of the day he seemed to be the one to whose measure the composition was cut. Designed, most obviously designed, to address itself to the popular heart, the Fantasia is as full of pitfalls for the virtuoso as it is of a certain mystification for the analyst. It seems to have been a fruit of Bruch's experience when from 1800 to 1803 he was conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. He described it as a "Fantasia . . . for the violin, with orchestra and harp, with the free use of Scottish folk-melodies." When it was first played in England, where it had been announced as a "Scottish concerto," the critics were so nonplussed that one of them boldly asserted that it was "neither a concerto nor Scotch." He and his colleagues were hard put to it to find the Scottish airs, evidently expecting to find them standing out boldly on the pages of a work to which they had given the title. Evidently they overlooked the phrase "free use." Said one of the critics: "The melodies 'Auld Rob Morris,' 'There Was a Lad,' 'Who'll Buy My Calleo Herrin'?' 'Scots Wha Hae' are hardly recognizable." Well, all of them are not, perhaps because they do not occur in the composition. The second and third would have to undergo a greater metamorphosis than Bruch has subjected "Scots Wha Hae" to before a parellel could be found between them and anything which speaks out of the Fantasia. "Auld Rob Morris" was probably in the mind of the composer when he wrote his Adagio. It is a fine specimen of Scottish tune, and affectionate fancy has gone so foolishly far as to attribute its invention to Rizzio, the unfortunate friend and music master of Mary Queen of Scots. The Scherzo of the Fantasia is simply entitled "Dance," but no Scotchman will ever find in it a suggestion of his national dances, the reel and strathspey, which are in a very different measure. Bruch made his martial finale out of the tune, which he probably found associated only with Burns's "Scots Wha Hae," but for which, as "Hey Tuttie Taitie," a vast antiquity has been claimed. Bruch changed it radically, but no more than Burns changed the sentiment of its words when he wrote "Scots Wha Hae" for it, and not as much as Lady Nairne did when she adapted it to "The Land o' the Leal." As a matter of fact, Bruch did not transcribe Scottish melodies or write variations on them, but took fragments of tunes that pleased him or seemed serviceable and combined them into themes—sometimes, as we think, going to the folk-songs of England and Wales, as well as Scotland, for his material. And yet the Fantasia is Scotch, and a boon to violin virtuosi.

H. E. K.

[89]

From PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Address
Date NOV 5 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT AT ACADEMY

Rimsky - Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade' Chief Feature of the Program

MISS PARLOW, SOLOIST

Ably Interprets the Long 'Fantasia on Scottish Airs,' by Max Bruch

RIMSKY - KORSAKOFF has of late years become a familiar name on concert programs. He is chiefly represented by his symphonic suits—"Scheherazade"—in whole or in part—and this melodious and "atmospheric" composition has been made to serve a variety of purposes.

The Boston Symphony made its second visit of the year to the Acadamy of Music last evening, offering the charming musical setting of "The Thousand and One Nights" as its chief orchestral feature. It may be recalled that last season the Russian ballet utilized much of this score as dance music, and portions of the suite frequently figure on symphony programs among the "miscellaneous selections."

The entire four parts of this interesting achievement were submitted last night. The incidents of the tales have been purposely rather vaguely depicted by Rimsky-Korsakoff, but the orchestral tone and coloring are usually sufficiently definite to suggest at least the spirit of the polyphonic picture attempted.

On the original score, these captions appear as "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," and "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," while the fourth movement bears this more detailed description—"Festival at Bagdad; the Sea; the Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior; Conclusion."

Picturesqueness is, perhaps, the salient quality of the work. The languorous beauty and calm of the Indian ocean is portrayed with delicately subtle art in the sea motive, which dominates much of the composition, while the dash and abandon of the "Festival at Bagdad," with its syncopated rhythms, exemplifies the easy mental transition from the Muscovite to the oriental mind, and the essential verity of Napoleon's famous dictum anent the scratching of a Russian.

Max Fiedler infused his reading of the work with all the exigent qualities of undiluted romance, and its performance was cordially received by the large audience.

Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, whose development since her first appearance here about a year ago has been so rapid, was the soloist. She interpreted with rich and dignified art the long "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," by the rather ponderous Max Bruch. The melodic basis of this work is highland songs and rhythms, much disguised, it is true, sufficiently developed to lend more color to the concerto than is common in Bruch's compositions.

Miss Parlow displayed the virile and eloquent tonal assets of her art, and her proficiency in bowing. The latter was especially well exhibited in the cantabile melodies of the adagio movement. There is not a great deal of pyrotechnic exaction in the composition, which speaks well for Miss Parlow's choice of it. This accomplished virtuoso is artistically above such a medium to express the possibilities of her playing.

The concert closed with Brahm's brilliant academic overture, with its stirring treatment of the universal college theme, "Gaudeamus Igitur."

From EVENING STAR,
Address Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 9 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three numbers compose the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at the second concert of its annual series. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist who has already made a profound impression on the music-loving public of this country. She is described as richly temperamental and gifted with fine taste. Here she will play Saint-Saen's "Concerto in B Minor No. 3."

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his orient well and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a vivid delineation. The last number on the program will be Brahms'

[89]

From STANDARD UNION,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 9 1911

Estabi

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SECOND CONCERT.

A Russian's conception of the Arabian Nights, a fantasie on Scottish ballads, the delightful obscurities and vague coloring of the newest of the French modernists and an old-favorite classical overture—that sums up the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert of the season in the Academy last evening. As may be judged, it was an evening of rich orchestral coloring. The interpretation of the Oriental atmosphere in the "Scherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and later of the pale, fleeting tints of the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," included very nearly everything in orchestral effects as they are known to-day. Conductor Fiedler and his incomparable musicians gave a performance that will stand for some time as the acme of orchestral excellence. Other orchestras come and go, but there is only one Boston Symphony.

A rather unusual soloist was the slim young girl who played so brilliantly the Bruch concerto with the orchestra. Unlike most of the assisting artists that have been heard on these occasions, Miss Kathleen Parlow is a native American—Canadian, to be exact, though her early education was obtained in California. All of the temperament and the depth of musical feeling that are usually associated with the artists from abroad and that are sometimes thought to be their exclusive attribute, appeared to be hers, and she played with an authoritative manner that few violinists have been able to summon. Miss Parlow received a royal reception at the close of the concerto. The selection itself was one designed to bring out the singing tone of her instrument. What better than Scotch ballads for this purpose? Especially well done was the finale, the thematic material of which is the warlike "Scots Wha Hae," and it was this portion of the work that took the great audience by storm. Technically Miss Parlow's playing was superb. Though only twenty-one this remarkable artist has been appearing in public for fifteen years.

Though Debussy's prelude was liked for its unusual colorings and though the Weber "Oberon" overture is always sure of applause, it is the first number on last night's programme that will be the longest remembered by those fortunate enough to have heard the concert. One may readily imagine that the "Arabian Nights" contains rich material for descriptive music, and one can surely not find a composer who makes better use of his themes than Rimsky. Sindbad and his ship, the Kalander Prince, the love tale of the Young Prince and the Young Princess, and a festival at Bagdad, with the consequent wrecking of Sindbad, all these furnish the opportunities for melodies and motives, and when in the finale a combination of all the best that has gone before is made the effect is gorgeous. Curiously interesting is the theme that represents Scherazade, the story-teller, herself. This is played by a solo violin and continues on to the very end of the final movement. Wonderfully realistic are the motives that represent the sea and the ship and the waves. Despite the really great music that followed the symphonic suite on last night's programme, the little ship sailing on and on with the rhythmic accompaniment of waves persisted in sticking in the mind. The orchestra was applauded for nearly five minutes at the close of the suite.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From [illegible]
Address PHILADELPHIA.
Date

OPERA and CONCERT

"Parsifal" With Familiar Cast—An All-orchestral Program by the Local Band—Its Plans for Gala Concerts—Other Musical Items.

THREE numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music Monday night at the second concert of its annual series. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist who has already made such an impression. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersbourg, has been for many years a noted violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having trained three such violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of the teachers of the violin. While all three of these violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher, each has a distinct individuality, and none has a more distinct one than Miss Parlow. She has musical insight, is richly temperamental and gifted with taste. Here she will play Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie." The principal orchestral offering will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheheryzade," symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." As "picture music" "Scheherazade" is a vivid delineation of the subject which is its program. The suite is in four parts, and is written with "virtuoso" demands, for the various solo instruments. The last number will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 10 1911

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Rimsky Korsakoff and Brahms Played —Miss Parlow Again the Soloist.

There were but three numbers on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday, and the chief interest, so far as the music was concerned, lay in Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," that began it. It is not only the composer's finest work; it can properly be called the finest work that the younger Russian school—they that cast out Tschaikowsky from their fellowship as too much of a cosmopolitan—has to its credit. There are in it a large sweep of imagination, richness of musical idea, admirable skill in orchestration. It is programme music that leaves the listener free to let his fancy play and to submit himself wholly to what the composer had to express in a specifically musical way. The titles of the four movements are enough, even though, as Mr. Hale points out in his programme notes, they are largely indefinite. But the music stimulates. The rhapsodizing phrase that suggests the narrator is of itself a musical personality. The picture of the sea that is given by the broadly undulating first movement has, as such, hardly its equal in music; and the other movements are of graphic picturesqueness. Their Oriental quality is especially fascinating; the suggestion of the oriental reiteration and monotony is conveyed, and yet the music is not of itself monotonous or wearying. The quaint and characteristic instrumental solos that from time to time figure as the narrator were exquisitely played, especially those for the violin, the oboe, and the flute; and the performance as a whole had sonority and breadth.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, again played as soloist; she gave Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," which is receiving public notice this season to a degree beyond its deserts. It was heard for the third time yesterday afternoon, and the Winter is yet young. Miss Parlow, who is responsible for one of the previous performances, plays it with a splendid nerve and gusto, with fine tone and finished technique; and this time without the bit of sentimentalizing that she put into the piece when she gave it some weeks ago with the New York Symphony Orchestra. It is the ripest and most artistic performance that Miss Parlow has given here; and it is in many respects violin playing of the highest rank. It seems clearer at every appearance she makes that a place is reserved for her among the masters.

The concert was brought to an end with Brahms's "Academic Overture."

From EAGLE,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 9 - 1911

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Rainbow Hues Shimmer Through th Academy—Triumph of Kathleen Parlow.

Iris, the rainbow-hued goddess, in Virgil's epic poem, was sent by Jove from heaven to release the breath of one about to pass to the other world. All the hues of the rainbow flooded the opera house auditorium of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, last evening, when the second in a series of five Philharmonic concerts, under Institute auspices, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unlike the mythologic story in the "Aeneid," the opulence of color did not release souls to the other world but kept them in rapt enjoyment in this for two hours, free from cares in life. It might be appropriately mentioned that Professor Hooper would fill congenially the role of Jove in sending the Iris of the evening. Shifting color characterized the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" (after the "Thousand and One Nights"), opus 35, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, in the movements, "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalendar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" and "Festival at Bagdad and Storm at Sea," when the ship went to pieces on a rock. Piercing the floor of color, here and there, was the shimmering, white light of the Scheherazade motive, on the first violin. In the vivacious ending, where there were rapid changes from two-eighths to two-sixteenth and to three-eighth times, there was a dazzling mingling of colors.

Mr. Fiedler never held his men together better; they played as one man. He had a firm hand even in the mighty rush of sound and skillfully wove the colored threads in and out, now with pronounced effects and again with interlacing tints, in the tapestry picture that was presented on the instrumental loom. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," was like a landscape seen through an afternoon, mellow haze in Indian summer. All was intangible, floating, atmospheric and dreamy.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, violin soloist, fairly swept the audience away by her playing of Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Melodies," for violin and orchestra. She was recalled again and again. From whom did this daughter of "Our Lady of the Snows" inherit such German force and directness and such Latin emotion? Miss Parlow advances rapidly in technique and command and the most eminent of the violinists may soon be compelled to look after their laurels. Her tone on the upper strings is silky, those on the lower strings soft and mellow and her phrasing is very near to perfection. Her performance was as though technique had been forgotten and violin-speech translated into thought-language. Well did she interpret the composer in her leading up to and playing of the old Scotch airs, "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herrin?" and "Scots Wha Hae Wi' Wallace Bled."

Sparkling and graceful was the last number, Weber's overture to the o-

From STAATSZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 11 1911

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

In dem Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen, vierten diesjährigen Konzert der Bostoner dirigirte Herr Fiedler Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite „Scheherazade", wohl eines der erfreulichsten und vielfarbigsten Werke, das wir der neueren russischen Schule verdanken. Es ist so recht ein Werk für die Palette der Bostoner, die uns darin wahre Klangwunder bescheeren. Das ist einmal ein Ensemble, in dem jeder dem anderen in die Hände arbeitet, jeder dem anderen ebenbürtig ist, in dem es keine sogenannten todten Punkte gibt. Man schwelgte in Klangpracht, erfreute sich aber auch an der weisen Mässigung, die der Dirigent entfaltete und mit der er das Ueberwuchern der Farbe vor der Substanz verhinderte. Fast alle Vertreter der hervorragenden Instrumente erscheinen in diesem Werk zeitweilig als kleine Solisten, wir glauben aber keinem Unrecht zu thun, wenn wir aus ihnen Herrn Konzertmeister Witek hervorheben, der die Violinsoli mit prachtvollem Ton und bebendem Gefühl vortrug. Reicher Beifall lohnte den Meisterspielern.

Auch die „Akademische Festouverture" von Brahms fand eine durchaus vorzügliche Wiedergabe. Der Ernst, der diese Tonschöpfung durchzieht, gelangte ebenso zu seinem Recht als der gelegentliche Humor.

Frl. Kathleen Parlow, die kanadische Geigenfee, spielte Bruch's „Schottische Phantasie" mit einer für eine so junge Künstlerin bemerkenswerth gereiften Kunst. Da war kein Zagen und Schwanken zu verspüren, es klang alles in bewußtester Ausarbeitung, und nur der gelegentliche tonliche Uebereifer mahnte daran, daß man eine Künstlerin vor sich sehe, die noch nach dem Höchsten zu streben habe. Kathleen Parlow wird es erreichen. Das Publikum gab sich dem Zauber dieser Kunst mit ihrem fortreißenden Zug willig gefangen H.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resurrected the charming overture to Luigi Cherubini's almost forgotten opera, "Lodoiska," to open the concert of his band in Carnegie Music Hall next Thursday evening. The opera "Lodoiska" was produced at the Theater Feydeau, in Paris, on July 18, 1791. It was this opera that made the composer famous throughout Europe, and on account of it he was hailed as the revolutionizer of Italian opera and the reformer, if not the founder, of the French school.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Saint-Saens' melodically beautiful concerto in B-minor for violin and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," will form the balance of the program, the latter work to bring forward in the solo role, Miss Kathleen Parlow, who will be the soloist, also, of the Saturday matinee concert, the principal offering of which will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant symphonic suite "Scheherazade." At this concert Miss Parlow will play Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie." The final number on the program will be Brahms' Academic Festival Overture.

From EVENING BULLETIN,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony's Second Concert

Three numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its second concert of the season, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, when Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist who has already made a profound impression in Philadelphia, as well as every place in which she has appeared, will be the soloist. She will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie. The orchestra's principal offering will be Rimsky-Korsakow's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night," the last number on the program being Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

From AMERICAN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program that Mr. Fielder has arranged for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which is to be given in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, December 6, is of unusual attraction. It will introduce to Baltimore as soloist, Kathleen Parlow, the extraordinary young Canadian violinist, who is the reigning sensation of the musical world today.

Here she will plan St. Saen's Concerto in B minor, No. 3. This work, full of melody, is one of the most grateful concertos that have been written for the violin and it has always been a favorite with the greatest violinists. The symphony will be Liszt's Dante.

The Magnificat in the last movement will be sung by the Women's Philharmonic Chorus of this city.

The third and last number

TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 9, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

As usual, after one of the monthly journeys of the Symphony Orchestra to New York and the neighboring cities, Mr. Fiedler has chosen familiar music for the next concerts at home. They fall, of course, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and the programme comprises Beethoven's amiable symphony in B-flat; the orchestral arrangement of the "Love Scene" which is the climax of Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and which the conductor chose for his first concert here; Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel," his wittiest venture into musical irony and humor; and two pieces for violoncello and orchestra—Bruch's arrangement of the Jewish liturgical tune, "Kol Nidrei" and Böllmann's Symphonic Variations. In both Mr. Schroeder, the long and justly admired violoncellist of the orchestra, will play the solo part. His public, and the whole public, is loyal to him.

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

THE third of the annual series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra at Harvard is appointed for Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre. As usual, for these concerts, Mr. Fiedler has chosen orchestral numbers recently played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston, viz.: Franck's symphony, which the orchestra plays illuminatingly and feelingly and which is among the masterpieces of contemporary music and Tschaikowsky's pictorial and dramatic fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Between the two pieces, Miss Parlow, the violinist, will play Saint-Saëns's concerto in B minor. She is of the new and finer order of "soloists" at these Cambridge concerts.

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Brahms's second symphony (which the Theodore Thomas Orchestra from Chicago will play in Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon) is a work of genius which speaks to the heart as well as to the brain, and therefore appeals to all music lovers. The same cannot be said of the fourth Brahms symphony, which the Boston Orchestra played last night in Carnegie Hall; it is a work exclusively for the Brahmsites, who applaud indiscriminately and with equal fervor everything their idol ever wrote, be it made of gold, silver, copper, brass, or tin. In this symphony there are no gold bars, but there is quite a little silver and a good deal of copper. The brass does not enter till the last movement. But in spite of trombones, this movement is not, as marked, passionato, as even Hanslick was obliged to admit. He did, however, find this finale "like a dark well; the longer we gaze into it the more and the brighter stars we see."

Lucky man! Once, and once only, when Nikisch conducted it, did we see a few of those stars. Mr. Fiedler did not show them last night; he gave a rather dry reading of the work, regarding it, apparently, as a sort of musical counterpart of Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason." From the purely intellectual point of view his reading, like the symphony itself, was interesting, and, as already intimated, the audience applauded vigorously, and repeatedly called back the conductor.

Of its admirable make-up and training the orchestra had given proof before the symphony was played by its execution of Cherubini's antiquated "Lodoiska" overture; and at the other end of the programme, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture was played brilliantly. Kathleen Parlow was the soloist, and she chose the third Saint-Saëns for her concerto. We shall probably never again hear this lovely work given so entrancingly as it was once at a Philharmonic concert conducted by Colonne, when the violinist was Jacques Thibaud, and every bar was redolent of France. On that occasion we felt inclined to call it the finest of all concertos. Miss Parlow, of course, could not play it, nor Mr. Fiedler conduct it, with such Parisian elegance, grace, and esprit; yet it was an enjoyable performance of it they gave, apart from that odious comparison: Miss Parlow is still very young, and there is a girlish quality in some of her playing which will doubtless develop into maturity ere long. That she is a true artist, and that technique has no terrors for her, need not be said again. She played the exquisite andantino beautifully, and at the end of the concerto she was recalled repeatedly.

This evening she will play, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Bruch's "Fantasie on Scotch Airs," and the orchestra will add to it the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The Saturday afternoon programme in Carnegie Hall is the same, except that Brahms's splendid "Academic Festival" overture will be substituted for the Debussy and Weber numbers.

From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date 1911

Three numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music tomorrow night at the second concert of the season. The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist who has already made such a profound sensation not merely on the music-loving public of Philadelphia, but of this entire country wherever she has played. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such astounding violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of violin teachers. While all three of these violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher, each has a distinct individuality and none is more distinct than Miss Parlow. She has the complete technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, have and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. She also has a profound musical insight that seems to be characteristic of Auer's pupils. In addition to this, she is richly temperamental and gifted with fine taste. Miss Parlow has gone beyond the point where she may be regarded simply as a great "woman" violinist. She is easily able to hold her own with any violinist in the world. Here she will play Bruch's "Scottish" Fantasie.

KATHLEEN PARLOW.

The pricipal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" symphonic suite. In the whole literature of orchestra music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his Orient well and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a vivid delineation of the subject. The program is in four parts and is written in the most supreme virtuoso style not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the various solo instruments. The last number will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

AMERICAN

DECEMBER 10, 1911.

CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE.

Symphony Orchestra Sanders Theatre, December 14

The third Symphony concert of the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given next Thursday evening, December 14. The soloist will be Miss Kathleen Parlow, whose thirteenth consecutive appearance this will be with the orchestra. She will play Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor for violin and orchestra. The Symphony will be Franck's in D minor, the performance of which aroused such enthusiasm at a recent Symphony concert in Boston.

The final number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

SYMPHONY MEMBERS HOME.

Second Southern Trip Proves a Big Success.

The Symphony Orchestra returned from its second Southern trip late last night and will make a flying trip to Springfield, returning by special train the same night. The second Southern trip was as successful in every particular as the first. The only embarrassment the orchestra has at these concerts is that the capacity of the various halls at which it plays is not sufficient to accommodate all those who wish to hear the concerts.

Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, is scheduled as soloist for the ninth rehearsal and concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectfully. He will play Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and "Boellmann's Symphonic variations for violoncello and orchestra. The last-named piece will be heard for the first time at the Symphony concert. The first number on the program will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat major. The final numbers will be the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," which Mr. Fiedler played with so much success in the early part of his first season in Boston, and "Till Eulenspiegel."

From PRESS
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date DEC 5 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PARLOW SOLOIST

No Symphony, but a Symphonic Suite, and Violinist Plays Bruch Fantasia.

Program.

Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35
Bruch—Fantasie on Scottish Airs, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 46.
Brahms Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80
Conductor ..... Max Fiedler
Soloist ..... Kathleen Parlow

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was given at the Academy of Music last evening, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Kathleen Parlow as soloist. The program did not contain the usual Symphony, but instead the orchestra played the brilliant Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op. 35, as its first number. This was an agreeable deviation, for the Rimsky-Korsakoff is a long composition, in four movements, symphonic in character and is worthy in every way of a hearing each season. That Mr. Fiedler's selection of the Russian's suite was in every way approved must have been apparent to the conductor, for its playing brought to him one of the most enthusiastic ovations he has ever received in this city. At its conclusion he was called out a number of times and so emphatic was the demonstration of pleasure that upon one of his appearances he compelled the musicians to rise with him to share it, and still the audience would not desist until he compelled his concertmaster, A. Witek, who had contributed so much to its success, to rise, and hand-in-hand to bow acknowledgment.

The Boston Orchestra has never played anything better than "Scheherazade" in the years which they have been coming to this city. It is one of the most delicate and tuneful of all compositions of its character. Its enchanting theme-melody, introduced early in the first movement, and known as the "Sea Motive," is worked out in delightful variations through all four. It is a musical setting of the sea and shows that the composer was thoroughly familiar with his subject in the calm and turbulent phase of the restless waters, terminating with the wild hurrah as the ship dashes upon the fatal rock. The third movement was especially enjoyed, which is andante in character, with a constant recurrence of a song-like melody, around which is worked some highly original and daringly effective orchestration.

The final orchestra number was Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, a noble and stately work, which Mr. Fiedler gave its full dignity. It is thoroughly Teutonic and introduces the German social spirit through several of the popular student songs.

Miss Parlow chose for her number Bruch's popular Fantasie on Scottish Folk-melodies, which is of a character to show her finished art in its most delightful phase. Miss Parlow played here one month ago as soloist at the fourth pair of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Tschaikowsky's Concerto in D Major. This latter composition affords her much greater opportunity to display the wonderful power she has over her instrument, but last evening's selection is far more tuneful, appealing and enjoyable to the average concert-goer in its introduction of four popular Scotch melodies, worked into four movements which the violinist combined into two. Miss Parlow put all the delicate resources of her art into her work and played the Bruch number with a fine exhibition of execution, accompanied by all the dainty temper of the true artist.

The Boston Orchestra will not play again in this city until January 8, when Josef Hofmann will be the soloist.

From EVENING JOURNAL,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 1911

The second visit of the Boston Symphony under Max Fiedler takes place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with Miss Kathleen Parlow the soloist at both concerts. Brams' Fourth Symphony and Saint-Saens's B minor violin concecto will be the chief numbers of the first programme, and Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" suite and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," as well as Bruch's Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra, the principal features of the second programme.

From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date DEC 3 1911

Kathleen Parlow will be heard again to-morrow night at the Academy of Music—this time with Max Fiedler's able symphony orchestra from Boston. The visits of this wonderful young Canadian violinist cannot be too frequent.

[90]

Established: London, ... rk, 188

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC

WONDER ON VIOLIN TO PLAY AT LYRIC

Kathleen Parlow Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony.

The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which is to be given in the Lyric next Wednesday evening, is of unusual attraction. It will introduce to Baltimore as soloist Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who is the sensation of the musical world today. She has the complete technic that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, have and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. Here she will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor No. 3. This work has always been a favorite piece with the greatest violinists.

The symphony will be Liszt's "Dante." Liszt wrote two symphonies, the first inspired by Goethe's "Faust," the second inspired by Dante's "Divina Commedia." Of the two the "Faust" is the better known and probably it is the greater, but from many points of view the "Dante" symphony is the more interesting to the student, for the ultra-modern composer of today owes more to this work than to any other that Lisst wrote.

The symphony is in two parts. The first is called the "Inferno" and the second the "Purgatorio and Magnificat," and the conclusion, which is the "Magnificat," is sung by a chorus of women's voices. Mr. Fiedler placed this on the Liszt program he made last October to celebrate the centenary of Liszt's birth, and its performance in Boston was a memorable one. Here the "Magnificat" in the last movement will be sung by the Women's Philharmonic Chorus of this city.

The third and last number will be Tschaikowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From LEDGER
Address PHILADA
Date

...bers.

Three numbers comprise the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music tomorrow night at the second concert of its annual series. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made such a profound sensation not merely among the music-loving public of Philadelphia but wherever she has played. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such astounding violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of the teachers of the violin. While all three of these violinists have characteristics in common which they derive from their teacher, each has a distinct individuality and none has a more distinct one than Miss Parlow. She has the complete technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, have, and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. She also has a profound musical insight that seems to be characteristic of Auer's pupils. In addition to this, she is richly tempermental and gifted with fine taste. Miss Parlow has got beyond the point where she may be regarded simply as a great "woman" violinist. She is easily able to hold her own with any violinist in the world, man or woman. Here she will play Bruch's "Scottish" Fantasie.

MORTIMER WILSON

A recital of Mr. Wilson's own compositions will be given at the Bellevue-Stratford on Tuesday afternoon.

The principal offering on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. The last number on the programme will be Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... INQUIRER
Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date ... DEC 3 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Three numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music tomorrow night at the second concert of its annual series. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made such a profound impression, not merely on the music-loving public of Philadelphia, but of this country wherever she has played. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such astounding violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Elfrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of teachers of the violin.

While all three of these violinists have characteristics, in common which they derive from their teacher, each has a distinct individuality, and none has a more distinct one that Miss Parlow. She has the complete technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist, have, and she has the large tone which characterizes Elman. She also has a profound musical insight that seems to be characteristic of Auer's pupils. In addition to this, she is richly temperamental and gifted with fine taste. Miss Parlow has got beyond the point where she may be regarded simply as a great "woman" violinist. She is easily able to hold her own with any violinist in the world, be they man or woman. Here she will play Bruch's Scottish Fantasie.

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade," Symphonic Suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff a Russian, knew his Orient well, and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a most vivid delineation of the subject, which is its program.

The suite is in four parts and is written in the most supreme virtuoso style, not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the various solo instruments. The last number on the program will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... INQUIRER
Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date ... DEC 5 - 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was not of a nature to invite or require any extended comment. There were only three numbers on the program. It began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite; it included Bruch's Scot Fantasia for violin and orchestra in which the solo instrument was played by Miss Kathleen Parlow; and it closed with Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, a conventional, made-to-order piece of work for which many of Brahms' most enthusiastic admirers have a distinct distaste.

It will have to be admitted that this was a pretty slim and unsatisfying arrangement, and there is little doubt that it was predominantly disappointing. There is beauty of a kind in the Rimsky-Korsakpff suite and it gave the orchestra an opportunity of which due advantage was taken to display its virtuosity, but it contains about as much poetry or emotion as a kaleidoscope, and it might not be easy to name anything that grows wearisome more rapidly than music that is first, last and all the time descriptive. The "Scheherazaade" suite makes its appeal exclusively to the connoisseur in tonal tints and structural complications,and as the central feature of a symphonic program it is out of place.

Nor is the Bruch fantasia on Scotch airs one of the most ingratiating and effective compositions for the violin ever written, and it could have been wished that Miss Parlow's finished art had been exhibited through a more grateful medium. It contains some interesting materials. It shows an intimate acquaintance with the resources and potentialities of the solo instrument, while the ingenuity with which the melodies which it employs are disguised almost beyond recognition is certainly remarkable. It was admirably interpreted by Miss Parlow, with the utmost brilliancy of execution, purity of tone and sincerity of feeling, and the hearty applause which her performance elicited was well deserved.

The next of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, January 8, when Joseph Hofmann will be the assisting artist.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... REPUBLICAN,
Address ... Springfield, Mass.
Date ... DEC 3 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Kathleen Parlow to Be Soloist at Concert in Court Square Theater on the 11th.

The sale of seats for the concert which the Boston symphony orchestra is to give in the Court Square theater on Monday evening, the 11th, will open at the box office of the theater Thursday morning. The usual scale of prices will be maintained. The coming of the Boston symphony orchestra is always an event—even in cities which have long-established orchestras of their own. The hold this orchestra has on the musical public throughout the country is stronger now than it has ever been in the past. With practically no festivities, the 30th anniversary of the orchestra was celebrated in Boston last October, but this anniversary gave opportunity for a general review of the extraordinary career it has had since it began in its very modest way, in the fall of 1881.

MAX FIEDLER.

[Conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.]

This is the last year of Max Fiedler's engagement. He came for one season; he will have stayed for four. In that time he has made for bimself a most enviable reputation as a skilled conductor, as an honest, sincere artist and as an attractive man. In that time he has seen the orchestra flourish as it had never before flourished in its history. Mr Fiedler has been distinctly a popular conductor.

Mr Fiedler's program is typical of his skill in this direction. The symphony he has chosen is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," which, curiously enough, the orchestra has never played here. In modern music Mr Fiedler is at his best, for his temperament seems to be particularly sympathetic to it. The program begins with Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, and the last two numbers are Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Sibelius's stirring symphonic poem, "Finlandia," both of which are new to this city. In other words out of four orchestral numbers, three will be novelties, or practically novelties.

The soloist will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who made a profound impression here last spring at the music festival. She will play Bruch's fantasia on Scottish folk melodies.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... PRESS,
Address ... New York City.
Date ... DEC 10 1911

CONCERTMASTER VIES WITH SOLOIST FOR REAL HONORS

Witek of Boston Symphony Orchestra Does Remarkable Playing.

PARLOW HEARD IN FANTASIA

Canadian Artist Performs Bruch's Scottish Number in Excellent Style —Brahms Overture Given.

There were two solo violinists at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, though the name of one only figured on the programme.

For Kathleen Parlow, all robed in pink, was reserved the privilege of assuming stellar prominence. But Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, deserved quite as much distinction for his remarkably fine playing of the solo violin parts in Rimsky-Korsakoff's highly colored and picturesque symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," and it seemed a pity that Fiedler did not ask him to get up from his desk and bow to the audience alone instead of calling upon the entire body of players to rise in acknowledgment.

To be sure, Fiedler did make a cursory gesture toward Witek when the orchestra was thus receiving the well-merited plaudits of the crowd, and Witek inclined his head slightly in response; but that little interlude passed almost unnoticed.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to find among concertmasters the world over a man as well equipped for solo playing as Anton Witek, a fact brought out emphatically yesterday when he was thrown into close juxtaposition with so gifted and famous an exponent of violinistic achievements as Miss Parlow. By comparison he did not suffer in the least. His tone, if not as large, was smoother, mellower and of more penetrating sweetness; his technique, though not put to so great a test, was faultless; his style of playing far more mature and reposeful.

But of course, Miss Parlow, being in the foreground and conspicuous to the eye as well as to the ear, carried off the popular honors of the afternoon. For her intrinsic work, without any reference to the admirable achievements of the older musician, it is only fair to say that she richly deserved all the manifestations of approval she aroused by her excellent performance of Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs. To say, however, that her playing revealed extraordinary virtuosity or musical grasp would be exaggeration.

Such qualities, though, were prominent in the brilliant performance given by the orchestra under Fiedler's exuberant guidance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scintillating and fascinating symphonic suite only. One wished that the programme, which closed with Brahms's Academic Festival overture, had offered some music of more substantial value. M. S.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... PRESS
Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date ... DEC 1911

Three numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the Academy of Music tomorrow night at the second concert of its annual series. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made such a profound sensation not merely on the music-loving public of Philadelphia, but of this entire country wherever she has played. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such astounding violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow and Efrem Zimbalist has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of the teachers of the violin. Miss Parlow will play Bruch's "Scottish" Fantasie.

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade" Symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his Orient well and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a most vivid delineation of the subject which is its program. The program is in four parts and is written in the most supreme virtuoso style not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the various solo instruments. The last number on the program will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... SUN,
Address ... New York City.
Date ...

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MUSIC.

Kathleen Parlow Plays Bruch's "Scotch Fantasia" Very Well.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was one of those musical entertainments of which little can be said except in the form of a Gilbertian exclamation, "O joy, O rapture." The programme set forth the information that three compositions would be offered—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade" suite, Max Bruch's "Scotch Fantasia" and Brahms's "Academic" overture. The solo violinist in the Bruch number was Kathleen Parlow. There was a large audience and the applause indicated that the rapture was not modified, as it sometimes is in Gilbert's text.

The performance of the Rimsky-Korsakov music was beautiful, and Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, delivered the bewitching remarks of the narrator to the Commander of the Faithful with good tone and technic. The composition itself is without much doubt the best production of the Russian master. It is bubbling over with happy fancy. Its melodic material is most engaging and is treated with the greatest spontaneity and with a wealth of admirable instrumental device. The whole work is captivating in mood and manner and it is thoroughly musical, which cannot be said of some of its more pretentious successors.

Miss Parlow's playing of the Bruch music was one of the most satisfying achievements she has disclosed to this public. It showed clearly the progress she has made since her début a year ago. Her plan had been carefully elaborated and her effects were distributed with a real musical intelligence. Particularly in the first movement was the dignity of her reading worthy of the warmest praise, while in the last one the vigorous preservation of the rhythm of the fundamental melody in all intricate passages was a brilliant and musicianly accomplishment.

Throughout the composition she played with great beauty of tone and with a delightful freedom from exaggeration. The gentlemen of Boston provided a rich, sonorous and sympathetic accompaniment.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... EVENING TELEGRAM,
Address ... New York City.
Date ... DEC 10 191

There can be only words of praise for the remarkable work done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. Mr. Fiedler and his big band offered a concert that was delightful in its rendering as well as in the ably contrasted material of which it was made.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," with all its wealth of orchestral color and luscious melodies, was brilliantly played. Miss Parlow, played Bruch's Scottish Fantasia with such a bewitching command of her violin that even its uninteresting moments were delightful Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, played with beautiful clarity, completed one of the most delightful concerts of the year.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... TRAVELER,
Address ...
Date ... DECEMBER 9, 1911.

Boston Symphony.

After another very successful trip to the South, the Symphony orchestra returns to Boston tonight. The six concerts it has just given were repetitions of those of the first trip, when every seat at every one of the concerts was sold, and many were turned away unable to gain admission.

The ninth programme which will be played on next Friday afternoonn and Saturday evening, presents as a symphony Beethoven's No. 4 in B-flat major. The other orchestral numbers will be the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and Strauss' Tone Poem "Till Eulenspiegels." The soloist will be the much-admired 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder. He will play Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Boellmann's Symphonic Variations. The last-named piece will be heard at the Symphony concerts for the first time.

The third Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given next Thursday evening, Dec. 14. The soloist will be Miss Kathleen Parlow, whose 13th consecutive appearance this will be with the orchestra. She will play Saint-Saens Concerto in B-minor for Violin and Orchestra.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ... PRESS
Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date ... DEC 3 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Kathleen Parlow the Soloist in Bruch Fantasia.

PROGRAMME.

1—Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazada."
2—Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs, for Violin and Orchestra. Kathleen Parlow.
3—Brahms, Academic Festival Overture.

The opening portion of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night was heard by the audience with the rapt and breathless attention which the Sultan must have given the interminable tales which for three years kept alive his curiosity. The listener has distinctly the sense of being enthralled by an epic narration, the narrator being chiefly the solo violin. The scheme reminds one of that of Strauss's "Don Quixote," played at these concerts last year, wherein the 'cello sustains the heroic burden of the argument. Here the violin begins, continues and ends with its tripping phrase, like a cadenza, and as successive personages enter in the course of the story their voices issue through the throats of oboe, bassoon, 'cello, muted French horn, even in the salient arpeggios of the harp and the gentle pattering rain of the snare drum. One feels sometimes in looking at a painting that the maker of it must have wielded a brush with a very long handle; ust so with this music, it seems as though to get his ample cosmic perspective the composer must have applied the pigments from his palette of tone-colors at long range.

For instance, in the conclusion of the quadrupartite score the ship bearing that ancient mariner Ajib goes to pieces against the magnetic mountain. There is in the orchestration a magnificent depiction of "the mountain'd and ascending wave," yet the colors are not run together and the chaos is on the canvas and not in the mind or the art of him who so masterfully produced it.

Miss Parlow, demure, unaffected, the sincere and consecrated artist who has already played her way into the highest degree of esteem with Philadelphians, gave of her delectable best in Max Bruch's extended idealization or apotheosis of the lays of ancient Scotland.

The Auer-mark that the Russian genius impressed upon other pupils, notably Mischa Elman and Efrem Zimbalist, is clearly distinguished in Miss Parlow's playing; it is the mark of thorough grounding in the rudiments, the firm fingering, the straight bowing, by which a large and solid volume of tone is evoked. The G string of the noble Guarnerius Miss Parlow used has a singing quality like that of Schumann-Heink in such a lyric as Brahms's "Sapphic Ode" or Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht."

It is not necessary to add that the play-stood on a rolltop desk to welcome the new incumbent of the office. He reached down and shook Mr. Ryan's hand, wishing him success in the performance of his public duties. In return, City Solicitor Ryan expressed the hope that Mr. Alcorn would be successful in private life.

For 25 years Mr. Alcorn has been in the City Solicitor's office. He was an assistant until a year ago, when Mayor Reyburn appointed him as the successor of J. Howard Gendell. He declared yesterday that he will devote his time to his law practice, and declined to make any further statement.

The resignation of 14 Assistant City Solicitors was read and served under Mr. Alcorn,

From _____

Address _____

Date _____ DEC 10 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY AS OPERA'S RIVAL

Music Lovers Had to Choose Between Two Splendid Matinee Treats.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Yesterday afternoon New Yorkers had the privilege of hearing much good and great music.

At the Metropolitan they heard "Tristan und Isolde" sung and played in the most admirable way by the artists of that opera house. And at Carnegie Hall they were treated to an interpretation by the ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra of a lovely suite, by Rimski-Korsakow, the great Russian composer, suggested by the "Arabian Nights," and entitled "Scherezade."

The audience which enjoyed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance was, as it always is, large, serious and attentive. The suite of Rimski-Korsakow is divided into four parts or movements, which are supposed to throw some light upon the adventures of Sindbad and some other characters. But those who strain their ears to link the music—wonderful music—of the composer with this or that tale in the "Arabian Nights" might spare their pains. For, as we are informed by Philip Hale, in the illuminating comments on the work which he contributes to the programme book, the music is "deliberately vague."

Something at all events inspired the composer with this glorious suite, which leads the listener through long, wild, fantastic scenes to an appointed end. It matters little what the music means. Let it suffice that it is very beautiful and full of Russian fancy, Eastern charm, varied grace.

A characteristic theme, identified (according to the programme notes) with Scherezade, the Sultana of Schariar, serves as a connecting link between the successive episodes in the work, which, as it was played by the Bostonians, delighted all who heard it.

Bruch's "Scottish Folk Song Fantasia," for the violin and orchestra, with Kathleen Parlow as the soloist, also adorned the programme, which ended with Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture."

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

BOSTON MEN PLAY WELL.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, Violinist, Adds Variety to Programme with Scotch Music.

With music of "A Thousand and One Nights" played by 101 musicians from Boston town, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the feature of yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall. It began with Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," that tells in music the tale of Sinbad the Sailor, the story of the Kalander Prince, and describes spiritedly the festival at Badgad. The suite has been heard here before, but its performance yesterday was a feat of virtuosity that reflected especial credit on Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, and the men who played under his baton.

From "Arabian Nights" music to German students songs the programme ranged, the final number being Brahms' "Academic Overture," jubilantly played.

Between these poles there was a lovely dash of Scotch, Bruch's "Scotch Fantasia," played by Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist. She distinguished herself by clean playing and a pretty tone. Nor did she lack in sentiment when it was needed, and the stirring finale was played with rugged vitality and fine dash.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date _____ 8 - 1911

Glorious is the only term to apply to the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Brahms' Fourth Symphony, played with a wealth of tone such as only the big band from Boston commands, and with an evident enthusiasm on the part of all the players, was the principal number.

As if that were not enough, Miss Kathleen Parlow played the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor so exquisitely that all merely technical elements of her art seemed to melt away. Cherubini's graceful overture to a long forgotten opera, "Lodviska," and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" completed a concert for which praise and gratitude must be recorded.

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 3 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the National Tuesday afternoon at the second concert of its annual series. The soloists, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, who has already made a profound impression on the music-loving public of this country wherever she has played. Leopold Auer, of St. Petersburg, has been for many years a famous violinist and pedagogue, but the credit of having turned out three such astounding violinists as Mischa Elman, Kathleen Parlow, and Efrem Zimbalist, has given him an undisputed place in the first rank of the teachers of the violin.

Miss Parlow will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor No. 3. This work, full of melody, is one of the most grateful concertos that have been written for the violin.

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Thousand Nights and a Night." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his Orient well, and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a most vivid delineation of the subject. The suite is in four parts, and is written in the most supreme virtuoso style, not only for the orchestra as a whole, but for the solo instruments as well. The last number on the program will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date DEC 10 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY HELPS COMPOSER.

Interprets Admirably Music Usually Ruined by Russian Dancers' Orchestra.

Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," made familiar here through its use by the Russian dancers, was really played in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The work is usually ruined when any but a first class organization undertakes to perform it, which is unfortunate in the light of its excellences. In addition to presenting this number admirably, the solo being equally well done by Concertmeister Witek, the Boston musicians satisfied completely in the Brahms Academic Festival Overture.

Kathleen Parlow, the soloist, chose Max Bruch's showy but musically unimportant Scotch Fantasie, and she played it with authority, amazing technical virtuosity and beautiful tone. This young violinist has broadened materially since she was first heard here last season. Her interpretations are more cohesive and she satisfies by her thoroughness and finish.

POST, DECEMBER 10, 1911

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from its second Southern trip late last night. The second Southern trip was as successful in every particular as the first. It is good to say that the only embarrassment the orchestra has at these concerts is in the matter of the capacity of the various halls at which it plays—not always sufficient to accommodate all those who wish to hear the concerts.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the admired 'cellist of the orchestra, is scheduled as soloist for the ninth rehearsal and concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Boellman's Symphonic Variations for violoncello and orchestra. The last named piece will be heard for the first time at the Symphony concerts. The first number on the programme will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat major. The final numbers will be the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," which Mr. Fiedler played with so much success in the early part of his first season in Boston, and "Till Eulenspiegel."

Cambridge Symphony Concert

The third Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given next Thursday evening, Dec. 14. The soloist will be Miss Kathleen Parlow, whose thirteenth consecutive appearance this will be with the orchestra. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor for violin and orchestra.

The symphony will be Franck's in D minor, the performance of which aroused such enthusiasm at a recent Symphony concert in Boston.

The final number on the programme will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 10, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Symphony Orchestra returned from its second southern trip late last night and will make a flying trip to Springfield, returning by special train the same night. The second southern trip was as successful in every particular as the first. The only embarrassment the orchestra has at these concerts is that the capacity of the various halls at which it plays is not sufficient to accommodate all those who wish to hear the concerts.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist for the ninth rehearsal and concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. He will play Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Boellmann's Symphonic Variations for Violoncello and Orchestra. The last named piece will be heard for the first time at the Symphony concerts. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B-flat major, the love scene from Richard Strauss's Opera "Feuersnot," and "Till Eulenspiegel."

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The third Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given next Thursday evening, Dec. 14. The soloist will be Miss Kathleen Parlow, whose 13th consecutive appearance this makes, will be with the orchestra. She will play Saint-Saens Concerto in B-minor. The symphony will be Franck's in B-minor, the performance of which aroused such enthusiasm at a recent symphony concert in Boston. The final number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

advertising.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Kathleen Parlow as Soloist at Symphony Concert.

There were only three numbers on the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. The first, Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," was followed by Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," for violin and orchestra, and the concluding "Academic Festival Overture" by Brahms.

The Korsakoff "Scheherazade" is a remarkable and utterly illogical contribution to "program music." We are told in the "program" that the Sultan Schahrias, persuaded of the faithlessness of women, had the agreeable notion of putting to death his wives, acquired in rapid succession. The Sultana Scheherzade, wise in the philosophy and accomplishments of her time, circumvents the gory designs of the Sultan by weaving for his delectation a series of tales, with which she succeeds in entertaining her distinguished lord so well that he finally abandons his plans for wholesale slaughter. The stories which the orchestral score are supposed to delineate are "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad—The Sea—The Ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion." Rather a comprehensive tale to be told orchestrally, considering the limitations of expression inherent in the instruments involved in the recital. That the Boston Orchestra succeeded in surviving the manifest difficulties confronting it in attempting to interpret such an elaboration and received an overwhelming approval from an audience supposed to represent some degree of musical discrimination is sufficient to indicate that the musicians played the uninteresting work in a superb manner, and also that the general audience is as easily entertained by a combination of sounds, lacking not only meaning but poetic beauty, as by the style of music that conveys a great message or has an elevating effect upon the emotions. The main theme of the composition, which is musical without being profound, is so overworked that its constant repetition becomes more tiresome than the idea involved in the work itself.

The question must necessarily arise, if program music of this type is to be persisted in, of some suitable medium for conveying the plan of the composer. It cannot be denied that the orchestra fails to accomplish this mission. A great deal of entertainment and enlightenment might be gained from a well-directed series of moving pictures, shown to illustrate the story involved. For instance, Sinbad's ship sailing the sea and going to pieces on the rocks, would undoubtedly be brought home with more force were there a scene displayed depicting that event. There would be no question of such a plan lowering the orchestral dignity. The music indulged in accomplishes that result ultimately.

Kathleen Parlow, who was the soloist of the evening, is a welcome artist on the Academy stage. Her playing of the Bruch "Fantasia on Scottish Airs" was another revelation of her supreme command of the violin. In the hands of most violinists the Scottish Fantasia is not as interesting as many other violin works. Miss Parlow, however, plays it so beautifully that it takes on new dignity and meaning, and is almost as acceptable as greater things. She was brought out several times, but the inexorable law of the Boston aggregation forbids encores, so her many warm admirers had to be content to await a more favorable time.

The Boston Orchestra is in magnificent form. The great string choir, the envy of all orchestras, seemed fuller and richer than ever, while the supplementary sections were as harmonious as in former seasons.

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 8 1911

LECTURE RECITAL BY D. G. MASON AT ACADEMY

Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade" the Opening Number.

TELLS OF "ARABIAN NIGHTS"

The Story of the Kalandar Prince" Is the Dominating Story Element Restated by Different Instruments.

In the lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon Daniel Gregory Mason, of Manhattan, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to present in the opera house of that building this evening. He devoted most of the time to the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," opus 36, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the opening number.

Showing the rich oriental coloring of the title-page of the music, which is published at St. Petersburg, Mr. Mason noted the likeness between the emerald green, Prussian blue and crimson ornamenting its gold background, and the oriental quality and intense color of Russian music.

This composition tells the story of the "Arabian Nights'" tales—of a few of them—the theme of Scheherazade, the narrator, heard generally in the solo violin, or perhaps in a wood-wind instrument, being ever present and in contrast with the theme of the four movements. In "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship" it sounds against the sea theme, which is announced frequently and heard in many transformations until the movement reaches its beautiful and poetical conclusion.

In the "Story of the Kalandar Prince" the dominating story element is restated by different instruments, as if appearing in different color or from different points of view, this being especially noticeable in the fanfare. The first and second movements and the themes of "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" were played, but the limitations of the pianoforte permitted only the presentation of the main themes and peroration from the fourth movement.

In color, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the third number which the orchestra will play tonight, was shown to be the opposite of the Russian composer's music. "Vagueness seems to be in the air-grays, modified by soft pinks, greens and pale blues predominate," said Mr. Mason. This "color" is obtained by the clever use of of the wood-wind and the harp. The other numbers of the programme, Bruch's Fantasie on Scotch Airs, for violin and orchestra, in which Miss Kathleen Barlow will be the soloist, and the overture to "Oberon," by von Weber, were omitted from the lecture recital because of lack of time.

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 6 - 1911

Mrs. Taft Entertains At Box Party.

Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box at the New National Theater yesteday afternoon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Her guests were Mrs. Wickersham, Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver, Mrs. Beekman Winthop, and Mrs. Winthrop's mother, Mrs. Charles Wood.

In the adjoining box was Mrs. Norman Williams, who had with her the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, and Mrs. Wesley Merritt.

Among those with Mr. and Mrs. Preston Gibson in their box, were Congressman and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth.

With Mrs. Calderon Carlisle in her box, were Miss Mary Carlisle and Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle.

Others in the audience were the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, the Danish Minister, Count Moltke, Baroness Preuschen, Mrs. Meyer, the Misses Meyer, Mrs. Horace Lurton, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Miss Elisabeth Anderson, Mrs. William Barrett Ridgely, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Nathaniel Simpkins, the Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim, and Mrs. McKim, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Marion Oliver, Samuel Hill, Mrs. H. H. Hosley, Miss Keyser, Mrs. William Dennis, and Mrs. Christian Heurich.

[92]

From TIMES.

Address HARTFORD, CONN.

Date DEC 6 - 1911

Boston Symphony Prices.

In reply to a correspondent who inquired why the price of seats for the Boston Symphony concert in Hartford ranged from $2 down while in Springfield the price was from $1.50 down, THE TIMES learns that the capacity of the Springfield theater is something like 300 seats greater than Parsons's and that while Hartford has three concerts, however, each season Springfield has only one. For the three concerts, however, a season ticket, costing $5, may be had, thus making the price of each concert practically the same as charged in the Massachusetts city.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date

KATHLEEN PARLOW AGAIN LAST NIGHT

The great Canadian violinist was heard by a large and enraptured audience last night at the Academy with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, in Bruch's Fantasia and Scottish Airs. Demure and unaffected, the sincere and consecrated artist who has already played her way into the highest degree of esteem with Philadelphians, gave of her delectable best.

The Auer-mark that the Russian genius impressed upon other pupils, notably Mischa Elman and Efrem Zimbalist, is clearly distinguished in Miss Parlow's playing; it is the mark of thorough grounding in the rudiments, the firm fingering, the straight bowing, by which a large and solid volume of tone is evoked. The G string of the noble Guarnerius Miss Parlow used has a singing quality like that of Schumann-Heink in such a lyric as Brahms's "Sapphic Ode" or Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht."

It is not necessary to add that the player's fingers are as nimble as the elicited sound is rare in its combination of strength and sweetness, and little wonder is it that the soloist was recalled almost to the breaking point of the just and invariable rule against encores.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YO

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Those Boston Men! How They Can Play!

Symphony Orchestra's Programme Contains No Novelties, but Familiar Music Is Brilliantly Performed.

No novelties graced last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall, yet a huge audience listened with unflagging interest to an array of serious music wonderfully played.

In Brahms' fourth symphony, the evening's most classic offering, the orchestra seemed to be on its mettle every moment. The puzzling final movement especially went with a display of orchestral virtuosity that started the audience applauding even before the last chord had died away, and the andante was played with a beauty and warmth of tone that was sufficient to convert any anti-Brahmsite.

Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, was called out several times, and asked the orchestra to rise and share the honors with him. The concluding number was Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," which was played brilliantly and with much dramatic fire.

The soloist was Miss Kathleen Parlow, the Canadian violinist, who has been heard here before. She chose the Saint-Saens' B minor concerto, which she played with unusual smoothness and with appealing tone, for which she was generously applauded and recalled many times.

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City

Date DEC 8 - 1911

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Bostoner sind wieder einmal da, — man weiß, was das bedeutet: eine Reihe erlesenster Kunstgenüsse. Auch gestern blieben sie nicht aus, ja, mit dem stilistisch ungemein feinen und dabei den melancholischen Grundton so gut treffenden Vortrag von Brahms nicht eben häufig gehörter Vierter Symphonie hat uns Herr Fiedler wieder eine jener Leistungen geboten, die geeignet scheinen, uns den Abschied von ihm recht schwer zu machen.

Es war so recht blasses, „falbes" E-Moll, das er uns bot; allerdings von dem „schreiend und mit gemeiner Tendenz" — so charakterisirte Berlioz diese von den Symphonikern mit Vorliebe gemiedene Tonart — war in Fiedler's Wiedergabe nichts zu merken. Vor allem traf der Dirigent den „Ton" gut. Brahms bietet in diesem Werk so recht eine an die Gothik gemahnende Durchbrochenheit der Instrumentation, die man nicht, wie es allzuhäufig geschieht, vergrößern, zu starrer Massigkeit entarten lassen darf. Es war durchaus Lichtvolles, das er da gab, mitunter wirklich feinstes Filigran, das aus diesem Prachtorchester von berufenen Leitern so duftig herausgeholt werden kann. Ferner war Herr Fiedler mit seinen Tempi sehr glücklich.

Namentlich der erste Satz ist diesbezüglich recht heikel, denn ein zu schnelles Tempo verwischt da die ganze Linienführung nur allzuleicht. Einfach und episch begann er den ersten Satz, in dessen Verlauf die wirksamsten romantischen Töne zum Vorschein kamen. Ueberaus fein war es, wie der Dirigent im zweiten Satz, diesem unvergleichlich schönen Stück Brahms'scher Romantik, den Glanz des Orchesters abdämpfte, ja gelegentlich förmlich Schleier darüber breitete. Die aparte Harmonik dieses Satzes, die man „mittelalterlich" genannt hat (wer sich dafür interessirt, mag wissen, daß dies durch das E-Dur mit b und c an Stelle von dis und cis erfolgt), ist bei jedem erneuten Anhören wieder von bemerkenswerther Wirkung.

Der unheimliche Humor des dritten Satzes kam mit gelegentlicher, wirksamer Derbheit zum Vorschein; eine Auffassung, die ich der so oft beobachteten parfümirt-graziösen unbedingt vorziehe. Ganz gewaltig wirkte wieder das Finale, in dem Brahms auf der dürftigen Grundlage der Chaconne-Form, also auf einem immer wiederkehrenden Thema, die prächtigsten Gebilde seiner Phantasie aufbaut. Wir wollen hiebei nur des unvergleichlich imposant und warm gebrachten Posaunenchors gedenken, wobei aber die übrigen Gruppen nicht leer ausgehen sollen, denn die Bostoner zeigten sich gestern wieder so recht als Meisterspieler par excellence. Der Beifall des Publikums klang begeistert.

Herr Fiedler hatte das Konzert mit der äußerst farbenreich gebrachten „Lodoiska"-Ouverture von Cherubini eingeleitet, die er sehr effektvoll, halb mit Freude, halb mit Wehmuth dirigirte. Tschaikowsky's „Romeo" und Julie"-Phantasie, welche das Konzert beschloß, konnte ich leider nicht mehr hören.

Als Solistin erneuerte Frl. Kathleen Parlow, die junge canadische Virtuosin, welche sich im Vorjahr so sensationell-günstig eingeführt hatte, große Eindrücke. Das ist nicht ein Talent, sondern „das Talent", wohl die größte Zukunftshoffnung unter den ganz Jungen. Sie besitzt in reichem Maß, was der polirten, überraschend reifen, aber immer kühlen Kunst Zimbalist abgeht: Temperament, Schwung, Schmiß! Ueberraschend ist der große, volle, wandlungsfähige Ton, die Kraft und Ausdauer und die hochentwickelte Technik des jungen Mädchens. Diese großen Eigenschaften erblühen aber auf dem Grund urmusikalischen Wesens und eigenen Gefühls. Was verficht es da, daß die junge Dame mitunter daneben greift, daß sie des Guten im Kraftgefühl der Jugend zu viel thut, daß die Intonation gelegentlich nicht goldrein ist, daß gestern namentlich einige kühn gegriffene Flageoletts mißlangen. Das alles läßt sich bessern und entwickeln, aber der „Schmiß" muß angeboren sein; das kann kein Lehrer und kein noch so heißes Bemühen geben.

Um aber recht kritisch zu sein: Frl. Kathleen, die anfangs ein gar grimmes Antlitz zog, hätte den zweiten Satz des schönen Saint-Saëns'schen H-Moll-Konzerts unbedingt etwas „weiblicher" spielen können. Der liebenswürdige Franzose hat uns darin ja so viel Angenehmes und Schönklingendes zu sagen, dem man gerecht werden kann, ohne den Satz zu sentimentalisiren. Dafür aber war der Schlußsatz mit entzückendem Elan hingeworfen. Man verspürte darin das Dehnen und Recken der Künstlerschaft, die weiß, was sie will und der die Macht gegeben ist, das Gewollte auszuführen. Das Publikum überschüttete die Künstlerin mit Beifall.

H.

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

KATHLEEN PARLOW SHOWS RARE TALENT

Boston Symphony Soloist Delights Music Lovers At Lyric.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Kathleen Parlow as soloist, was given at the Lyric last night.

We live in an age which is pervaded by astonishing manifestations of technical viduosity. There is no field in which broad advances have not been made in the last 50 years, and it is not single individuals who excite, but whole classes. This epidemic of super-skill has produced more important results among players of the violin and piano than it has in even the more material walks of life. Not so long since taking stock of great executive artists was a short process; but now a line of extraordinary pianists, having its original source in Carl Czerney and given high impulse by Franz Liszt and Theodor Kullak, fills the world with wonderful musician executants, who accomplish incredible things. The same multiplying and broadening development marks the career of violin playing, which springing from two contributing sources (Ferdinand David and Vientemps), has become a stately stream of generally diffuned high accomplishment. David gave Leopold Auer, Wilhelmi, Joachim, a guiding hand in attaining full realization on their great natural enodwmets, ad each of these passed their great master's modes and ideals on to the following generation of violinists. Auer has been more signally successful than any other of David's disciples, for he has given us Mischa Elmann, Zimbalist and many lesser lights.

When an artist's equipment is as complete as is Kathleen Parlow's it is undesirable, indeed impossible, to institute comparisons. She perfectly commands her instrument, drawing fro mit a great variety of characteristic tone color, entirely suited to give eloquent expression to sentiments or moods as portrayed by the composer. Miss Parlow is quite as much above tricks or exaggerations, as is her technical skill above mechanical difficulties. She is in a word a delightful artist, blessed with logical understanding, exceptional fingers and bow arm and convincing magnetism. Mr. Fiedler, presented the following selections:

Symphony after Dante's "Divina Commedia" .....Liszt
I. Inferno: Lento. Allegro frenetico. Quasi andante. Andante amoroso (Francesca). Tempo primo.
II. (a) Purgatorio: Andante con moto. Lamentoso. Poco a poco piu di moto.
In commemoration of the Centenary of Liszt's birth.
(b) Magnificat.
Concerto in B minor for violin and Orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61..Saint-Saens
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasia for Shakespeare..Tschaikowsky

Liszt's Dante symphony contains some delicious episodes, notably the "Andante Amoroso" in the first movement, which gave the unique wood-wind of the orchestra rare opportunities, but as a whole tehe work lacks terseness, most of the lines in its development being drawn to extreme attenuation.. Still the first movement was rather interesting, but the second is so diffuse and aimlses that it was not saved from being wearisome by the admissable singing of the ladis of the Philharmonic chorus, although Mr. Fielder conducted the whole work most skillfully. The Dante symphony, like some other of Liszt's longer works, is too contemplative to be encouraging.

The Tschaikowsky Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," thinks with life pulsations from beginning to end and it was most effectively played.

O. B. E.

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 3 - 1911

Three numbers comprise the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at the second concert of its annual series. The soloist, as already announced, will be Kathleen Parlow, young Canadian violinist, who already has made a profound impression on the music-loving public of this country. She has the technique that her two colleagues, Elman and Zimbalist have, and the large tone which characterizes Elman. Here she will play Saint-Saens' Concerto in B minor No. 3. This work, full of melody, is one of the most grateful concertos written for the violin, and always has been a favorite with the greatest violinists.

The principal offering on the program will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Oriental musical tapestry, the title of which is "Scheherazade." In the whole literature of orchestral music there is no work so peculiarly Oriental as this. Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Russian, knew his Orient well, and as "picture music" his "Scheherazade" is a vivid delineation of the subject. The last number on the programs will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

[93]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date DEC 8 - 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MUSIC

KATHLEEN PARLOW PLAYS A FRENCH CONCERTO.

The Young Canadian Violinist Arouses a Large Audience to Enthusiasm—Conductor Max Fiedler Reads Superbly the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

It is a few days more than a year since Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, made her first appearance before a New York audience. It was on December 4 of last winter at a concert of the Russian Symphony Society. She was heard often in the subsequent course of the season and it was realized pretty thoroughly by music lovers that a new violinist had come to stay.

Last evening in Carnegie Hall, at the second concert of the twenty-sixth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Miss Parlow played the B minor concerto of Saint-Saëns and considerably enlarged her circle of local acquaintances. She also caused those who have watched her sudden flight into the zenith of artistic celebrity to wonder whether she might perchance essay, like Icarus, to fly too near the sun.

But it is more likely that greater maturity will grave a deeper repose upon this youthful player's now overworked style. It is indeed a fine thing to have a G string that sounds like a cello, but it is possible to force it, and this Miss Parlow occasionally did last night. A big tone is an invaluable asset, but it should be treated as capital, and not spent as if it were mere interest.

Sentiment, too, is something without which music is but a shell. But it is not in accord with the high chastity of art to employ sentiment to excess. This Miss Parlow did in some passages of the cantilena of the first movement of the concerto. Aside from these blemishes her performance was one to call for the warmest applause. This it received at the hands of a typical Boston Symphony audience.

Miss Parlow's sweeping style, the magnificent boldness of her bow arm, her brilliant and unerring finger technic and her masculinity of performance again made their usual impression. The resources of violin tone she explores pretty thoroughly, and all the way from her sonorous low scale (when not pressed) to her full blooded harmonics she calls from her instrument the most generous of its sounds.

Her style shows progress in balance and symmetry. She treats her phrases more judiciously than she did a year ago, and she shows a clearer insight into their relationship with the plan which the composer had in his mind when he developed his work. She is, as we have said, still young, and yet she has fewer of the faults of youth than she had a year ago.

She is evidently a student and a thinker. She encourages high hopes for her future. Technically she is already one of the foremost performers of the day. As an interpreter she has yet not a little to learn, but there is excellent reason for believing that she will learn it.

The programme began with Cherubini's "Lodoiska" overture, a work which, it is safe to say, few of those present had ever heard before. It is a less imposing overture than the same master's "Anacreon," but it is so sound in structure and general treatment that it makes what the Scotch call "a good hearing."

The second number was the E minor symphony (No. 4) of Brahms. It would be difficult to recall a more inspiriting performance of this beautiful symphony. The tonal qualities of the Boston Orchestra were heard at their best, and although there were a few moments of uncertainty in attack in the first movement the customary unanimity and precision of the organization were restored before the movement came to a close. The glorious third movement was played superbly, but the climax of the interpretation was reached in the last movement, which was delivered with something very like inspiration.

Such a proclamation of the gospel according to Brahms Conductor Fiedler has not given us before and it ought to remain in the memory of every one who heard it. The concert was brought to a conclusion with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia.

From EVENING WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 8 - 1911

Kathleen Parlow Soloist, Boston Symphony

Brilliant Young Canadian Violinist Excels Herself in a Saint-Saens Concerto—Brahms's Fourth Symphony Is Played by Orchestra.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

KATHLEEN PARLOW, the Canadian violinist, who was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall, surpassed herself in her playing in the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor. It was not only technically brilliant, but full of color. She displayed a warmth of temperament and a breadth of interpretation exceeding anything that she has shown before. The great audience fell captive under her spell and recalled her time and time again.

The symphony was Brahms's fourth in E minor, with its rather depressing opening that grows more interesting as it is developed through each of its movements. Mr. Fiedler and his finely trained band played it superbly; but not even he and they could imbue it with qualities that appeal to anything beyond the mind. It does not grip the emotions. Cherubini's "Lodoiska" overture, with which the concert was begun, served only to exploit the musicianship of the band. The closing number was Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" that had some red blood in it.

From HERALD,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CONCERT

Kathleen Parlow Performs Brilliantly as Soloist.

The traditional welcome accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington was well exemplified at the second concert of the season, given in the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. It was a typical Boston Symphony audience which assembled to hear the organization, and a typical Fiedler programme which was given. At no time were the resources of the orchestra called into full play, although its mastery and poise and reserve power were subtly displayed, along with the matchless tonal refinement which has been the predominant characteristic of the organization since the days of Nikisch and Gericke.

The opening number of the programme was the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after "The Thousand Nights and One Night," opus 35, by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The first movement, "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," develops the motivation of the suite, particularly the wave motive, which is skillfully woven into the contrapuntal fabric of the entire symphony. The opportunity given Anton Witek, the brilliant concert master of the orchestra, for some brilliant solo work in the first movement was well continued in the second, which was "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince, and which revealed the wood choir at its loveliest. The tonal sheen developed by the wind instruments was exquisite in its sensuous appeal. The third and fourth movements were significant in the skillful reweavings of the motivation, culminating in a blazing climax as Sindbad's ship is wrecked upon the magnetic rock. Throughout the suite is essentially cerebral and interpretative, rather than dramatic. Only such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra and such a leader as Fiedler could reveal to the ear its polished subtleties.

The soloist of the concert was the well-known violinist, Kathleen Parlow, who was heard in Saint-Saens' "Concerto in B. Minor," No. 3, opus 61. Through a maze of difficult and involved passages she played with poignancy and clarity, and in a final passage that fairly flashed with brilliant tone she won her way into one of the most enthusiastic receptions that has been accorded a violinist in Washington in many a day.

The concluding number of the programme was Brahfs' "Academic Festival Overture," Op. 80, of which the familiar "Gaudeamus Igitur" was the main theme. The orchestra played it with its accustomed poise and ease—indeed, in a manner which many thought to be too consummately easy; but that is the Boston Symphony way.

The programme is not likely to go down into local musical history as one of the most brilliant the Boston Symphony has given in Washington, but it displayed a certain type of modern symphonic music at its highest. The Boston Symphony makes its own laws; laws established by its standing in the world of music, and never has its hold upon the local public been more strongly in evidence than at

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH NEW YORK

Address

Date DEC 8 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN BRAHMS

Max Fiedler Gives Fine Interpretation—Miss Parlow Is Heard as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night at Carnegie Hall before one of those crowded and justly enthusiastic audiences which Colonel Higginson's admirable foundation has the fortunate habit of evoking. Max Fiedler conducted, Anton Witek led the first violins and Miss Kathleen Parlow, the Canadian violinist, was the soloist.

The concert began with Cherubini's overture, "Lodoiska," a work of a rococo mixture of styles, which, while proving Cherubini's right to the title of musicianship, adds little to the minimum of moribund favor with wnich he is received by modern concert audiences.

The delight and the master work of the concert was the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, a composer whose might and beauty grow the greater and the more obvious, like those of Niagara, the more we study and contemplate them. The sublime in art has been defined as that which makes men and women think better of themselves. Brahms deals with that which approaches the sublime. He has something of the bareness, the coldness, the remoteness of the mountain-tops. But he has also their dignity and their serenity. He has been some time dead, but with each year of his loss, we realize something more of his grandeur, something more of the musical lesson he has taught us.

The performance of his Fourth Symphony last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra can only be regarded as perfection. A German writer once said that before the normality of perfection one should be silent. Criticism, even constructive criticism—to use a cant term of the day—can well afford to be tranquil before the interpretation of Brahm's Fourth that was given last night.

At the end of the first movement the audience in spontaneous pleasure redoubled its applause. Miss Parlow played the Saint-Saens violin concerto in B-minor. Her tone is vigorous, rich and musical. Her interpretation scholarly and sound.

The concert ended with Tschaikowsky's fantasia after Shakespeare called "Romeo et Juliette."

Tschaikowsky did not understand Shakespeare.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

DEC 8 - 1911

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

KATHLEEN PARLOW.

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 8 - 1911

THE Boston Symphony Orches is in town once more, but Mr. Fiedler, who has been giving th "Istar" variations of d'Indy and other interesting things in Boston, seems to think there is no need of bringing them over to New York. However, the present season is supposed to be Mr. Fiedler's last with the Boston orchestra, so let us be patient with him and hope for better things to come. At least the orchestra is always a joy.

Last night the first half of the concert, in Carnegie Hall as usual, was the best. Cherubini's "Lodoiska" overture, something of a wonder in Paris in 1791, opened it. The overture is not the equal of its author's "Anacreon," but it is worth the revival for its classic clearness of design and the genuine beauty of the slow introduction and of the second theme of the overture proper. Then came Brahm's E minor symphony, the forbidding fourth. Just why this symphony is neglected in favor of its three predecessors is difficult to see. The andante is of heavenly beauty, the following allegro giocoso a scherzo of unquestionable effectiveness, and the final "Ciacona" deserves to rank among the most notable symphonic movements. Only the very characteristic first movement is something of a nut to crack, and Mr. Fiedler's interpretation did not assist in that feat. The rest of the symphony, however, made its effect. At its conclusion the conductor signalled his men to rise and share with him the applause.

The second half of the concert began with Saint-Saëns B minor violin concerto, in which Miss Kathleen Parlow, the soloist of the occasion, again showed her extraordinary accomplishment, to the evident delight of the great audience. Miss Parlow seems ambitious to play here more concertos than any other violinist, and she seems in a fair way of doing so. One cannot, therefore, blame her for wishing to play this one. It is not one of the greatest violin concertos, but it is among the best compositions of Saint-Saëns, and Miss Parlow plays it exceedingly well. So far the selection of pieces was commendable, if not the order of their presentation. But why append Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," prolonging the concert beyond the two-hour limit, when in any case bringing Tschaikowsky to New York is bringing coals to Newcastle? The fact that it was well played is no sufficient excuse. We expect the best playing from the Boston orchestra, and we should like to expect programmes as good as its playing.

To-morrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs" (with Miss Parlow as solo violinist), and Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture."

From

Address

Date

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEC 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With all of its accustomed perfection of musicianship, but with a program that left something to be desired, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the Academy of Music last night with Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, as soloist. Beginning with the colorful and imaginative "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which all of the marvelous resources of the full orchestra are used for the painting of the pictures, the interest of the evening steadily diminished through Bruch's none-too-inspired "Scotch Fantasie" for solo violin and orchestra until it expired in a sigh of positive relief after the bespectacled pedagogy of Brahms' Academic Festival Orchestra.

Both the orchestra and the soloist were in the best of form. Miss Parlow played with a clarity, strength and precision that proved her thorough grounding in technic and her interpretation was marked by both warmth and sympathy. She was greeted with a deserved enthusiasm that grew to such strength that it threatened to become objectionable, but the young artist could scarcely be begrudged the evidences of a popular approval, which she so well merited.

Max Fiedler, as usual, had his orchestra under perfect control. So often has the almost perfect work of this organization been commented upon that there is nothing left to be said of it except the statement that it maintained its high standard.

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 8 - 1911

MISS PARLOW GAINS FAVOR.

Canadian Violinist Heard in Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

With Miss Kathleen Parlow, the slimmest and tallest of all fair violinists, as its bright and particular "star," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the impetuous and vigorous leadership of Max Fiedler, gave its second Thursday evening concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The symphony of the occasion was Brahms's Fourth, in E minor, a work not heard as often as it merits. Another composition infrequently performed, Cherubin's overture to "Lodoiska," served as an introductory number and Tschaikowsky's beautiful and richly orchestrated overture Fantasia after Shakespeare's "Romeo et Juliet," brought the programme to an end. The idea of opening the evening with a classical selection, criticised in its day, strange as it may seem to twentieth century folk, for its "noisy and often unnatural effects of instrumental profusion," and closing it with a highly romantic and emotional creation of comparatively recent origin, was a felicitous one, though the concert proved to be somewhat too long.

Miss Parlow had chosen Saint-Saens's familiar concerto in B minor as the vehicle of her art and there was no room for doubt that she won the favor of her auditors from the outset. Her playing, indeed, deserved fully the demonstrations of approval it evoked, for it reflected unusual musical gifts as well as technical skill. Yet it is difficult to understand how the young Canadian violinist can be ranked as equal to Zimbalist, who, by the way, received his education from the same Russian master. Her tone is not nearly as big, round and mellow as his; her bowing not nearly as broad, steady and smooth; her finger technique not nearly as impeccable, and her intonation not nearly as reliable.

In the opening allegro Miss Parlow seemed somewhat nervous. There were no manifestations of excitement, however, in the Andantino, which could well have borne a greater admixture of tender sentiment than the violinist infused into it.

The piece de resistance of the evening, however, was unquestionably the Brahms symphony which revealed the rich euphony of the orchestra's strings, the extraordinary technical virtuosity and unanimity of the band as a whole and the enthusiasm of the man in command in a way that brought tumultuous and prolonged applause at the close. Max Fiedler had all his men stand up in recognition of this tribute of admiration. M. S.

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 8 - 1

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The brilliant solo work of Kathleen Parlow, violinist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, was the marked feature of a concert that will probably rank as one of the most enjoyable ever given by this famous organization in this city.

Conductor Max Fiedler had provided a program of rare and varied melodic beauty, and the orchestra never seemed in better spirit in its ready response to his beat.

Opening with the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite "Scheherazade" op. 35, with its varied movements and oriental strains, the program consisted of Saint-Saens' "Concerto in B Minor for Violin and Orchestra, No. 3," op. 61, with Miss Parlow as the soloist, and conducted with Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," op. 80, with its college suggestions, so dear to the German heart.

Aside from its characteristic excellence, the orchestra presented an additional claim to the applause with which it was greeted in the superb work of its concert master, A. Witek.

Miss Parlow, however, with the magic of her marvelous tone, technique and sympathetic execution, was easily the most prominent feature of the concert, and her work was rewarded with such volumes of applause that she was obliged to bow her acknowledgments many times.

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 8 - 1911

Warm Welcome Given Boston Symphony Music

A rousing welcome was given Director Fiedler and his Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, its second appearance this season, when Miss Kathleen Parlow was the soloist. There was a large audience, the boxes and seats being occupied by the cream of Washington society, and progressive musical people.

The opening number, the symphonic suite, "Schezerade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Rimsky-Korsakoff, was the opening number. The four movements of this composition being given, Miss Parlow was heard in Saint-Saens' Concerto in B minor, No. 3, opus 61. This composition, full of difficult passages, was given with wonderful power and clarity by the soloist, who was received enthusiastically.

It has been many days since the Washington music loving public has given a soloist a warmer welcome.

The concluding number was Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," the famed "Gaudeamus Igitur" being the leading motif. While the program is not the most brilliant that has been presented by the Boston organization, it represented the highest type of symphonic music.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From EVENING WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 8 - 1911

Kathleen Parlow Soloist, Boston Symphony

Brilliant Young Canadian Violinist Excels Herself in a Saint-Saens Concerto—Brahms's Fourth Symphony Is Played by Orchestra.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

KATHLEEN PARLOW, the Canadian violinist, who was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall, surpassed herself in her playing in the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor. It was not only technically brilliant, but full of color. She displayed a warmth of temperament and a breadth of interpretation exceeding anything that she has shown before. The great audience fell captive under her spell and recalled her time and time again.

The symphony was Brahms's fourth in E minor, with its rather depressing opening that grows more interesting as it is developed through each of its movements. Mr. Fiedler and his finely trained band played it superbly; but not even he and they could imbue it with qualities that appeal to anything beyond the mind. It does not grip the emotions. Cherubini's "Lodoiska" overture, with which the concert was begun, served only to exploit the musicianship of the band. The closing number was Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" that had some red blood in it.

From HERALD.
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CONCERT

Kathleen Parlow Performs Brilliantly as Soloist.

The traditional welcome accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington was well exemplified at the second concert of the season, given in the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. It was a typical Boston Symphony audience which assembled to hear the organization, and a typical Fiedler programme which was given. At no time were the resources of the orchestra called into full play, although its mastery and poise and reserve power were subtly displayed, along with the matchless tonal refinement which has been the predominant characteristic of the organization since the days of Nikisch and Gericke.

The opening number of the programme was the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," after "The Thousand Nights and One Night," opus 35, by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The first movement, "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," develops the motivation of the suite, particularly the wave motive, which is skillfully woven into the contrapuntal fabric of the entire symphony. The opportunity given Anton Witek, the brilliant concert master of the orchestra, for some brilliant solo work in the first movement was well continued in the second, which was "The Story of the Kalandar-Prince," and which revealed the wood choir at its loveliest. The tonal sheen developed by the wind instruments was exquisite in its sensuous appeal. The third and fourth movements were significant in the skillful reweavings of the motivation, culminating in a blazing climax as Sindbad's ship is wrecked upon the magnetic rock. Throughout the suite is essentially cerebral and interpretative, rather than dramatic. Only such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra and such a leader as Fiedler could reveal to the ear its polished subtleties.

The soloist of the concert was the well-known violinist, Kathleen Parlow, who was heard in Saint-Saens' "Concerto in B Minor," No. 3, opus 61. Through a maze of difficult and involved passages she played with poignancy and clarity, and in a final passage that fairly flashed with brilliant tone she won her way into one of the most enthusiastic receptions that has been accorded a violinist in Washington in many a day.

The concluding number of the programme was Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," Op. 80, of which the familiar "Gaudeamus Igitur" was the main theme. The orchestra played it with its accustomed poise and ease—indeed, in a manner which many thought to be too consummately easy; but that is the Boston Symphony way.

The programme is not likely to go down into local musical history as one of the most brilliant the Boston Symphony has given in Washington, but it displayed a certain type of modern symphonic music at its highest. The Boston Symphony makes its own laws, laws established by its standing in the world of music, and never has its hold upon the local public been more strongly in evidence than at

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH NEW YORK
Address
Date DEC 8 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN BRAHMS

Max Fiedler Gives Fine Interpretation—Miss Parlow Is Heard as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night at Carnegie Hall before one of those crowded and justly enthusiastic audiences which Colonel Higginson's admirable foundation has the fortunate habit of evoking. Max Fiedler conducted, Anton Witek led the first violins and Miss Kathleen Parlow, the Canadian violinist, was the soloist.

The concert began with Cherubini's overture, "Lodoiska," a work of a rococo mixture of styles, which, while proving Cherubini's right to the title of musicianship, adds little to the minimum of moribund favor with wnich he is received by modern concert audiences.

The delight and the master work of the concert was the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, a composer whose might and beauty grow the greater and the more obvious, like those of Niagara, the more we study and contemplate them. The sublime in art has been defined as that which makes men and women think better of themselves. Brahms deals with that which approaches the sublime. He has something of the bareness, the coldness, the remoteness of the mountaintops. But he has also their dignity and their serenity. He has been some time dead, but with each year of his loss, we realize something more of his grandeur, something more of the musical lesson he has taught us.

The performance of his Fourth Symphony last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra can only be regarded as perfection. A German writer once said that before the normality of perfection one should be silent. Criticism, even constructive criticism—to use a cant term of the day—can well afford to be tranquil before the interpretation of Brahm's Fourth that was given last night.

At the end of the first movement the audience in spontaneous pleasure redoubled its applause. Miss Parlow played the Saint-Saens violin concerto in B-minor. Her tone is vigorous, rich and musical. Her interpretation scholarly and sound.

The concert ended with Tschaikowsky's fantasia after Shakespeare called "Romeo et Juliette."

Tschaikowsky did not understand Shakespeare.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
DEC 8 - 191

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

KATHLEEN PARLOW.

From EVENING GLOBE,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 8 - 1911

THE Boston Symphony Orches is in town once more, but Mr Fiedler, who has been giving th "Istar" variations of d'Indy and other interesting things in Boston, seems to think there is no need of bringing them over to New York. However, the present season is supposed to be Mr. Fiedler's last with the Boston orchestra, so let us be patient with him and hope for better things to come. At least the orchestra is always a joy.

Last night the first half of the concert, in Carnegie Hall as usual, was the best. Cherubini's "Lodoiska" overture, something of a wonder in Paris in 1791, opened it. The overture is not the equal of its author's "Anacreon," but it is worth the revival for its classic clearness of design and the genuine beauty of the slow introduction and of the second theme of the overture proper. Then came Brahm's E minor symphony, the forbidding fourth. Just why this symphony is neglected in favor of its three predecessors is difficult to see. The andante is of heavenly beauty, the following allegro giocoso a scherzo of unquestionable effectiveness, and the final "Ciacona" deserves to rank among the most notable symphonic movements. Only the very characteristic first movement is something of a nut to crack, and Mr. Fiedler's interpretation did not assist in that feat. The rest of the symphony, however, made its effect. At its conclusion the conductor signalled his men to rise and share with him the applause.

The second half of the concert began with Saint-Saëns B minor violin concerto, in which Miss Kathleen Parlow, the soloist of the occasion, again showed her extraordinary accomplishment, to the evident delight of the great audience. Miss Parlow seems ambitious to play here more concertos than any other violinist, and she seems in a fair way of doing so. One cannot, therefore, blame her for wishing to play this one. It is not one of the greatest violin concertos, but it is among the best compositions of Saint-Saëns, and Miss Parlow plays it exceedingly well. So far the selection of pieces was commendable, if not the order of their presentation. But why append Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," prolonging the concert beyond the two-hour limit, when in any case bringing Tschaikowsky to New York is bringing coals to Newcastle? The fact that it was well played is no sufficient excuse. We expect the best playing from the Boston orchestra, and we should like to expect programmes as good as its playing.

To-morrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs" (with Miss Parlow as solo violinist), and Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture."

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With all of its accustomed perfection of musicianship, but with a program that left something to be desired, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the Academy of Music last night with Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, as soloist. Beginning with the colorful and imaginative "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which all of the marvelous resources of the full orchestra are used for the painting of the pictures, the interest of the evening steadily diminished through Bruch's none-too-inspired "Scotch Fantasie" for solo violin and orchestra until it expired in a sigh of positive relief after the bespectacled pedagogy of Brahms' Academic Festival Orchestra.

Both the orchestra and the soloist were in the best of form. Miss Parlow played with a clarity, strength and precision that proved her thorough grounding in technic and her interpretation was marked by both warmth and sympathy. She was greeted with a deserved enthusiasm that grew to such strength that it threatened to become objectionable, but the young artist could scarcely be begrudged the evidences of a popular approval, which she so well merited.

Max Fiedler, as usual, had his orchestra under perfect control. So often has the almost perfect work of this organization been commented upon that there is nothing left to be said of it except the statement that it maintained its high standard.

"Die Ge[illegible]

From PRESS,
Address New York City,
Date DEC - 1911

MISS PARLOW GAINS FAVOR.

Canadian Violinist Heard in Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

With Miss Kathleen Parlow, the slimmest and tallest of all fair violinists, as its bright and particular "star," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the impetuous and vigorous leadership of Max Fiedler, gave its second Thursday evening concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The symphony of the occasion was Brahms's Fourth, in E minor, a work not heard as often as it merits. Another composition infrequently performed, Cherubin's overture to "Lodoiska," served as an introductory number and Tschaikowsky's beautiful and richly orchestrated overture Fantasa after Shakespeare's "Romeo et Juliet," brought the programme to an end. The idea of opening the evening with a classical selection, criticised in its day, strange as it may seem to twentieth century folk, for its "noisy and often unnatural effects of instrumental profusion," and closing it with a highly romantic and emotional creation of comparatively recent origin, was a felicitous one, though the concert proved to be somewhat too long.

Miss Parlow had chosen Saint-Saens's familiar concerto in B minor as the vehicle of her art and there was no room for doubt that she won the favor of her auditors from the outset. Her playing, indeed, deserved fully the demonstrations of approval it evoked, for it reflected unusual musical gifts as well as technical skill. Yet it is difficult to understand how the young Canadian violinist can be ranked as equal to Zimbalist, who, by the way, received his education from the same Russian master. Her tone is not nearly as big, round and mellow as his; her bowing not nearly as broad, steady and smooth; her finger technique not nearly as impeccable, and her intonation not nearly as reliable.

In the opening allegro Miss Parlow seemed somewhat nervous. There were no manifestations of excitement, however, in the Andantino, which could well have borne a greater admixture of tender sentiment than the violinist infused into it.

The piece de resistance of the evening, however, was unquestionably the Brahms symphony which revealed the rich euphony of the orchestra's strings, the extraordinary technical virtuosity and unanimity of the band as a whole and the enthusiasm of the man in command in a way that brought tumultuous and prolonged applause at the close. Max Fiedler had all his men stand up in recognition of this tribute of admiration. M. S.

From EVENING STAR,
Address Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 6 - 1

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The brilliant solo work of Kathleen Parlow, violinist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, was the marked feature of a concert that will probably rank as one of the most enjoyable ever given by this famous organization in this city.

Conductor Max Fiedler had provided a program of rare and varied melodic beauty, and the orchestra never seemed in better spirit in its ready response to his beat.

Opening with the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite "Scheherazade" op. 35, with its varied movements and oriental strains, the program consisted of Saint-Saens' "Concerto in B Minor for Violin and Orchestra, No. 3," op. 61, with Miss Parlow as the soloist, and conducted with Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," op. 80, with its college suggestions, so dear to the German heart.

Aside from its characteristic excellence, the orchestra presented an additional claim to the applause with which it was greeted in the superb work of its concert master, A. Witek.

Miss Parlow, however, with the magic of her marvelous tone, technique and sympathetic execution, was easily the most prominent feature of the concert, and her work was rewarded with such volumes of applause that she was obliged to bow her acknowledgments many times.

From TIMES,
Address Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 6 - 1911

Warm Welcome Given Boston Symphony Music

A rousing welcome was given Director Fiedler and his Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, its second appearance this season, when Miss Kathleen Parlow was the soloist. There was a large audience, the boxes and seats being occupied by the cream of Washington society, and progressive musical people.

The opening number, the symphonic suite, "Schezerade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Rimsky-Korsakoff, was the opening number. The four movements of this composition being given, Miss Parlow was heard in Saint-Saens' Concerto in B minor, No. 3, opus 61. This composition, full of difficult passages, was given with wonderful power and clarity by the soloist, who was received enthusiastically.

It has been many days since the Washington music loving public has given a soloist a warmer welcome.

The concluding number was Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," the famed "Gaudeamus Igitur" being the leading motif. While the program is not the most brilliant that has been presented by the Boston organization, it represented the highest type of symphonic music.

[94]

From EVENING SUN,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

DIGNIFIED READING OF LISZT'S "DANTE"

Boston Orchestra Gives An Excellent Concert At Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Lyric. As a tribute to the genius of Franz Liszt, whose centenary of birth is being observed in musical circles, Mr. Fiedler had selected this master's stupendous symphony which is based on Dante's "Divina Commedia" as the principal offering of the evening. This is a truly representative work, and, like the 12 symphonic poems of this composer, bears the strongest evidence of Liszt's mastery over orchestral difficulties.

In the "Dante Symphony" Liszt has carried out the idea of program music, a form of writing that up to the period at which this composition was conceived had a strong adherent in Hector Berlioz, whose works, in fact, can be given the distinction of being the instigation of this descriptive style. But, unlike the French composer who in his native manner has endeavored to portray the story and its dramatic situations in music, Liszt has departed from his predecessor by emphasizing only the pictoral and symbolic bearing of the poem upon which a musical work was built.

In the symphony heard last night the poetic element can be said to have been successfully introduced. The first movement, picturing The Inferno, with its strife and horror; the second section, depicting Purgatorio, with a repentful and meditative mood, and the final choral part, representing the Magnificat, in which exultant spirit and devotional calm prevail. This is brought about for the most part by melodic means that are lucently clear; the phrases have an æsthetic dignity, though at times their beauty must necessarily be covered owing to certain descriptive delineation. They, however, have meaning and are poetically convincing. There is intensity of feeling embodied throughout the entire work, but, like all program music, the hearer, however, must be familiar with the subject musically outlined before a thorough digestion and appreciation of the composer's intent can be attained. Although the "Divina Commedia" is a classic with which every student is more or less familiar, and even though descriptive program notes were given, judging by the amount of applause and by the attitude of the audience the full meaning of the symphony did not convey itself to all.

Dignified Reading.

Mr. Fiedler gave a dignified reading and presented this work without any mawkish exaggeration of its sentiment. The Women's Philharmonic Chorus augmented by voices from the Baltimore Oratorio Society, supplied the vocal part with a fair quality of tone. The chorus lacked precision, but as there were mainly unprofessional singers a better attack and more perfect blending could hardly be expected. Kathleen Parlow, the violin soloist at this concert came heralded with many glowing accounts as to her abilities. The opening passages of the Saint-Saens B minor concerto soon allowed the listener to judge for himself what claims for recognition this girlish artist rightfully had. It was amazing to hear such a large and noble tone come from such a slender frame for the virility of this tone denotes physical strength. Miss Parlow's left hand technic is accurate, every digital situation being presented with clarity of movement. At times in appearance there seems to be a slight stiffness of the bow arm, but in the outcome of sound this is not noticeable. Her interpretation was full of refinement. The beauty of Saint-Saens' concerto evidently appeals to Miss Parlow, for she gave its flowing melodies with inherent feeling. There were many recalls after this fine exhibition of violin playing.

Work Very Effective.

Tchaikowski's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasie was the closing number. From the outset the woodwind with their rich coloring immediately manifest that Tchaikowski here is in accord with his subject.

The themes are vigorous, passionate and lamentful as the suggestion warrants, and, as a whole, the work is very effective. This composition is one for which Mr. Fiedler should be given thanks for offering at these concerts as its splendid instrumentation allows this highly developed body of orchestral players their fullest emotional sway.

F. C. B.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date DEC 5 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert of Season With Kathleen Parlow as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler at its head, gave its second concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The program consisted of only three numbers, but was none the less interesting for that, nor did it fail to win the entire approval of the large audience.

The first number was Rimsky-Korsakoff's much-debated symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," composed as "program music" to illustrate some of the incidents of "The Thousand and One Nights" of glorious Oriental memory. The work is divided into four movements and is essentially an excellent one, full of vigor, color, melody and exquisite harmony. In many ways it is characteristically Russian, in others it speaks a musical language essentially universal and partaking of no particular national school. Thematically it is rich and handled in most musicianly form. The characteristic [illegible] herazade or Narrator Motif) is heard all through the work, mostly from the violins. Needless to say, Mr. Fiedler gave the composition a splendid reading, backed by the telling work of the famed Boston choirs before him.

The soloist of the evening was Kathleen Parlow, the highly-talented young violiniste who first appeared here about a year ago and was last heard with Mr. Pohlig's organization. Her number, Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," gave full play for all the virtuosity that was in the soloist. Bruch has thrown a very great haze of violin technique around the highland melodies used as his basis, but Miss Parlow's rendition of them fairly thrilled her audience. And when tone, expression and the delicate qualities of her art were needed she displayed them to a high degree. That her hearers were charmed as well as enthusiastic was shown by the fact that Miss Parlow was required to respond to no less than twelve calls. The concert ended with Brahms's Academic Festival Overture.

POST,

From

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 6 - 1911

GIVES SECOND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Assisted by Kathleen Parlow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its second program for Washington society and musicians yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater, and again gave its best; in fact, the program was most satisfying. The symphonic suite, "Schehrazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff, is stupendous, and to be fully appreciated must be heard many times. In fact, it is a work exhausting both to auditor and player.

The Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture" was a fitting climax, expressing as it does the German students' loyalty to the fatherland, merrymaking, and youthful exultation. The overture is both great and tragic, working out to a deeply impressive fantasia.

Much interest centered on Kathleen Parlow's appearence with the orchestra, and she received the most enthusiastic applause after her playing of Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor, for violin and orchestra. It would be absurd to talk "technic" or to express a conservative opinion of Miss Parlow's playing. She is a master of herself, technic, memory, and intonation. The remarkable position of suspended bow, high over her violin, followed by the positive assertion of the first note, pianissimo or fortissimo, with the intonation, was striking. It was just this once regretted that the Boston Orchestra allows no encores.

The splendid playing of Concert Master Witek calls for more comment than can be given in this restricted space.

The third matinee will be given on Tuesday, January 9.

POST,

From

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 6 - 1911

Mrs. Taft attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The guests in her box were Mrs. George W. Wickersham, Mrs. Robert S. Oliver, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, and Mrs. Winthrop's mother, Mrs. Charles Wood.

Mrs. Norman William had the box adjoining that of Mrs. Taft. Her guests were the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, and Mrs. Wesley Merritt. Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth were among the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Preston Gibson, in their box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had a box party, including Miss Mary Carlisle and Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle.

Among others in the audience were the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, the Danish Minister, Baroness Preuschen, Mrs. George von L. Meyer, the Misses Meyer, Mrs. Horace Lurton, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Miss Elizabeth Anderson, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Nathaniel Simpkins, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph H. McKim, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Marion Oliver, Mr. Samuel Hill, Mrs. H. H. Hosley, Mrs. William Dennis, Mrs. Christian Heurich, and Miss Keyser.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date 1911

BRAHMS ADMIRERS OUT AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor Max Fiedler and His Orchestra in Best Form at Carnegie Hall Concert.

Brahms's fourth symphony was the principal composition on last evening's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that attracted the usual immense audience to Carnegie Hall.

Musicians who delight in form and who were present at this, the first of the second pair of concerts by this organization, were not stinted. There are many ardent Brahms admirers who believe his musical utterances to be among the world's great masterpieces. Others hold to a contrary opinion.

Music lovers of lofty artistic ideals must have been impressed with the Brahms composition so admirably interpreted last night. It is long, but, despite some tedious moments, the work of a musical giant who knew his craft.

The assemblage showed its appreciation by a prolonged demonstration at the completion of the symphony's performance and insisted upon the musicians sharing the calls with Conductor Max Fiedler.

Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, was the soloist. She played the Saint-Saens B minor concerto with beauty of tone, pure intonation, good taste and finish. The concert was closed with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia overture.

The orchestra was in its best form, which means that it played in superlative fashion.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 8 - 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

Fine Performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony—Kathleen Parlow, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert in Carnegie Hall offered nothing that was new, though Cherubini's overture to the opera of "Lodoiska" was probably old enough and had been long enough absent from New York concert programmes to be unfamiliar to many in last night's audience. It is, indeed, old-fashioned music; but it bears its age with dignity, and it still has an interest that is more than historical for concertgoers of the present day.

Mr. Fiedler gave an unusually eloquent rendering of Brahms's fourth symphony, though the performance was not in all respects so perfectly finished as performances of the Boston Orchestra usually are. It was elaborated in the fullest detail; but the care with which Brahms's teeming ideas in this symphony were developed was paired with a care to make the detail contribute steadily to the musical significance and larger effect of the whole. There was a robust energy in the performance which set forth the essential quality of the work itself; and the haunting melancholy of the andante was embodied with peculiar sympathy. In the wonderful passacaglia that forms the last movement—really a set of variations on the scale of E minor—there were a thrilling passion and a splendid sonority. The audience was deeply stirred, and recalled Mr. Fiedler several times, till he made the orchestra rise and take a share of the applause themselves.

Miss Kathleen Parlow was the soloist. She had already appeared in New York this season, but her performance of Saint Saens's B minor concerto for the violin created much interest. It is not very engrossing music, and in the last movement it reaches the commonplace. But it has attractive qualities of elegance and polished symmetry, and is so written as to be "grateful" to a player who has the skill to reproduce its spirit. Miss Parlow's large tone, its warmth and purity, her accurate technique that presents its filligree of passage work with rare precision of intonation, the vitality of her style gave distinction to her performance, which was fully appreciated.

The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," played with great ardor.

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 8 - 1911

MUSIC

The Boston Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a joyous occasion at Carnegie Hall last night for the so-called "Brahmins" in music. They played the Fourth Symphony of the man whom a few hundred thousand music-lovers in Germany, France, England and America believe to have been not entirely devoid of talent, namely, that is to say, one Johannes Brahms. They not only played the symphony, but played it gloriously, as if they themselves found delight in the pleasure which they knew they were providing for their hearers. As for the audience, there was no chance to debate for a moment whether or not it was appreciation of the composition and its performance; the applause which followed every movement settled that question. The reading on the part of Mr. Fiedler and the exposition on the part of the orchestra were equally eloquent and admirable, and the incident of its performance will be underscored with a broad line in the memory of all the lovers of symphonic music who heard it.

Extended comment will scarcely be expected on the other features of the programme. The notion, to which wide publication was given, that Cherubini's overtures had so fallen into desuetude that a revival of that to "Lodoiska" needed to be trumpeted forth as an incident of large and curious significance could only have grown out of Boston's habitual disregard of New York's musical doings. While the Philharmonic Society remained what it was planned to be the most Beethovenian of all Beethoven's contemporaries was never neglected. Nevertheless, it was a pleasure to hear the old overture again and to recognize its great value as a corrective of popular taste. Miss Parlow played the concerto in B minor for violin by Saint-Saëns in her freest and most audacious style—the style which sometimes makes one imagine her not as what Von Bülow called Mme. Norman-Neruda, "the violin fairy," but as the instrument incarnate; she seems so to respond to every one of its vibrations, or it to every one of hers. The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

"SCHEHERAZADE" OF NICHOLAS RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, FOUNDED ON "ARABIAN NIGHTS," PRESENTED BY MAX FIEDLER, LEADING THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, IN THE NEW ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Last night more Russian music. This time in the New Academy of Music, Borough of Brooklyn, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra held forth, under the baton of Max Fiedler, in Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff's elaborate symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Miss Kathleen Parlow, the fair virtuoso of the violin, was the soloist of the concert, rendering with the band from "Down East" the lovely melodies of Bonnie Scotland embraced by Max Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie." It is scarcely necessary to state that the audience filled every seat in the big theater, orchestra, balconies, boxes—tout!

Because a decided fascination attaches in the minds of almost everybody to the Arabian tale of "The Thousand Nights and a Night," and because the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, has treated his voluptuous subject matter with wondrous skill and to bewildering effect, the "Scheherazade" makes its instant appeal to the lover and the judge of orchestral music. As a symphonic etude, it presents a brilliant array of strikingly contrasted themes, which are developed into climaxes of dramatic and pictorial power. The work was given a presentation of finished character, to which every instrument and choir of instruments of the big orchestra contributed a minute thoroughness of intonation, rhythm and every detail of performance. Of arresting effect was the variety and color afforded the pizzicatti string passages in the second movement ("Story of the Kalandar Prince"). After he had been several times recalled. Maestro Fiedler obliged his players to rise from their seats and acknowledge the prolonged applause that greeted the conclusion of the suite.

Miss Parlow's execution of the "Scotch Fantasy" was one with her delivery of the same composition with the Symphony Society of New York, in Manhattan a month or so ago. Her mastery of its technical difficulties manifestly pleased the attending 2,000 or 3,000 hearers. The orchestral support was in every way effective.

Claude Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Faun,'" exquisitely performed by the orchestra, and the overture to Carl Maria von Weber's opera, "Oberon," likewise admirably handled, formed the balance of the program.

[95]

From EVENING NEWS.
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 6 1911

"DANTE" OF LISZT AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Musical Organization Will Be Assisted By Woman's Philharmonic.

A Baltimore musical organization, the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, will assist at the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given tonight in the Lyric, with Miss Kathleen Parlow, a new violinist, as soloist.

The symphony of the evening will be the "Dante," of Liszt, in honor of the Liszt centenary, and it is in the magnificat of the last movement that the chorus will be heard. The organization is composed of 40 Baltimore concert and church female soloists, and during the short period of its existence has won a reputation for seriousness of purpose and ability to interpret difficult compositions for women's voices. The chorus was founded three years ago by Joseph Pache, who has remained its conductor, as has Mrs. Charles Morton its president since its institution.

The soloist Mr. Fiedler selected for tonight will be Miss Kathleen Parlow, a young Canadian violinist, who, while she has been creating a furore both in this country and in Europe for several years heretofore, has not been heard in Baltimore. Her number will be the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor, No. 3.

From EAGLE,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 8 - 1911

GLANCING COLORS IN MUSIC.

Mr. Mason's Lecture on Boston Symphony Numbers to Be Played Tonight.

In lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Daniel Gregory Mason of Manhattan, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to present in the opera house of that building this evening. He devoted most of the time to the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the opening number. Showing the rich Oriental coloring of the title page of the music, which is published in St. Petersburg, Mr. Mason noted the likeness between the emerald green, Prussian blue and crimson ornamenting its background, and the Oriental quality and intense color of Russian music.

This composition tells the story of the "Arabian Nights' Tales"—of a few of them—the theme of Scheherazade, the narrator, heard generally in the solo violin, or perhaps in a wood-wind instrument, being ever present and in contrast with the themes of the four movements. In "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," it sounds against the sea theme, which is announced frequently and heard in many transformations until the movement reaches a beautiful and poetic conclusion.

In the "Story of the Kalandar Prince," the dominating story-element is restated by different instruments, as if appearing in different color or from different points of view, this being especially noticeable in the fanfare. The first and second movements and the themes of "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" were played, but the limitations of the pianoforte permitted only the presentation of the main themes and peroration from the fourth movement.

In color, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the third number which the orchestra will play tonight, was shown to be the opposite of the Russian composer's music. "Vagueness seems to be in the air—grays, modified by soft pinks, greens and pale blue, predominate," said Mr. Mason. This "color" is obtained by the clever use of the wood-wind and the harp. The other numbers of the programme, Bruch's Fantasie on Scotch Airs, for violin and orchestra, in which Miss Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist, and the overture to "Oberon," by von Weber, were omitted from the lecture recial because of lack of time.

From N. Y. AMERICAN
Address
Date DEC 8 1911

Boston Symphony Heard with Kathleen Parlow

"Lodoiska" Overture the Feature of Carnegie Hall Concert, by the Famous Orchestra.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

One new feature—and the oldest work

Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That feature was the "Lodoiska" overture of Cherubini. "Lodoiska" was produced in 1791 and helped, with some of Gluck's earlier works, to reshape French opera.

Brahms's Symphony in E minor, beautifully played, was the chief item in the programme.

The soloist last night was Kathleen Parlow, a young artist who has soul and poetry, technique and just a touch at least of masculine strength. She promised wonders when we heard her first, a year ago, and she has kept her promise. Miss Parlow now stands in the foremost rank, side by side with such violinists of high fame as Kreisler and Zimbalist.

Mr. Fiedler, as usual, conducted.

From EVENING JOURNAL,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 8 1911

Kathleen Parlow Plays in Masterly Fashion at Concert

By IRVING WEIL.

MISS KATHLEEN PARLOW, with her violin and her handkerchief, again caused us many delights when she appeared last night for the second time of the season, now as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

It may be that you think we harp too persistently upon the significance of that handkerchief, but we don't agree with you. In fact, we refuse to be convinced in this matter. That handkerchief has become indissolubly associated with Miss Parlow in our minds, and it will not out.

Last night she brought it forth as soon as her earnest and unbending presence had come to a standstill beside Conductor Max Fiedler. Her naive and unique manipulation of this handkerchief is a symbol of her essential girlishness to us, and it was with reawakened satisfaction that we saw it projected slowly toward Mr. Fiedler's desk. He did not give it a lonely chair all for itself as Mr. Walter Damrosch did recently, but let it rest companionably next the score of Saint-Saens's B minor concerto for violin and orchestra, which Miss Parlow thereupon proceeded to play.

Miss Parlow is growing by the month—musically speaking. She now has the assurance of the artist who is not only sure of herself, but knows precisely what she wants to do. Her interpretation of the Saint-Saens concerto made it the sincere and gracious thing it is. And as for those arpeggios in harmonics at the end of the second movement, why she executed them with a trumpet-like purity and sonority that were ravishing in effect. Miss Parlow's bowing seems to be freer and more masterly than ever before, and she now produces a gorgeous singing tone that was particularly effective in this concerto of many cantabile passages.

The chief offering of Mr. Fiedler was the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. The oftener it is heard, the more labored it appears to be, and this is most strongly apparent in the third and last movements. The former is supposed to be jocose in content, but Brahms could not possibly be comic without being serio-comic. This symphony is one of the works of Brahms which most lays him open to most of the charges of the anti-Brahmins.

The opening and closing numbers of the evening were Cherubini's overture to the opera "Lodoiska," and Tschaikowsky's overture fantasy, "Romeon and Juliet." Mr. Fiedler resurrected the former and while it proved interesting, it is not very likely to have its sleep unduly disturbed.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 8 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST
CONCERT AT CARNEGI

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert last night in Carnegie hall before a typical Boston Symphony audience, which is synonymous with the statement that there was not an empty seat in the house. The programme was rather longer than usual, including two numbers of more than ordinary length and an overture, in addition to the soloist, Miss Parlow, who played the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor for violin.

Cherubini's overture to the opera "Lodoiska" was in the nature of a novelty, not being in the least familiar to the present-day audiences, and much of its charm lay in its flavor of an older day. This made an excellent prelude for the superb presentation of the Brahms symphony in E minor, No. 4, which was given with all Mr. Fiedler's skill in works by the great German composer, and this was played with such brilliancy, with such virtuosity and such splendor of orchestral color, that in response to the numerous recalls Mr. Fiedler requested the musicians to arise to an acknowledgment, when the outburst of this great critical audience proved the keen appreciation of the offering. Even the ten-minute wait was not long enough to have made the Saint-Saens concerto sound to its best advantage, and it seemed colorless and weak between the Brahms and the Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy which followed it. Miss Parlow again showed her exceptional technical equipment, her dexterity and many feminine qualities, including polish, a clear pure tone, if not very large, and a graceful interpretation. Her intonation is good on the whole.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date DEC 11 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of its New York concerts Saturday afternoon, when Mr. Fiedler gave a reading full of brilliancy and barbaric splendor to the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic poem, "Scheherazade." Carnegie hall was completely full, and the applause was overwhelming at the close of this number. Miss Parlow repeated the Bruch Scotch fantasy, which she played with the New York Symphony orchestra recently, with much the same effect.

From TIMES,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 11 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Well Rendered Programme Given at Academy of Music.

Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn have become an institution. To no other form of musical entertainment is response more unanimous, appreciation deeper, or expression of it more concrete.

At last Friday night's concert at the Academy of Music the opera house was filled, as usual. As the curtain was drawn back disclosing the members of the orchestra, there was a burst of spontaneous applause, which was redoubled at the appearance of Mr. Fiedler, the conductor.

The first number on the programme was Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," which if lacking somewhat in the sensuous and exotic Oriental charm imparted to the work by some conductors, yet was affluent in suavity and gracious melodic beauty. The unanimity and precision of the orchestra was finely apparent as if minds were attuned to the spirit of the music, supplementing the technical excellence of their work. Mr. Witek's incidental violin solo work in the first movement was worthy of praise. The third movement was played with engaging spirit and sentiment.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, was the assisting artist. Her number nwas the Bruch Fantasie on Scottish "Airs," for violin and orchestra, Op. 46. This amazing young woman has a large, mellow tone of great purity, her intonation is precise, her bowing strong, steady and smooth, her finger technique admirable. In her playing of the "Fantasie" Friday night she disclosed a deeper feeling and finer perception of balance, giving a rendition of beauty and dignity. She was recalled many times to acknowledge the applause of the large audience.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme, was played with perception of its sylvan charm and exquisite, almost intangible suggestion of the changing moods of an elemental creature, part lesser god and part human creature. The closing number was Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon."

Intelligent readers make profitable customers. Advertisers in the Times get the most satisfactory results.

From STANDARD UNION,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 11 '11

H. T. Parker, of the Boston "Transcript," was so impressed by Harold Bauer's preformance in Boston with the Boston Symphony, the Kneisels and in recital, that he urges the Boston Symphony to secure Mr. Bauer for a return engagement to play the Brahm's D minor concerto with which Mr. Bauer recently made such a pronounced success with the Philharmonic Society in Manhattan. Mr. Bauer will give a recital in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon playing the Schumann "Kreisleriana," Liszt sonata in B minor, Schumann fantasia, and Chopin ballade in F and etude op. 10, Nos. 3, 4 and 12.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World, N. Y.
From New York Theatre.
Address New York City, N. Y.

In contrast were the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Max Fiedler, who began his final season as leader of this famous orchestra. The sound of these strings, and the exquisite coloring of the orchestra's woodwind, always cause batallions of little thrills to go prancing up and down the spines of even the most hardened music critics. They played a novelty, "A Comedy Overture," by Max Reger, who, with Richard Strauss, disputes the position of most modern and ultra complex musicians in Germany, alive and composing to-day. "A Comedy Overture" is a clever, disappointing writing. Its themes are all brief; and while its mood is well sustained in the jubilant, humorous spirit, yet it lacks sweep and consistency. It is a fearfully difficult work, but the brave men from Boston Town played it as though it were a Haydn allegro. Stauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was also wonderfully performed and so, at the second concert, was Debussy's exotic "Afternoon of a Faun" exquisitely given. Schumann-Heink was the soloist, and she was in remarkably good voice, excelling in dramatic numbers.

POST,
DECEMBER 17, 1911

Lilla Ormond in Recital

Miss Lilla Ormond, the young Boston singer who, in the few years that she has been before the public, has risen to the highest rank of mezzo-sopranos, will give a recital in this city on Thursday, Jan. 4.

The Next Symphony Programme

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of distinctively holiday nature on the programme which will be played at the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G Major No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of this work was one of the pronounced successes of last season and many requests have been made for a repetition of it. The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," "The Minuet of the Will of the Wisps," "The Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Hungarian March." There will be no soloist.

[96]

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date 1911

"DANTE" OF LISZT AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Musical Organization Will Be Assisted By Woman's Philharmonic.

A Baltimore musical organization, the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, will assist at the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given tonight in the Lyric, with Miss Kathleen Parlow, a new violinist, as soloist.

The symphony of the evening will be the "Dante," of Liszt, in honor of the Liszt centenary, and it is in the magnificat of the last movement that the chorus will be heard. The organization is composed of 40 Baltimore concert and church female soloists, and during the short period of its existence has won a reputation for seriousness of purpose and ability to interpret difficult compositions for women's voices. The chorus was founded three years ago by Joseph Pache, who has remained its conductor, as has Mrs. Charles Morton its president since its institution.

The soloist Mr. Fiedler selected for tonight will be Miss Kathleen Parlow, a young Canadian violinist, who, while she has been creating a furore both in this country and in Europe for several years heretofore, has not been heard in Baltimore. Her number will be the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor, No. 3.

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 8 - 1911

GLANCING COLORS IN MUSIC.

Mr. Mason's Lecture on Boston Symphony Numbers to Be Played Tonight.

In lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Daniel Gregory Mason of Manhattan, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to present in the opera house of that building this evening. He devoted most of the time to the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the opening number. Showing the rich Oriental coloring of the title page of the music, which is published in St. Petersburg, Mr. Mason noted the likeness between the emerald green, Prussian blue and crimson ornamenting its background, and the Oriental quality and intense color of Russian music.

This composition tells the story of the "Arabian Nights' Tales"—of a few of them—the theme of Scheherazade, the narrator, heard generally in the solo violin, or perhaps in a wood-wind instrument, being ever present and in contrast with the themes of the four movements. In "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," it sounds against the sea theme, which is announced frequently and heard in many transformations until the movement reaches a beautiful and poetic conclusion.

In the "Story of the Kalandar Prince," the dominating story-element is restated by different instruments, as if appearing in different color or from different points of view, this being especially noticeable in the fanfare. The first and second movements and the themes of "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" were played, but the limitations of the pianoforte permitted only the presentation of the main themes and peroration from the fourth movement.

In color, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the third number which the orchestra will play tonight, was shown to be the opposite of the Russian composer's music. "Vagueness seems to be in the air—grays, modified by soft pinks, greens and pale blue, predominate," said Mr. Mason. This "color" is obtained by the clever use of the wood-wind and the harp. The other numbers of the programme, Bruch's Fantasie on Scotch Airs, for violin and orchestra, in which Miss Kathleen Parlow will be the soloist, and the overture to "Oberon," by von Weber, were omitted from the lecture recial because of lack of time.

From N. Y. AMERICA

Address

Date DEC 8 1911

Boston Symphony Heard with Kathleen Parlow

"Lodoiska" Overture the Feature of Carnegie Hall Concert, by the Famous Orchestra.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

One new feature—and the oldest work concert given last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That feature was the "Lodoiska" overture of Cherubini. "Lodoiska" was produced in 1791 and helped, with some of Gluck's earlier works, to reshape French opera.

Brahms's Symphony in E minor, beautifully played, was the chief item in the programme.

The soloist last night was Kathleen Parlow, a young artist who has soul and poetry, technique and just a touch at least of masculine strength. She promised wonders when we heard her first, a year ago, and she has kept her promise. Miss Parlow now stands in the foremost rank, side by side with such violinists of high fame as Kreisler and Zimbalist.

Mr. Fiedler, as usual, conducted.

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date 1911

Kathleen Parlow Plays in Masterly Fashion at Concert

By IRVING WEIL.

MISS KATHLEEN PARLOW, with her violin and her handkerchief, again caused us many delights when she appeared last night for the second time of the season, now as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

It may be that you think we harp too persistently upon the significance of that handkerchief, but we don't agree with you. In fact, we refuse to be convinced in this matter. That handkerchief has become indissolubly associated with Miss Parlow in our minds, and it will not out.

Last night she brought it forth as soon as her earnest and unbending presence had come to a standstill beside Conductor Max Fiedler. Her naïve and unique manipulation of this handkerchief is a symbol of her essential girlishness to us, and it was with reawakened satisfaction that we saw it projected slowly toward Mr. Fiedler's desk. He did not give it a lonely chair all for itself as Mr. Walter Damrosch did recently, but let it rest companionably next the score of Saint-Saens's B minor concerto for violin and orchestra, which Miss Parlow thereupon proceeded to play.

Miss Parlow is growing by the month—musically speaking. She now has the assurance of the artist who is not only sure of herself, but knows precisely what she wants to do. Her interpretation of the Saint-Saens concerto made it the sincere and gracious thing it is. And as for those arpeggios in harmonics at the end of the second movement, why she executed them with a trumpet-like purity and sonority that were ravishing in effect. Miss Parlow's bowing seems to be freer and more masterly than ever before, and she now produces a gorgeous singing tone that was particularly effective in this concerto of many cantabile passages.

The chief offering of Mr. Fiedler was the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. The oftener it is heard, the more labored it appears to be, and this is most strongly apparent in the third and last movements. The former is supposed to be jocose in content, but Brahms could not possibly be comic without being serio-comic. This symphony is one of the works of Brahms which most lays him open to most of the charges of the anti-Brahmins.

The opening and closing numbers of the evening were Cherubini's overture to the opera "Lodoiska," and Tschaikowsky's overture fantasy, "Romeon and Juliet." Mr. Fiedler resurrected the former and while it proved interesting, it is not very likely to have its sleep unduly disturbed.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible] New York

In contrast were the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Max Fiedler, who began his final season as leader of this famous orchestra. The sund of these strings, nd the exquisite coloring of the o estra's woodwind, always ause batallions of little thrills to g prancing up and down the spines of even the most hardened music critics. They played a novelty, "A Comedy Overture," by Max Reger, who, with Richard Strauss, disputes the position of most modern and ultra complex musicians in Germany, alive and composing to-day. "A Comedy Overture" is a clever, disappointing writing. Its themes are all brief; and while its mood is well sustained in the jubilant, humorous spirit, yet it lacks sweep and consistency. It is a fearfully difficult work, but the brave men from Boston Town played it as though it were a Haydn allegro. Stauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was also wonderfully performd and so, at the second concert, was Debussy's exotic "Afternoon of a Faun" exquisitely given. Schumann-Heink was the soloist, and she was in remarkably good voice, excelling in dramatic numbers.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST CONCERT AT CARNEGI HALL

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert last night in Carnegie hall before a typical Boston Symphony audience, which is synonymous with the statement that there was not an empty seat in the house. The programme was rather longer than usual, including two numbers of more than ordinary length and an overture, in addition to the soloist, Miss Parlow, who played the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor for violin.

Cherubini's overture to the opera "Lodoiska" was in the nature of a novelty, not being in the least familiar to the present-day audiences, and much of its charm lay in its flavor of an older day. This made an excellent prelude for the superb presentation of the Brahms symphony in E minor, No. 4, which was given with all Mr. Fiedler's skill in works by the great German composer, and this was played with such brilliancy, with such virtuosity and such splendor of orchestral color, that in response to the numerous recalls Mr. Fiedler requested the musicians to arise to an acknowledgment, when the outburst of this great critical audience proved the keen appreciation of the offering. Even the ten-minute wait was not long enough to have made the Saint-Saens concerto sound to its best advantage, and it seemed colorless and weak between the Brahms and the Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy which followed it. Miss Parlow again showed her exceptional technical equipment, her dexterity and many feminine qualities, including polish, a clear pure tone, if not very large, and a graceful interpretation. Her intonation is good on the whole.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of its New York concerts Saturday afternoon, when Mr. Fiedler gave a reading full of brilliancy and barbaric splendor to the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic poem, "Scheherazade." Carnegie hall was completely full, and the applause was overwhelming at the close of this number. Miss Parlow repeated the Bruch Scotch fantasy, which she played with the New York Symphony orchestra recently, with much the same effect.

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 11 1911

Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Well Rendered Programme Given at Academy of Music.

Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn have become an institution. To no other form of musical entertainment is response more unanimous, appreciation deeper, or expression of it more concrete.

At last Friday night's concert at the Academy of Music the opera house was filled, as usual. As the curtain was drawn back disclosing the members of the orchestra there was a burst of spontaneous applause, which was redoubled at the appearance of Mr. Fiedler, the conductor.

The first number on the programme was Rimsky-Korsoff's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," which if lacking somewhat in the sensuous and exotic Oriental charm imparted to the work by some conductors, yet was affluent in suavity and gracious melodic beauty. The unanimity and precision of the orchestra was finely apparent as if minds were attuned to the spirit of the music, supplementing the technical excellence of their work. Mr. Witek's incidental violin solo work in the first movement was worthy of praise. The third movement was played with engaging spirit and sentiment.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, was the assisting artist. Her number nwas the Bruch Fantasie o Scottish Airs," for violin and orchestra, Op. 46. This amazing young woman has a large, mellow tone of great purity, her intonation is precise, her bowing strong, steady and smooth, her finger technique admirable. In her playing of the "Fantasie" Friday night she disclosed a deeper feeling and finer perception of balance, giving a rendition of beauty and dignity. She was recalled many times to acknowledge the applause of the large audience.

Debussey's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme, was played with perception of its sylvan charm and exquisite, almost intangible suggestion of the changing moods of an elemental creature, part lesser god and part human creature. The closing number was Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon."

Intelligent readers make profitable customers. Advertisers in the Times get the most satisfactory results.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 11 1911

H. T. Parker, of the Boston "Transcript," was so impressed by Harold Bauer's preformance in Boston with the Boston Symphony, the Kneisels and in recital, that he urges the Boston Symphony to secure Mr. Bauer for a return engagement to play the Brahm's D minor concerto with which Mr. Bauer recently made such a pronounced success with the Philharmonic Society in Manhattan. Mr. Bauer will give a recital in Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon playing the Schumann "Kreislerians," Liszt sonata in B minor, Schumann fantasia, and Chopin ballade in F and etude op. 10, Nos. 3, 4 and 12.

POST,

DECEMBER 17, 1911

Lilla Ormond in Recital

Miss Lilla Ormond, the young Boston singer who, in the few years that she has been before the public, has risen to the highest rank of mezzo-sopranos, will give a recital in this city on Thursday, Jan. 4.

The Next Symphony Programme

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of distinctively holiday nature on the programme which will be played at the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G Major No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of this work was one of the pronounced successes of last season and many requests have been made for a repetition of it. The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," "The Minuet of the Will of the Wisps," "The Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Hungarian March." There will be no soloist.

[96]

SPRINGFIELD HOMESTEAD,

DECEMBER 9, 1911

KATHLEEN PARLOW.

Distinguished Canadian Violinist Who Will be the Soloist at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

FINE PROGRAM ANNOUNCED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give Its Annual Concert at Court Square Theater on Monday.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in the Court Square theater on next Monday evening at 8 o'clock. A musical feast of particular richness has been provided by Conductor Max Fiedler to mark this, his last, appearance in this city. The symphony is the greatest of modern works of its kind. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" is in the realms at least of absolute music, the most emotional. The soloist in Kathleen Parlow, the extraordinary young Canadian girl who has been for the past two seasons the musical sensation of this country. She is to play the ever-delightful Scotch Fantasie of Max Bruch. In addition to this is the old favorite standby, the overture to "Der Freischutz" by Weber, and two works quite new to Springfield, illustrative of the latest movements of wo eminent schools of European music. The first is Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the other is Sibelius's stirring symphonic poem, "Finlandia."

Curiously enough in all the visits the Boston Symphony orchestra has made, the orchestra has never played the "Pathetic" symphony here. No work of modern times has been so written about—not because it is abstruse or puzzling after the fashion of Strauss and his fellows, but because it is above all a human document. The symphony, musically speaking, appeals to even the dullest. It is full of rich, glowing melody, simply but superbly scored, and contains a march episode in the third movement which makes one of the most stirring pages in symphonic music. But the symphony which outside of Beethoven's has more performances in the course of a year than any in the literature of music, is in a sense the "swan song" of the greatest of Russian composers. Tschaikowsky died of cholera shortly after the first performance of this work. At the time of his death it was believed that he had committed suicide and that he had foretold his purpose to do so in this, his last symphony. This, of course, has long since been shown to be false. Tschaikowsky was never in better health or in better spirits than when he wrote the work, nor had he less idea of approaching death. Nonetheless, it can be said that his subconscious self in this work and especially in the wonderful last movement, the "Adagio lamentoso," gives a hint of the tragic fate so soon to come to him.

Debussy, whose "Afternoon of a Faun" will be played, is the one great genius among modern French musicians. It is said of him that he has created a new school of music as distinct in his way as that which was created by Richard Wagner. The prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" is one of his earlier works and yet one of his most characteristic. It is in a sense pastoral music in which the flute, as soloist, imitates, as it were, the shepherd's pipe. Sibelius is a Finn, and he has been doing in his symphonic poems for Finland what Chopin did in his polonaises for Poland. An ardent patriot, all his music breathes of loyalty to his native land and of revolt against the oppression which besets it. "Finlandia" is especially characteristic of his genius.

To Kathleen Parlow has come the rare honor of being soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts through an entire Southern trip. All told, she will have played with the orchestra this season 12 times. Her success everywhere has been extraordinary. She is probably the greatest violinistic talent that the modern world has ever produced. The program in its regular order is as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic." Tschaikowsky.

Scotch Fantasie for violin and orchestra. Bruch.

Prelude in "The Afternoon of a Faun." Debussy.

Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia." Sibelius.

Soloist—Kathleen Parlow.

GLOBE-

DECEMBER 17, 1911.

"Iberia" Repeated at Week's Symphony Concerts

Mr Fiedler has placed nothing of distinctive holiday nature on the program which will be played at the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case.

The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's symphony in G major No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of this brilliant work was one of the pronounced successes of last season and many requests have been made for a repetition of it.

The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—The Minuet of the Will of the Wisps; the Dance of the Sylphs and the Hungarian March. There will be no soloist.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 17, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of distinctive holiday nature on the program which will be played at the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of a lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first piece will be the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G-major No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of this brilliant work was one of the pronounced successes of last season and many requests have been made for a repetition of it. The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the Minuet of the Will of the Wisps; the Dance of the Sylphs and the Hungarian March. There will be no soloist.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 14, 1911

Items of the Day

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Fiedler will fulfil his promise to repeat Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's finest and most characteristic orchestral piece since "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Nocturnes of his earlier years. Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," a symphony by Haydn and the three familiar orchestral fragments from "The Damnation of Faust." Mr. Fiedler spent an afternoon trying to devise a "Christmas programme," but he could not find enough music in the repertory of the orchestra and of the standard of the concerts to suit his purpose. Had he succeeded, the list would probably have been much less interesting than that which he has made in the usual fashion.

ADVERTISER, DECEMBER 16, 1911

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME AN INTELLIGIBLE ONE

NO TRYING PROBLEMS TO VEX THE AUDITOR

Mr. Fiedler's Reading of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony Aroused Spontaneous Enthusiasm.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Fourth Symphony.
Bruch. "Kol Nidrei."
Boellmann. Symphonic Variations for Violoncello. Solcist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Strauss. Love-scene from "Feuersnot."
"Till Eulenspiegel."

It was a symphony that could be enjoyed and understood from beginning to end. No trying problems, no unresolved dissonances, no thorny paths and labyrinths. Yet there was a time when Weber said that the composer of the fourth symphony was quite ready for the madhouse, and when he wrote a stinging satire on the employment of the contrabasses at the end of this work. It is upon such changes of opinion that the champions of the modern dissonance-mongers build their hopes that the worst works of the present epoch may yet be accepted as beautiful music in the future. But they fail to realize that Beethoven never strayed so far from rule and form as the modern iconoclasts do.

Yet there are certain parts of the fourth symphony that are bold enough in all conscience. The third movement, which Beethoven marked as a minuet, is not a minuet at all, but the boldest of scherzos. The use of syncopation is here pushed to its utmost limit. The contrabass work at the close of the finale is more like a set of violin passages than true contrabass work. It was these passages that especially aroused the ire and the sarcasm of Weber. He wrote an article in the "Cecilia" (a musical journal of that epoch), in which he pictured the contrabasses pouring out their complaints against this composer who made them caper about as if they were giddy young violins.

Beethoven read the attack. A few years ago there was discovered a file of the "Cecilia" with his comments on his satirists. The comments are in the most violent Billingsgate and cannot be reprinted in any modern newspaper. But if Beethoven could not answer in words he could reply in a higher language,—in tones,—and in his next symphony he threw down the gauntlet to his adversaries by writing another very intricate and rapid set of contrabass passages.

What was once deemed impossible has become a matter of daily routine with the hard-worked modern orchestral musician. Ordinarily our contrabasses could have played the passage in a clear and fluent manner, but Mr. Fiedler whipped up the speed of the finale to a pace that was hardly possible for the violins and was quite impossible for the contrabasses. No repeats were cut in this great work, and the syncopations of the third movement were excellently caught up. There was, perhaps, a trifle too much of contrast, "pp" became "ppp," and "ff," "fff," and there was also some freedom in changes of tempo, but it was good Beethoven reading all the same, and the audience recognized the fact and recalled the conductor twice with spontaneous enthusiasm.

The fact that the works of Beethoven, Schumann, and other recognized masters, awaken such remarkable applause may possibly be taken as a significant straw. It is the protest of the public against the tortures of most of the modern school. No one hisses in Boston, no matter how much he dislikes a work. Therefore the auditor can only make his sentiments known by roundly applauding what he does like, and this may account for the extreme amount of applause which the old works are getting in these days.

The present reviewer was debarred, by professional engagements, from hearing the wonderful performance of the Chicago orchestra, on Tuesday night. But he is quite sure, whatever the excellences of the Western organization may be, that they have no strings like those of our own orchestra, no oboes like our excellent pair, no harpist as good as ours, and no such artist upon the kettle-drums. Among the strings we have a violoncellist who is incomparable in classical work, and this artist was prominent yesterday afternoon, for Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. He played two short numbers, of which the first was of especial interest, for it was Bruch's arrangement of the old Hebrew melody of "Kol Nidrei." This melody stands as a monolith in Jewish music. While almost all the other melodies of the synagogue have been tinged with modernity, and are different in different countries, this tune remains the same in almost every synagogue of the globe. It is sung upon the holiest of Hebrew holy days, the Day of Atonement. Because of its universality, many believe that in this we possess a relic of real Scriptural music. But its definite form and its marked minor progressions seem to forbid such an assumption. It is probably of Moorish origin, or at least tinged with Arabic influence. It probably originated during the residence of the Jews in Spain, when South Spain was dominated by the Moors. It is impossible to prove very ancient origin in any of the tunes of the present Hebrew ritual.

This is a very expressive theme, and its emotional power lost nothing in the hands of Mr. Schroeder, who played it with beautiful expression and sympathy. His breadth upon the C string was glorious. The Boellmann selection was in strong contrast, with rapid bowing, high positions, skipping bow, and other technical points of display. Yet it had charming melody also, and deservedly won a success. Mr. Schroeder was enthusiastically recalled over and over again. Not since the days of the great Fritz Giese have we had such a well-equipped cellist in Boston. Mr. Schroeder seems in the very zenith of his powers.

When the present reviewer heard Strauss' "Feuersnot" in London, a little over a year ago, he found it to be a more melodic work than all that composer's more recent operas, and the love-scene is one of its most graphic numbers. Yesterday this excerpt from the little known work came almost as a surprise to those who know of Strauss only as a seeker after cacophonic originality. But if one sees the scene, with its dark desolation, and then beholds the return of the fire, the contrast of darkness and light seems most graphically reflected in the music. But all this picture of Beltane (the magic fire) is of the modern neurotic school in spite of some points of beauty. The earlier Richard also wrote a Fire-scene, and if any one compares the two he will readily perceive that we have not yet obtained a second Wagner. But we can grow enthusiastic over the reading and the performance. We hold Mr. Fiedler to be the equal of any conductor in the world in his readings of the works of Richard Strauss.

We believe "Till Eulenspiegel" to be one of the most legitimate and successful exhibitions of humor in orchestral music, and we also hold Mr. Fiedler to be one of the best interpreters of it. The wild pranks of the inveterate scamp, his capture, his terror, the denunciatory accusations, his sentence, his execution and his last pathetic squeaks, were all given with an unctuous force that was graphic in the extreme. If one can understand the Rabelaisian humor here displayed the work becomes a masterpiece, if not, it must seem a very dull series of orchestral "coups." It was given with all the verve and spirit that the grotesque theme demanded, and was one of the triumphs of our director and his great orchestra. But it is a pity that modern music demands so much of study from its auditors and is, therefore, Caviare to the general. Will not some modern composer bring back melody into music?

POST,

DECEMBER 16, 1911

SCHROEDER AS SOLOIST

Symphony Displays Virtuosity of Players

BY OLIN DOWNES

Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was soloist with that organization at the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and the programme was as follows: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Kol Nidri," adagio for violoncello and orchestra, Bruch, and Boellman's Symphonic Variations for solo violoncello and orchestra; the love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," and the tone poem or orchestral rondo in mordant and modern style, Richard Strauss.

In both the symphony of Beethoven and the composition of Strauss the orchestra played with even more than its customary finish and brilliancy. In the Beethoven symphony Mr. Fiedler was especially successful because his interpretation was wholly objective, and very fortunately in the spirit of the composer. The orchestral performance was in its way a tour de force. It is easy to say that this symphony is played by all orchestras, and so frequently in Boston that a number of the Symphony players could perform it from memory. It is nevertheless no small thing to present this music with such spirit, clarity and beauty of tone. How the thing sounded! Such a quality of orchestral tone is not only the result of long and rigorous training, but of individual virtuosity on the part of each member of the band, and so it was with justice that Mr. Fiedler finally made his men rise and acknowledge the applause with him. Not always has there been so much enthusiasm in Symphony Hall after a Beethoven symphony.

Mr. Schroeder played with his wonted breadth and sonority of tone and ripe musicianship. He played music which has long since become popular with concert audiences, and his performance fulfilled the expectations of those who had gathered to hear him. But Bruch's piece is rather dull. Mr. Schroeder was recalled several times after his performances.

Strauss' incomparable piece, a most extraordinary blend of the spirit of folk-legend and ultra-modern philosophy of simple folk melody and the most advanced treatment of this thematic material, a conception the wonder of which is only equalled by the prodigious workmanship, made its inevitable effect upon the audience. So did the love scene from "Feuersnot." This is not such potent music as the concert piece, and yet it is superbly emotional and dramatic. The themes are not so distinguished as other themes that Strauss penned later in his career, but the love music has a splendid sweep and power, the other themes are most effectively contrasted, and the climax is dramatic in the highest degree. These pieces put the orchestra through its paces and the men responded admirably.

There will be no soloist at the concerts of next week, and the programme will consist of Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," with Wagner's ending; Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H. 13); Debussy's "Iberia"; the "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," the "Dance of the Sylphs," and the "Rokoczy March" from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

[97]

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:

DECEMBER 12, 1911.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Cosmopolitan Program at Court Square Theater — Beautiful Violin Playing by Kathleen Parlow.

The Boston symphony orchestra, which has taught the Springfield public most of what it knows of orchestral music, gave its 20th concert in this city last evening to a large and delighted audience. The soloist was one of the most accomplished and charming of the violinists of our day, the young Canadian, Kathleen Parlow, and Max Fiedler conducted very likely for the last time in Springfield. The close of his engagement is regretted by many, for he has from the beginning been a special favorite here. He showed last evening all the qualities that have gone to the making of his popularity, energy, freshness, whole-heartedness, with none of the excesses in which he occasionally used to indulge; no one can live for a term of years in Boston without showing the effects of the local atmosphere. On the whole, he has gained by the experience, and on the whole it is well for him that he is to leave. An occasional change of environment is an excellent thing.

The program last evening was exceptionally interesting, and remarkably cosmopolitan. There were five works, each representing a different race or nationality. Purely German is Carl Maria von Weber, whose favorite overture to "Der Freischnetz" opened the program. As purely Russian is Tschaikowsky, whose "Pathetic" symphony concluded the first part of the concert. A German Jew is the venerable Max Bruch, whose Scottish fantasia for violin and orchestra was played by Miss Parlow. Then came the ultra-modern Frenchman, Claude Debussy, with "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the program closed with the patriotic symphonic poem "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. Such an exposition is the best possible illustration of the universality of music; there are frontier lines, conspicuous national and racial differences, but they matter little in comparison with the barriers of language, customs and ideals which interfere with the full assimilation of foreign literature. In some ways music, as an art, gains by this international character; in other respects it probably loses—no art can endure such constant and divergent stimulus from outside without suffering. In two centuries, a mere infancy for the other arts, music has lived from childhood to what sometimes seems perilously like old age; no such precocious development can be found in the esthetic history of the past.

There is youth and charm in Weber, who stands at the dividing line between classical tradition and the romantic revolt, showing something of the character of both. A rare and exquisite genius, Weber, who just missed being one of the great. A slightly different fortune, some better texts, a greater gift for integration, and he might have been the foremost opera composer of the 19th century. As it is even the fragments of his works charm like a bit of Shelley or Keats. In melody and in orchestral color he is one of the original forces; what Wagner and Mendelssohn owed to him is enormous. And hackneyed as it is the "Freischuetz" overture is as fresh to-day as ever. It is like turning to another historical epoch to hear Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, surely one of the greatest works of modern times, and equally one of the most disheartening; in art pessimism is a confession of failure. Most great art is tragic, but the greatest art does not droop to helpless collapse. This is a symphony for the lonesome latter years; it expresses a morbid mood familiar enough to the Slav, and wonderfully depicted in the novels of Tourgueniev, but fortunately exceptional in most other peoples.

Another turn was given to the kaleidoscope in the Debussy number, and one might have been transported not merely to a different age, but to another planet. If Tschaikowsky was a neurasthenic Titan, Claude Debussy is a graceful and original minor poet, bent on experimenting with curious novelties. Nothing could be more exquisite or more tenuous than this delicate neo-Hellenic picture of sylvan scenes —not gray, as some have called it, but shot through with beautiful nuances of color. It is ravishing to the ear, and how remarkably little it has to say! It is nearly perfect art, and somehow it seems to matter remarkably little. Great art must find its springs deeper in the soul. If the art of Sibelius is less, one at least feels that a man of force and fire is speaking in the stirring patriotic tone-poem "Finlandia," with which the program closed. It is not difficult to see why it should be objectionable to the despotism which is slowly strangling this fine little nation of the North, and may by degrees reduce it to the unspeakable sadness and pessimism in which Russia speaks through the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky. But Sibelius, at any rate, still lives; his work is full of life and of beauty—like Grieg, he is even capable of inventing national airs for his people.

Miss Kathleen Parlow quickly showed herself, as she did at the musical festival last May, for an artist of fine and rare quality. If the impression she made last night was somewhat less, it was simply because the familiar Bruch fantasia on Scottish airs, opus 46, is not a work of genius like the Tschaikowsky concerto which she played at the festival. It is a workmanlike and effective violin piece, well written for the instrument, and making good use of some favorite airs, but when all is said it is but secondary music, fit for many kinds of concerts but shows at a disadvantage when put in a program like this, a picked representation like the "Salon Carre" at the Louvre. Bruch must not be disparaged; he has done much good work, and in one violin concerto he has surpassed himself and achieved a masterpiece. But this fantasia cannot be called a work of genius, while Kathleen Parlow is an artist who merits no less. She herself has something very like genius, which shows in her playing even of a relatively inferior work. Her technic is admirable, but for a young player to have technic is not remarkable —youth is the time for exploits of virtuosity. But it is remarkable indeed for so youthful a player to have such absolute artistic mastery, such complete self-

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 16, 1911

BEETHOVEN AROUSES AUDIENCE WHICH IS COLD TO STRAUSS

Fourth Symphony of Former Applauded to the Echo, but Latter's Work Does Not Appeal at Rehearsal

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, presented its ninth program of the season at Symphony hall Friday afternoon with the chief man from the first desk of 'cellos playing two solo numbers. The performance, so far as the modern parts of it were concerned, was in the director's best manner and in its closing moments touched the very top notch of tone eloquence. The rehearsal audience applauded with might and main an interpretation of Beethoven's fourth symphony which a dozen other orchestras could match, recalling Mr. Fiedler until he motioned his men to stand. The same audience less than an hour later went coldly away from some Strauss playing which very likely no other orchestra in the world could equal.

The works rehearsed were the following: Beethoven, Symphony in B flat major, No. 4, op. 60; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," Adagio for violoncello with orchestra and harp, op. 47; Boellmann, symphonic variations for violoncello and orchestra (or pianoforte) op. 23; Strauss, love scene from the opera "Feuersnot;" Strauss, "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," op. 28. Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

Two Beethoven and two Strauss styles of interpretation have been exhibited in Symphony hall the present week. The Theodore Thomas orchestra has played an overture by the classic composer and a tone poem by the modern score builder; and the Boston orchestra has presented a symphony from the old repertory and a brace of pieces from the new. Mathematically we should not figure out two styles to each orchestra, making four in all; one style to each, and two altogether, is a truer calculation. And a comparison of the two styles result in the deduction that the orchestra which handles Beethoven with the greater sureness misses it with Strauss, while the one that falls not into the swing of musical Vienna of a century ago steps into the musical march of things in present-day Berlin with easy stride. The truth is that an orchestra which has grown up to the scoring of Strauss has outgrown that of Beethoven. The Chicago orchestra, if it plays all its Beethoven as it played the "Coriolanus" overture Tuesday night, has an indubitable mastery of classicism. Its very mastery over that epoch of composition stands in the way of its interpreting Richard Strauss. For the moment it strikes into "Don Juan," its classic technique asserts itself and modern tone poem becomes as formal as sonata-stamped overture. On the other side of the question, the extreme specialization of the Boston orchestra in Strauss reading unfits it for Beethoven. The fourth symphony will not endure the patronizing of experts in big sound. And this proposition can be shown to hold good, in spite of the fact that before Mr. Fiedler's time the Boston orchestra could give meritorious readings of both Beethoven and Strauss at the same concert. For the orchestra has developed into a nobler instrument of modern symphonic expression than it was under the guidance of the brilliant Dr. Muck. It has actually made of Richard Strauss a new voice, after it was supposed that this message had been fully and authoritatively delivered.

The fourth symphony as a document describing the composer halting between the restraining grip of the past and the rough tug of the future was sympathetically enough read by the Boston men. A historic picture of significant drawing and color the rehearsal audience relaxed its hands in applause upon just prior to the intermission. And Beethoven under description is an interesting Beethoven, [illegible] even if Beethoven under interpretation [illegible] more so. Structural emphasis

[illegible] rather more plangent than it usually is in the Fiedler elocution. The conservatory professor can speak out on occasion. Yes, for once the Symphony conductor did not bother with any atmospheric softening of the angles of the old architecture but allowed subjects, development and recapitulation to stand academically out in the light. And here perhaps he thought he was conceding a great point

But interpretation is not conceded; it is achieved. That was a prettily delivered page at the conclusion of the slow movement. A delicately held baton, and no other kind, could make flute, horn, violin and drum speak their successive farewells as they did there. And truly Mr. Fiedler was in his best high comedy vein in the scherzo. He was, indeed, a vivacious professor all the way through; and naturally enough his listeners regretted the drop of his baton at the finale, when he became emeritus.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 16, 1911.

SYMPHONY'S 9TH REHEARSAL

Program of Familiar Pieces Greatly Enjoyed by the Audience.

TWO PIECES BY STRAUSS

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" Closing Item on the Program.

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Schroeder was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, B-flat major..Beethoven
"Kol Nidrei".....Bruch
For 'cello with orchestra and harp.
Symphonic variations for 'cello and orchestra.....Boellmann
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....Strauss
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".Strauss

While this concert evidently gave the audience great pleasure, it was one that does not call for extended comment. The fourth symphony might lead one to inquire into the identity of Beethoven's "unknown beloved," for the music has long been associated with the remembrance of her. Bruch's melancholy piece for 'cello might easily provoke a discussion over the origin of the majestically mournful melody "Kol Nidrei." The variations by Boellmann might be an excuse for an attack on the introduction of any composition for 'cello in a symphony concert, no matter how skilful the 'cellist might be. For the literature of this instrument used solo in a dignified concert is slight. There is Saint-Saens's first concerto, a charming work; there is Loeffler's fantastical composition which has not been heard of late years, and then——? 'Cellists enjoy playing these variations, which "play easily," to use a professional slang phrase, and are put together with considerable skill. The fact remains that a little of the 'cello as a solo instrument goes a long way. Mr. Schroeder's tone in Bruch's piece was rich, and he played with the appropriate breadth of style. He was warmly applauded.

There have been better performances of the music from Strauss's opera at these concerts. Yesterday there was a technical slip that ruined an otherwise charming effect. Nor was the pervading spirit of the performance so irresistible as on former occasions.

How many can relate the various adventures of the rascal Till, a lover of coarse jokes and malicious tricks? How many knowing them can recognize them in Strauss's musical version? It matters little; the music, as absolute music, is entertaining from beginning to the end, from the strains that might be taken as saying: "Once on a time, long ago, there was a queer fellow and his name was Till Eulenspiegel" to those that are as the concluding words of the narrator: "And now I have told you the story of Till." There are some of us who think that the most artistic and musical of Strauss's tone poems are this Rondo, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan," although there are higher and nobler flights of imagination in "Don Quixote."

The performance of the symphony was thoughtfully considered and finely expressed. The work itself is not among the greatest of Beethoven's, but there are a few pages which only he could have written.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, symphony in G (B. & H. No. 13); Debussy, "Iberia"; Berlioz, Minuet of Will o' Wisps, Dance of Sylphs, and Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust." There will be no soloist. The soloists of the concerts Dec. 29 and 30 will be Mme. Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House.

DECEMBER 16,

Symphony Concert

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of distinctive holiday nature on the program which will be played at the Christmas concert of the Sym. hony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G-major, No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia." The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the Minuet of the Will of the

SPRINGFIELD UNION:

DECEMBER 12, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra, with Kathleen Parlow, Violinist, Pleases Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Kathleen Parlow, violinist, presented a two-hour program in Court Square theater last night to an audience that filled all but the front rows of the house. The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Pathetic," as the piece de resistance, Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra, with Kathleen Parlow as soloist and three shorter but no less wonderful pieces by Weber, Debussy and Sibelius.

Weber's overture to "Die Freischutz" opened the program, affording a dramatic story in music which, although divorced from the libretto, appealed intensely under the conduction of Max Fielder. The intensely dramatic character of the climactic portions of the overture received a thrilling interpretation and took the house by storm at the first.

The "Pathetic" presented a more difficult task and despite the fact that the piece is in no way program music, nor to be classed as descriptive, its decided epic quality with tragedy of human emotion and torture of soul allowed of a dramatic depiction verging on the operatic. The dominant minor relieved in the second and third movements with major strains and climaxed in the third movement, with he molto vivace, received a most thrilling handling, although in the second movement the horns violated the repression which was characteristic in the rest of the program. The grievous minor in the final with the moaning tragedy represented in a diminuendo of the wind instruments drew a tense climax to the long symphony in a tour de force of sympathetic interpretation. The familiarity of the orchestra with this symphony has in no degree spoiled its distinctive rendition. The mutability of the composition, making it liable to a cool reception under less skilful hands, was counteracted last night by the sheer force of perfect orchestration

The "Fantasia" containing just enough hint of the Scottish airs on which it was developed, gave Kathleen Parlow a vehicle for the expression of her sympathetic playing and provided at the same time a somewhat exhibitory piece for her deft fingering. The unexpected bits of archaic folk melody, the tripping dance in the second movement and the cantabile phases of the composition provided more actual delight than a heavier piece could have done. Miss Parlow was recalled four times and made her modest bow, but responded to no encores.

The most puzzling number, the exotic by Debussy, founded on the impressionistic poem by Mallarme, the French prose poet, called "The Afternoon of a Faun," was received rather coldly and entirely out of proportion to the real value of the piece as rendered. It is really a rare bit of program music, and although marked as impressionistic the sheer orchestration of nature sounds, the flute calls, the bucolic horn motif, and the infinite buzzing noises of a summer day so faithfully depicted by the orchestra were clear and not at all to be set down as freakish. The piece is short, so much is crowded into little, and all calls for such delicate interpretation and such careful interpolation from the various instruments that the work of the orchestra deserved better appreciation than it received. Its revolutionary character may account for the lack of penetration.

In "Finland," frankly a "tone poem" of a national character, there was given a stirring number, and one which is likely to gain more than its present popularity, which is great. The descriptive is strong in this piece and the orchestra gained applause equal to that received earlier in the program. The originality of the piece was siezed on enthusiastically by the orchestra and the eloquence of the climax given by such an orchestra made a finale to the program which was both popularly and technically grandiloquent.

The perfection of Max Fielder's conducting has not declined with the years and the facility with which he swayed the musicians under him is such as to win admiration from the least and the most critical. At times he handles the orchestra as a huge organ, and there were many places where the effect was literally such in lastn ight's performance.

AMERICAN-

DECEMBER 17, 1911.

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Selections of Lighter Character for Coming Concerts.

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of a distinctive holiday nature on the program which will be played at the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia."

The performance of this brilliant work was one of the pronounced successes of last season, and many requests have been made for a repetition of it. The [illegible] number will consist of three [illegible] from Berlioz's "Damnation [illegible] the Minuet of the Will o' [illegible] the Dance of the Sylphs [illegible] Hungarian March. There will [illegible] soloist.

[99]

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:

DECEMBER 12, 1911.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Cosmopolitan Program at Court Square Theater — Beautiful Violin Playing by Kathleen Parlow.

The Boston symphony orchestra, which has taught the Springfield public most of what it knows of orchestral music, gave its 20th concert in this city last evening to a large and delighted audience. The soloist was one of the most accomplished and charming of the violinists of our day, the young Canadian, Kathleen Parlow, and Max Fiedler conducted very likely for the last time in Springfield. The close of his engagement is regretted by many, for he has from the beginning been a special favorite here. He showed last evening all the qualities that have gone to the making of his popularity, energy, freshness, whole-heartedness, with none of the excesses in which he occasionally used to indulge; no one can live for a term of years in Boston without showing the effects of the local atmosphere. On the whole, he has gained by the experience, and on the whole it is well for him that he is to leave. An occasional change of environment is an excellent thing.

The program last evening was exceptionally interesting, and remarkably cosmopolitan. There were five works, each representing a different race or nationality. Purely German is Carl Maria von Weber, whose favorite overture to "Der Freischnetz" opened the program. As purely Russian is Tschaikowsky, whose "Pathetic" symphony concluded the first part of the concert. A German Jew is the venerable Max Bruch, whose Scottish fantasia for violin and orchestra was played by Miss Parlow. Then came the ultra-modern Frenchman, Claude Debussy, with "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the program closed with the patriotic symphonic poem "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. Such an exposition is the best possible illustration of the universality of music; there are frontier lines, conspicuous national and racial differences, but they matter little in comparison with the barriers of language, customs and ideals which interfere with the full assimilation of foreign literature. In some ways music, as an art, gains by this international character; in other respects it probably loses—no art can endure such constant and divergent stimulus from outside without suffering. In two centuries, a mere infancy for the other arts, music has lived from childhood to what sometimes seems perilously like old age; no such precocious development can be found in the esthetic history of the past.

There is youth and charm in Weber, who stands at the dividing line between classical tradition and the romantic revolt, showing something of the character of both. A rare and exquisite genius, Weber, who just missed being one of the great. A slightly different fortune, some better texts, a greater gift for integration, and he might have been the foremost opera composer of the 19th century. As it is even the fragments of his works charm like a bit of Shelley or Keats. In melody and in orchestral color he is one of the original forces; what Wagner and Mendelssohn owed to him is enormous. And hackneyed as it is the "Freischuetz" overture is as fresh to-day as ever. It is like turning to another historical epoch to hear Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, surely one of the greatest works of modern times, and equally one of the most disheartening; in art pessimism is a confession of failure. Most great art is tragic, but the greatest art does not droop to helpless collapse. This is a symphony for the lonesome latter years; it expresses a morbid mood familiar enough to the Slav, and wonderfully depicted in the novels of Tourgueniev, but fortunately exceptional in most other peoples.

Another turn was given to the kaleidoscope in the Debussy number, and one might have been transported not merely to a different age, but to another planet. If Tschaikowsky was a neurasthenic Titan, Claude Debussy is a graceful and original minor poet, bent on experimenting with curious novelties. Nothing could be more exquisite or more tenuous than this delicate neo-Hellenic picture of sylvan scenes —not gray, as some have called it, but shot through with beautiful nuances of color. It is ravishing to the ear, and how remarkably little it has to say! It is nearly perfect art, and somehow it seems to matter remarkably little. Great art must find its springs deeper in the soul. If the art of Sibelius is less, one at least feels that a man of force and fire is speaking in the stirring patriotic tone-poem "Finlandia," with which the program closed. It is not difficult to see why it should be objectionable to the despotism which is slowly strangling this fine little nation of the North, and may by degrees reduce it to the unspeakable sadness and pessimism in which Russia speaks through the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky. But Sibelius, at any rate, still lives; his work is full of life and of beauty—like Grieg, he is even capable of inventing national airs for his people.

Miss Kathleen Parlow quickly showed herself, as she did at the musical festival last May, for an artist of fine and rare quality. If the impression she made last night was somewhat less, it was simply because the familiar Bruch fantasia on Scottish airs, opus 46, is not a work of genius like the Tschaikowsky concerto which she played at the festival. It is a workmanlike and effective violin piece, well written for the instrument, and making good use of some favorite airs, but when all is said it is but secondary music, fit for many kinds of concerts but shows at a disadvantage when put in a program like this, a picked representation like the "Salon Carre" at the Louvre. Bruch must not be disparaged; he has done much good work, and in one violin concerto he has surpassed himself and achieved a masterpiece. But this fantasia cannot be called a work of genius, while Kathleen Parlow is an artist who merits no less. She herself has something very like genius, which shows in her playing even of a relatively inferior work. Her technic is admirable, but for a young player to have technic is not remarkable —youth is the time for exploits of virtuosity. But it is remarkable indeed for so youthful a player to have such absolute artistic mastery, such complete self-

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 16, 1911

BEETHOVEN AROUSES AUDIENCE WHICH IS COLD TO STRAUSS

Fourth Symphony of Former Applauded to the Echo, but Latter's Work Does Not so Appeal at Rehearsal

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, presented its ninth program of the season at Symphony hall Friday afternoon with the chief man from the first desk of 'cellos playing two solo numbers. The performance, so far as the modern parts of it were concerned, was in the director's best manner and in its closing moments touched the very top notch of tone eloquence. The rehearsal audience applauded with might and main an interpretation of Beethoven's fourth symphony which a dozen other orchestras could match, recalling Mr. Fiedler until he motioned his men to stand. The same audience less than an hour later went coldly away from some Strauss playing which very likely no other orchestra in the world could equal.

The works rehearsed were the following: Beethoven, Symphony in B flat major, No. 4, op. 60; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," Adagio for violoncello with orchestra and harp, op. 47; Boellmann, symphonic variations for violoncello and orchestra (or pianoforte) op. 23; Strauss, love scene from the opera "Feuersnot;" Strauss, "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," op. 28. Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

Two Beethoven and two Strauss styles of interpretation have been exhibited in Symphony hall the present week. The Theodore Thomas orchestra has played an overture by the classic composer and a tone poem by the modern score builder; and the Boston orchestra has presented a symphony from the old repertory and a brace of pieces from the new. Mathematically we should not figure out two styles to each orchestra, making four in all; one style to each, and two altogether, is a truer calculation. And a comparison of the two styles result in the deduction that the orchestra which handles Beethoven with the greater sureness misses it with Strauss, while the one that falls not into the swing of musical Vienna of a century ago steps into the musical march of things in present-day Berlin with easy stride. The truth is that an orchestra which has grown up to the scoring of Strauss has outgrown that of Beethoven. The Chicago orchestra, if it plays all its Beethoven as it played the "Coriolanus" overture Tuesday night, has an indubitable mastery of classicism. Its very mastery over that epoch of composition stands in the way of its interpreting Richard Strauss. For, the moment it strikes into "Don Juan," its classic technique asserts itself and modern tone poem becomes as formal as sonata-stamped overture. On the other side of the question, the extreme specialization of the Boston orchestra in Strauss reading unfits it for Beethoven. The fourth symphony will not endure the patronizing of experts in big sound. And this proposition can be shown to hold good, in spite of the fact that before Mr. Fiedler's time the Boston orchestra could give meritorious readings of both Beethoven and Strauss at the same concert. For the orchestra has developed into a nobler instrument of modern symphonic expression than it was under the guidance of the brilliant Dr. Muck. It has actually made of Richard Strauss a new voice, after it was supposed that this message had been fully and authoritatively delivered.

The fourth symphony as a document describing the composer halting between the restraining grip of the past and the rough tug of the future was sympathetically enough read by the Boston men. A historic picture of significant drawing and color the rehearsal aud[ience] its hands in applause upon the intermission. And Bee[thoven] description is an interesting Beethoven, [e]ven if Beethoven under interpretation [m]ore so. Structural emphasis

[r]ather more plangent than it usually is in the Fiedler elocution. The conservatory professor can speak out on occasion. Yes, for once the Symphony conductor did not bother with any atmospheric softening of the angles of the old architecture but allowed subjects, development and recapitulation to stand academically out in the light. And here perhaps he thought he was conceding a great point

But interpretation is not conceded; it is achieved. That was a prettily delivered page at the conclusion of the slow movement. A delicately held baton, and no other kind, could make flute, horn, violin and drum speak their successive farewells as they did there. And truly Mr. Fiedler was in his best high comedy vein in the scherzo. He was, indeed, a vivacious professor all the way through; and naturally enough his listeners regretted the drop of his baton at the finale, when he became emeritus.

HERALD,

DECEMBER 16, 1911.

SYMPHONY'S 9TH REHEARSAL

Program of Familiar Pieces Greatly Enjoyed by the Audience.

TWO PIECES BY STRAUSS

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" Closing Item on the Program.

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Schroeder was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, B-flat major..Beethoven
"Kol Nidrei".....Bruch
For 'cello with orchestra and harp.
Symphonic variations for 'cello and orchestra.....Boellmann
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....Strauss
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".Strauss

While this concert evidently gave the audience great pleasure, it was one that does not call for extended comment. The fourth symphony might lead one to inquire into the identity of Beethoven's "unknown beloved," for the music has long been associated with the remembrance of her. Bruch's melancholy piece for 'cello might easily provoke a discussion over the origin of the majestically mournful melody "Kol Nidrei." The variations by Boellmann might be an excuse for an attack on the introduction of any composition for 'cello in a symphony concert, no matter how skilful the 'cellist might be. For the literature of this instrument used solo in a dignified concert is slight. There is Saint-Saens's first concerto, a charming work; there is Loeffler's fantastical composition which has not been heard of late years, and then——? 'Cellists enjoy playing these variations, which "play easily," to use a professional slang phrase, and are put together with considerable skill. The fact remains that a little of the 'cello as a solo instrument goes a long way. Mr. Schroeder's tone in Bruch's piece was rich, and he played with the appropriate breadth of style. He was warmly applauded.

There have been better performances of the music from Strauss's opera at these concerts. Yesterday there was a technical slip that ruined an otherwise charming effect. Nor was the pervading spirit of the performance so irresistible as on former occasions.

How many can relate the various adventures of the rascal Till, a lover of coarse jokes and malicious tricks? How many knowing them can recognize them in Strauss's musical version? It matters little; the music, as absolute music, is entertaining from beginning to the end, from the strains that might be taken as saying: "Once on a time, long ago, there was a queer fellow and his name was Till Eulenspiegel" to those that are as the concluding words of the narrator: "And now I have told you the story of Till." There are some of us who think that the most artistic and musical of Strauss's tone poems are this Rondo, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan," although there are higher and nobler flights of imagination in "Don Quixote."

The performance of the symphony was thoughtfully considered and finely expressed. The work itself is not among the greatest of Beethoven's, but there are a few pages which only he could have written.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, symphony in G (B. & H. No. 13); Debussy, "Iberia"; Berlioz, Minuet of Will o' Wisps, Dance of Sylphs, and Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust." There will be no soloist. The soloists of the concerts Dec. 29 and 30 will be Mme. Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House.

JOURNAL— DECEMBER 16,

Symphony Concert

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of distinctive holiday nature on the program which will be played at the Christmas concert of the Sym. hony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G-major, No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia." The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the Minuet of the Will of the

SPRINGFIELD UNION:

DECEMBER 12, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra, with Kathleen Parlow, Violinist, Pleases Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor and Kathleen Parlow, violinist, presented a two-hour program in Court Square theater last night to an audience that filled all but the front rows of the house. The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Pathetic," as the piece de resistance, Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra, with Kathleen Parlow as soloist and three shorter but no less wonderful pieces by Weber, Debussy and Sibelius.

Weber's overture to "Die Freischutz" opened the program, affording a dramatic story in music which, although divorced from the libretto, appealed intensely under the conduction of Max Fielder. The intensely dramatic character of the climactic portions of the overture received a thrilling interpretation and took the house by storm at the first.

The "Pathetic" presented a more difficult task and despite the fact that the piece is in no way program music, nor to be classed as descriptive, its decided epic quality with tragedy of human emotion and torture of soul allowed of a dramatic depiction verging on the operatic. The dominant minor relieved in the second and third movements with major strains and climaxed in the third movement, with he molto vivace, received a most thrilling handling, although in the second movement the horns violated the repression which was characteristic in the rest of the program. The grievous minor in the final with the moaning tragedy represented in a diminuendo of the wind instruments drew a tense climax to the long symphony in a tour de force of sympathetic interpretation. The familiarity of the orchestra with this symphony has in no degree spoiled its distinctive rendition. The mutability of the composition, making it liable to a cool reception under less skilful hands, was counteracted last night by the sheer force of perfect orchestration

The "Fantasia" containing just enough hint of the Scottish airs on which it was developed, gave Kathleen Parlow a vehicle for the expression of her sympathetic playing and provided at the same time a somewhat exhibitory piece for her deft fingering. The unexpected bits of archaic folk melody, the tripping dance in the second movement and the cantabile phases of the composition provided more actual delight than a heavier piece could have done. Miss Parlow was recalled four times and made her modest bow, but responded to no encores.

The most puzzling number, the exotic by Debussy, founded on the impressionistic poem by Mallarme, the French prose poet, called "The Afternoon of a Faun," was received rather coldly and entirely out of proportion to the real value of the piece as rendered. It is really a rare bit of program music, and although marked as impressionistic the sheer orchestration of nature sounds, the flute calls, the bucolic horn motif, and the infinite buzzing noises of a summer day so faithfully depicted by the orchestra were clear and not at all to be set down as freakish. The piece is short, so much is crowded into little, and all calls for such delicate interpretation and such careful interpolation from the various instruments that the work of the orchestra deserved better appreciation than it received. Its revolutionary character may account for the lack of penetration.

In "Finland," frankly a "tone poem" of a national character, there was given a stirring number, and one which is likely to gain more than its present popularity, which is great. The descriptive is strong in this piece and the orchestra gained applause equal to that received earlier in the program. The originality of the piece was siezed on enthusiastically by the orchestra and the eloquence of the climax given by such an orchestra made a finale to the program which was both popularly and technically grandiloquent.

The perfection of Max Fielder's conducting has not declined with the years and the facility with which he swayed the musicians under him is such as to win admiration from the least and the most critical. At times he handles the orchestra as a huge organ, and there were many places where the effect was literally such in lastn ight's performance.

AMERICAN-

DECEMBER 17, 1911.

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Selections of Lighter Character for Coming Concerts.

Mr. Fiedler has placed nothing of a distinctive holiday nature on the program which will be played at the Christmas concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, but the selections are of lighter character than is sometimes the case. The first number will be Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis." This will be followed by Haydn's Symphony in G major No. 13. After the intermission will come Debussy's "Iberia."

The performance of this brilliant work was one of the pronounced successes of last season, and many requests have been made for a repetition of it. The final number will consist of three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the Minuet of the Will o' Wisps, the Dance of the Sylphs and the Hungarian March. There will be no soloist.

[99]

GLOBE

DECEMBER 16. 1911.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Orchestra Plays Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" Brilliantly—Schroeder is Soloist in Double Number.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No 4 in B flat major; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei" adagio for violoncello with orchestra and harp, op 47, and Boellmann, symphonic variations for solo violoncello and orchestra, op 23, Mr Schroeder, soloist; Strauss, love scene from the opera "Feuersnot" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The performance of the "Till Eulenspiegel" was a brilliant, not to say vigorous one. There was virtuosity, vivid characterization and a lively sense of humor in the presentation, which brought an overlong program to a vivacious conclusion.

There is comparatively little in the later operas of Strauss that can be effectively transferred to the concert room, although the dance of Salome is also played, but the excerpt from "Feuersnot" was of interest. The music of the love passages of Kunrad and Diemut has a quiet ecstasy which flames into passion as the fire is restored to the villagers without. It is a climax of furious intensity and was given with due power yesterday.

Mr Schroeder was warmly applauded for his playing. He is a 'cellist of excellent technic, of a pure tone and style, but neither of the two pieces has much to interest player or hearer. The first is monotonous and laden with melancholy, and the last is composed of futile elaboration upon a melody without lyric charm or depth of feeling.

Mr Fiedler's tempo in the finale of the symphony made it precipitate rather than fleet, but the scherzo had charm and the adagio was sung with breadth and dignity of style. Here is a theme which shows the possibilities of a purely diatonic succession of descending tones. Mr Grisez and his clarinet gave a beautiful distinction to it yesterday. The symphony was followed by sustained applause.

The program next week will be as follows: Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Rulis" (Wagner's revision); Haydn, symphony in G major; Debussy, "Iberia," second number in "Images"; Berlioz, three numbers from "Damnation of Faust."

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 23 1911

HOFMANN TO PLAY HERE AT CONCERT IN JANUARY

Will Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HIS TOUR TO BE LIMITED

Philharmonic Society Will Present Weingartner's Latest Symphony —Holiday Music Events Are Few in Number.

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will make his only apeparance in Brooklyn this year at the third Boston Symphony Concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Jan. 12. Mr. Hofmann comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aside from his appearances with the orchestra, he will give one pianoforte recital in Manhattan and one in Boston. After filling these engagements early in January, he will spend the rest of the winter at his country home in Aiken, S. C.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Josef Hofmann, the eminent pianist, will make his only appearance in Brooklyn this year at the third Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 12. Mr. Hofmann comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aside from his appearances with the orchestra he will give one pianoforte recital in Manhattan and one in Boston. After filling these engagements early in January, he will spend the rest of the winter at his country home in Aiken, S. C.

GLOBE DECEMBER 27, 1911

MME MORENA WILL SING.

Metropolitan Soprano to Appear as Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at this week's Symphony concerts will be Berta Morena, one of the most distinguished Wagnerian singers of our time. Three years ago Mme Morena was soloist with the orchestra here in Boston, and her singing is remembered with much pleasure by those who heard her.

BERTA MORENA.

A member of the Court Opera of Munich, she succeeded to the principal dramatic roles after Ternina had retired. Her coming to Boston has enabled Mr Fiedler to place on his program a Wagner excerpt which has been absent too long, the great closing scene from "Goetterdaemmerung," commonly known as "Bruennhilde's Immolation." This was last sung at a Symphony concert by Mme Gadski in 1904. Mme Morena will also sing the "Abscheulicher" aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 28, 1911

Metropolitan Soprano Is Soloist at Symphony Concerts of This Week

(Photo by Jones, Keyser & Arras, N. Y.)
MME. BERTA MORENA

Mr. Fiedler announces a change in the Symphony program for this week. He will perform the newly discovered symphony by Beethoven as he originally intended. This will be the first performance of the work in America. The manuscript of the symphony was discovered in the university library in Jena early this year, hence it called the "Jena symphony." It is a youthful work, preceding the first symphony by some years. It is said to be much in the manner, as might be expected, of Haydn. The program as revised is as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, the "Jena" symphony; Beethoven, Aria "Abscheulicher" from "Fidelio;" Enesco, suite, Op. 9; Wagner, closing scene from "Goetterdaemmerung," with Mme. Berta Morena as soloist.

POST, DECEMBER 27, 1911

Berta Morena to Sing With Symphony

First Performance in America of Newly Discovered Beethoven Symphony

BERTA MORENA, DRAMATIC SOPRANO OF THE COURT OPERA AT MUNICH, WHO WILL BE SOLOIST AT THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One of the most interesting personalities in opera today is Berta Morena, who is to be the soloist at this week's symphony concerts. She is the principal dramatic soprano of the Court Opera in Munich, where she succeeded to the place held by Milka Ternina, and she is one of the principal sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House. She has appeared here several times in opera with the Metropolitan company and three years ago was soloist with the Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] these concerts the newly discovered symphony by Beethoven will be given the first performance in America. The score and parts [illegible] received unexpectedly by Mr. [illegible] from the "Jena Symphony."

Miss Morena was discovered, as the saying goes, by Franz Lenbach, the greatest of German portrait painters. As a young girl posing for him as a model, he found that she had a voice and he provided for her musical education. She first became famous by his proclaiming her the most beautiful woman in Europe, but this fame soon took secondary place to the reputation she made in opera.

Her coming here has enabled Mr. Fiedler to place on the programme for the first time in over six years the closing scene in "Bruennhilde's Immolation," from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung." This is the culminating point of the stupendous tragedy of "The Ring of the Nibelungs" and is one of the few excerpts from the trilogy which do not seem to suffer by being taken to the concert stage.

New Beethoven Symphony

Mr. Fiedler announces that through the unexpected arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe he will be able to perform at this week's Symphony concert the newly discovered symphony by Beethoven as he had originally intended to do. This will be the first performance of the work in America. The manuscript of the symphony was discovered in the university [illegible] a youthful work, preceding the first symphony by some years. It is, as might be expected, very Haydnish in spirit, yet there are many traits of the great composer to be found in it. The Bach suite will not be played and the programme as revised runs as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven, the "Jena" symphony; Beethoven, aria "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio"; Enesco, suite, op. 9, and Wagner, closing scene from "Goetterdaemmerung," with Mme. Berta Morena as soloist.

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. DEC 23 1911

Date

Josef Hofmann, the eminent pianist, will make his only appearance in Brooklyn this year at the third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 12. Mr. Hofmann comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aside from his appearances with the orchestra he will give one pianoforte recital in New York and one in Boston. After filling these engagements early in January he will spend the rest of the winter at his country home in Aiken, South Carolina.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date

The third pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall January 11 and 13, when the soloists will be Josef Hofmann, who comes to America for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston orchestra. It is likely that Mr. Hofmann will play his own fourth concerto at one of these concerts.

Harold Bauer will give a second recital in Carnegie hall Wednesday afternoon, January 17, when he will play compositions of Brahms, Mozart, Cesar Franck, Schumann and Chopin.

[99]

TRANSCRIPT, DECEMBER 23, 1911.

Th. SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. FIEDLER MAKES AN AGREEABLE MISCELLANY

Bach for Christmas Music—Haydn for Annual Tribute and Orchestral Virtuosity—Gluck for Music That Endures—Berlioz for Music That Fades and Debussy's "Iberia" for Musical Intoxication—A Gladsome Afternoon

MR. Fiedler proffered his audience at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon an agreeable miscellany. He paid respect to the time and what is presumed to be the mood of the audience with the Pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," though as a matter of musical fact this contrapuntal exercise might be labelled anything else and still keep what pleasant reedy and scholarly interest it has. Tradition has hallowed it; and it suits its plaintive measures to one mood of Christmas that some say the festival needs nowadays. Continuing chronologically, since even a miscellaneous programme can be "unified" with due effort, the conductor played the grave and melancholy overture that Gluck prefixed to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis." Still in the eighteenth century, Mr. Fiedler passed to a symphony by Haydn, raced the orchestra nearly off its feet in the two allegros, while his audience heard gladly and gayly. Next, with a leap to these immediate musical times, he made it listen to the heady intoxications of Debussy's "Iberia," and then ended, in display of orchestral virtuosity, with the music of the "Will-o'-the-Wisps," the Sylphs and the marching Hungarians of "The Damnation of Faust." The listeners may have departed with variegated, even confused impressions; but most of them, as the young girls say, had had "a good time" and effortless pleasure—though the Debussyites would call such a view of "Iberia" superficial—is not the commonest thing at the Symphony Concerts.

Anyhow, there was orchestral virtuosity and to spare and the band was almost as much "on view" as the gentlemen from Chicago were last week. Of course, it achieved almost to breathless sound, the testing diminuendo of the "Dance of the Sylphs," made lightly yet exactly accented play with rhythm and phrase in the minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps; and duly swelled the slithering climaxes of the Rakoczy March. Of course, too, it accomplished all sorts of feats with Debussy's artful and exacting instrumentation of "Iberia" and much more securely and spontaneously than it did last spring. And Debussy's music seems to the layman below the stage much more exacting than that of the other ultra-modern composers. From Strauss downwards, they make all sorts of technical demands upon the players, especially upon the hapless wind instruments. In the early days of such music, the men often believed that what was set down for them was a copyist's error, and conductors had to encourage them to play the notes that were written. Debussy, however, asks more; he expects his orchestra to be like-minded and like-tempered with him. He demands subtleties of expression, a sensitive finger and lip and ear to minute and esoteric shadings and juxtapositions of tonal colors, he would have every man as suggestive as evasive as he is himself. Even with "Iberia," substantial music as it is beside "The Afternoon of a Faun" or the Nocturne of "The Clouds," he reiterates his insistence upon these qualities, and asks besides the utmost alertness to elastic even fitful rhythms. The Symphony Orchestra gave him all this yesterday, gave it by all outward sign, as though it were a part of the routine of the hour.

Yet, in a sense, the virtuosity of the orchestra, its ability to meet every demand that conductor or composer can lay upon it were clearest in Haydn's little symphony. Of course, the volume of tone was out of all proportion to the real dimensions of the music, but that is the misfortune of the music of the eighteenth century when it is played in the big concert-rooms, by the big orchestras and the ardent conductors of the twentieth. Of course, too, Mr. Fiedler "sped up" the pace of the opening allegro and the final rondo to the utmost. He has made Labor's word a part of the orchestral vocabulary. Time was when Mr. Apthorp used to bewail in this place the "slow" allegros of Mr. Gericke. Would that he could hear Mr. Fiedler's swift ones and reverse the voice of his complaint. The orchestra kept up with the conductor; even the double basses did; as the children say, "they just had to." The wonder was that at such a racing pace they kept the lightness of the music in play, tossed its little springing figures back and forth, just touched its leaping little phrases, spurred on again, and yet never once rode through the fine strands of the tonal web. The finale skipped under the hands of the much-enduring strings, while the wood winds chirruped like excited birds over and through them. At every turn the theme of the rondo returned more gayly. Mr. Winter used to have a pet word, "gleeful." It is the word and with a meaning for the orchestra's playing of the rondo. The gently sighing song of the slow movement and the minuet—is it a little heavy-footed?—were the respites along the way. To play Haydn so, is to make him both gay and gentle, simple and fanciful, the unexcited in all things. Then he and his melodies are alive again.

Gluck and Debussy were the moderns of the afternoon, because these fragments of "The Damnation of Faust," though not all of Berlioz's music, are fading with much else that was romantic fifty and seventy-five years ago. The Rakoczy March is a well-rhythmed and suspensive tumult, but the thrill for the middle-aged anyhow—is gone out of it. The Will-o'-the-Wisps have their tricks of musical manner; and do not the Sylphs dance to a calculated, if beautiful delicacy? Berlioz was always ebullient—except when he wrote music. Then he took thought and could not hide his thinking. But Gluck, whose overture was older by fifty years has really aged less. Of course, his orchestral apparatus seems small and constricted beside our post-Wagnerian orchestras. Music has been enriched with means of harmonic suggestion that he never suspected. The musical times change and composers change with them; but Gluck's music endures the changes. Unless the listener has far too irritable a modern ear, he does not quarrel with Gluck's meagreness of orchestral means and simplicity of harmonic resource. There is no possible occasion for such quarrel because the music perfectly expresses his design. There is the formal web of it, and there also are the mournful gravity, the fateful progress, the pity of fate falling upon melancholy and innocent youth that are the emotions of the tragedy of Iphigenia slain to Diana on the altars of Aulis—and by her father's will. The music is self-contained; yet it expresses the mood and course of the tragedy. Gluck has attained for 1911 as well as for 1774 the fusion that is the end of such musical expression. No wonder his music lasts and kindles.

By this time, since "Iberia" is nearly two years old, the Debussyites must have found many an inner meaning, many a subtle suggestion in it. They will write their articles and hold their esoteric debates about it. Some day, perhaps, we that are mere listeners will follow them into these intricate paths. For the present the outword shows, the glamor of "Iberia" is musical intoxication itself. A penny for the means, orthodox or unothodox, with which Debussy has achieved his ends. A ha'penny whether "Iberia" excels this, that or the other piece that he has previously or subsequently written, whether it is of a matured and mannered or of a still ripening Debussy. The music speaks for itself, and more. It runs into the hearer's blood like a fine and heady wine. Off it springs, and in it are the sounds, the colors, the lights, the air, the glow of the Spain of imagination, not the true Spain of Laparra and the veritists, and not at all the Spain of the more literal suggestion of music. Debussy's is a tonal phantasmagoria, a tonal and delirious dream of Spain, that dances before the eye of the fancy in a hundred colors to a goading rhythm. The melody of the night intervenes; it is song; it is beautiful song; fascinating, exquisite, the soft breath of the perfumed night, heard and felt afar, the musical speech, almost, of heavy stillness, the voice of its soft contentments and vague longings. The bells ring in the distant churches; the harps stirs to the passing of the morning breeze; the strings awaken to the light. Spain is alive again and off to its fete, another fete of rhythmical and instrumental phantasmagoria. Monet made forty pictures of water lillies and twenty of the façade of the Rouen Cathedral that he might catch the differing colors and aspects of them. Debussy has made one "Iberia" by like methods, but in it are all the colors and all the voices of his imagined Spain. H. T. P.

AMERICAN—
DECEMBER 23, 1911.

CHRISTMAS AT THE SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The Christmas program of the Symphony Orchestra was lighter in character than that served up at the ordinary concert. It was a feast of melody interrupted only by a Debussy number, "Iberia."

There was a jolly little Haydn symphony, that in G, No. 13, the pastorale from Bach's Christmas oratorio, and three charming selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The orchestra was in holiday mood and there was an atmosphere of happiness which seriously hampered criticism. Even Debussy sounded more attractive than usual.

"Iberia" is as interesting as a picture puzzle. It is not music, as we understand music to-day, although it may be the prelude of something extraordinary that the future is going to give us. That is just exactly what the composition seems to me, a prelude. We are constantly expecting something fine after the mood has been attained, but all we get is mood.

As description there is nothing about it to make one think of Spain, except a few bars of familiar Spanish rhythms. Aside from these it might be named "New Year's Eve on Broadway" or "Christmas Day in the Insane Asylum," without taxing the imagination.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

Established

The third pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Jan. 11 and 13, respectively. The solo at both of these concerts will be Jo Hofmann, who comes to America this s son for the sole purpose of filling a ser of engagements with the Boston Sy phony Orchestra. It is likely at one these concerts Mr. Hofmann will play own fourth concerto.

ADVERTISER, DECEMBER 23, 1911

CHRISTMAS ORATORIO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

EXEMPLIFIES BACH'S FORMALITY OF KEY

Debussy's "Iberia" an Instance of Work Which Lacks Real Tonal Architecture.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio.
Gluck—"Iphigenia in Aulis." Overture, Wagner's version.
Haydn—Symphony in G major.
Debussy—"Iberia." Images pour Orchestre, No. 2.
Berlioz—"Damnation of Faust." Three orchestral selections.

The real Bostonian, to the bean-pot born, must always have two things at Christmas. One is a performance of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn society, and the other is Bach's "Pastoral Symphony" from his Christmas oratorio. Mr. Fiedler came near to forgetting the last half of this necessity, but bethought himself in time, and it was excellently played at the concert yesterday afternoon, and in a tempo that other conductors would do well to imitate—not dragging or sentimental.

Of course our musical readers know that "Symphony" in Bach's day meant prelude, interlude or postlude. There is a peculiar charm in the serene and dignified melodies of Bach. They seem most restful in these "most brisk and giddy-paced times." But many of them are barred from the modern concert-room because of the tiresome repetitions demanded in the "Da Capo Aria" form which this master often used. This pastorale, however, is not prolix nor too full of repetition. Its chief charm is in the duet of the two English horns, which was exquisitely played yesterday. This was originally written for the old-fashioned large oboe, an instrument now obsolete.

In this Christmas oratorio one can see Bach's great formality of key. The work is in six parts, played on the holy days of the Christmas season, and the last part comes 12 days after the first. Yet on that 12th day the master ends in the key in which he began almost a fortnight before! Think of that, oh ye modern discomposers who do not stay in one key for two measures at a time!

That Wagner, in spite of all his modernity, could appreciate the beauties of the stricter school is shown in many ways; his love of the conservative songs of Robert Franz; his use of the old diatonic modes in the motive of Faith, in "Parsifal"; and his careful revision and alteration of this overture of Gluck. These alterations were fully explained in the programme-book, and need no repetition here, but every auditor must have been convinced that the lofty power of Gluck was conserved in the version played at this concert. The introduction was a trifle slower than we have ever heard it, but was not ineffective.

The Haydn symphony in G, but not the old "Oxford" symphony, was in excellent contrast with the dignity and devotion of the two first numbers. We cannot help feeling that, with the exception of Mozart's G minor and Jupiter symphonies, Haydn's symphonies wear better than Mozart's. The reason is that Mozart was the more dramatic composer, and essayed more powerful modulations and scoring, which, however, seem watery when judged by the dramatic achievements in the orchestral music of today, while Haydn attempted nothing of the kind, but indulged in sunshiny melody and charming musical prattle which is as attractive today as a century ago, because it is so spontaneous, unaffected and simple. Yet there is enough contrapuntal skill displayed, as well, only it all seems very natural and unforced. The work received a reading that was really masterly, and the great applause that followed it was a token that our public still crave melodic and symmetrical music.

Ten minutes' walk in the corridors brought a century of change when the second part of the concert began. Debussy's "Images" have feet of clay, and the iconoclast (the breaker of images) may cheerfully hammer at them. Was it irony which made Mr. Fiedler give such simplicity and dignity in the first part of the programme and then suddenly jump to modern elusiveness in the second? Better 50 measures of Bach than a cycle of Debussy. These images form a cycle devoted to Spain. Poor suffering Spain! Judging by this work the only tune that she has left is "Three Blind Mice," which comes in prominently after much that is unintelligible.

Debussy is a man whose chief characteristic is sensitiveness and delicacy. He revels in isolated chords and passages for the sake of their color, and therefore his work has no coherence, and could stop equally well at any point of the composition. There is some balance and contrast of moods, but no real tonal architecture. It is "aural" rather than "cerebral" music, for the brain is shocked by harmonic chasms, but the ear is always delicately appealed to.

In "Iberia" are many fine bits of tone-color and programme-work, but there is also the constant affront to the mind that appreciates logical and expressive qualities in classical or romantic music.

The selections from Berlioz were quite another matter. Dainty, melodious, and finally grand and massive, they were definite and well-contrasted. The Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps was most delicately played and the Dance of the Sylphs was more ethereal still. We doubt whether any of the gossamer webs of Debussy in his lightest touches could give a clearer picture of the subjects than Berlioz manages to convey with such tuneful daintiness. The exquisite harmonics of the harp told out beautifully in the Dance of the Sylphs, and the piccolo did good service in the Minuet.

Now Mr. Fiedler cried havoc and let loose the dogs of war, for the Rakoczy march was at the other extreme from such shimmering musical rainbows. Here there is savage force and intensity, martial ardor, even frenzy. It is no wonder that a Hungarian once rushed at Berlioz, after a performance of this march, and cried out: "You understand the Hungarians. The enemy—tear him to pieces!" There has recently been an important article written in the "Revue Musicale" ("S.I.M.") which proves that the gypsy music, although very popular in Hungary, is by no means the true and historic Hungarian music, and suggests that Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodies should really be entitled "Gypsy Rhapsodies." The Rakoczy march, however, is actual Hungarian music, and Berlioz's treatment is, as above shown, essentially Magyar in style. One can imagine how Mr. Fiedler revelled in the sonority of the composition. It was excellently shaded. Its moments of mystery, with impressive bass-drum pulsations, its wonderful crescendo effects, and its grand climaxes were all splendidly brought out. It made a most effective finale to a very seasonable concert, and won the greatest applause of the entire concert.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 23, 1911

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, rehearsed its tenth program at Symphony hall Friday afternoon before an audience of almost the usual matinee numbers. There was no soloist and no novelty produced, but the interest of the listeners was just about the same as in the great weeks of the season. The program seemed designed to set off to the best advantage possible Mr. Fiedler's study of Debussy's "Iberia," the orchestral picture belonging to the incomplete set of compositions called "Images." Old music, including a Christmas piece put on the program by request, took up the first half of the afternoon. Sharply contrasting works of the French school, preeminently "Iberia," occupied the second half of the time. The program was as follows: Bach, pastorale from the Christmas oratorio; Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13); Debussy, "Iberia": Images for orchestra, No. 2; Berlioz, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian march (Rakoczy).

The old music of the first three numbers disclosed the tone of Mr. Fiedler's string players in a cumulative way. Bach tested their skill in reproducing the absolute, dispassionate type of melody which the great contrapunist chiseled out in such quantity as to exhaust the quarry. The Gluck overture challenged their appreciation of a genius who could give a strain of music the passionate touch. The Haydn symphony called out their talent for brilliant, facile and joyous expression. Here and there throughout these numbers were passages requiring delicate interpretation on the part of the wind players; the shepherd's song in the Christmas excerpt was an especially interesting example. But for the most part it was the violinists' opportunity; and when the Symphony violins have the responsibility of making a program effective, there can be no failure, whatever sentiment composers ask to have voiced.

The Debussy music, given its second Boston reading within the calendar year, was given the most careful attention by conductor and players. A piece of the latest type of modern scoring, it is a flood tide of orchestral tone with mirror surface. All the devices of choir enlarging which composers have found practicable are here, and various means of extraneous tone filling are present, too; but all is clarity. There are nowhere any overwhelming surgings of the tone masses to climax. Great effects by simple means were the aim of all orchestral composers from Mozart to Schuman; great effects by vast means have been the aim of the school that began with Wagner and culminated in Strauss. Light, detailed effects gained by the employment of large means enter into the Debussy formula, and in "Iberia" the object is attained most successfully.

With surpassingly fine program effect the highly colored pages of the French composer stood out against the low-tinted scoring of the old masters. Quite as strikingly the Debussy instrumentation was enhanced by the piquant scoring of the Berlioz music which followed. And this was none the less true though Mr. Fiedler did not give remarkably close attention to Berlioz as Berlioz. This composer was heard not because the special purport of his message was valuable to the occasion but because the orchestra of his minuet, ballet and march is in emotional key with a present day poet who wanders at afternoon, night and morning over Iberian highways and through Iberian villages.

[100]

POST,

DECEMBER 23, 191

CHRISTMAS AT SYMPHONY

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Christmas concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was one of far more than ordinary brilliancy and interest. The orchestra played old and ultra-modern music with uncommon distinction; the programme was especially well constructed. Pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio," Bach; overture to "Iphigenie in Aulis," Gluck; symphony in G major, Haydn; Iberia, "Images," for orchestra, Debussy; minuet of "Will-'o-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs," "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The pastorale of Bach was not only appropriate to the season, but what is of vastly more importance, it is wonderful music. The pace set by Mr. Fiedler was exactly such as to do most honor to a seraphic melody—for this pastorale, which is played for perhaps 10 minutes by the orchestra, consists of one single melodic thought, that grows out of the inexhaustible soil of Bach's mind as inevitably as a plant springs and comes to flower from the ground.

Mr. Fiedler appeared to be in rare sympathy with all that he interpreted, and to have prepared these compositions with particular thoroughness. This was not only true of Bach, and Haydn's exhilarating symphony, and the grandly classic overture of Gluck, but also of the subtle and impressionistic music of Debussy and the brilliant orchestral diversions of Berlioz.

Debussy's "Iberia" was heard here last spring, and then it puzzled most of those who listened. If memory is reliable, the performance yesterday was vastly superior to that of last spring, and whether it was the performance, or the music, or the hearer, or all three, it is seldom that this writer has been so impressed by any of the recent music of Debussy. There are many who consider the singular Frenchman to have said his last word, that his race as a discoverer of new things is run. It is still too soon for such discussion of a composer who is so master of his means that he can write something beautiful and extraordinary, whether he means it or not, to be anything but a futile waste of time. It was yesterday that we heard "Iberia"; it is today that we talk about it. It is astonishing music. When the composer has not another end in view, it is unspeakably beautiful; when it is taken as a whole, it appears to me to be one of the most exquisite manifestations of Debussy's indisputable genius that have yet appeared. And it seems hardly possible to deny that, as no one else, this man has liberated music first from the thraldom of the classic masters, and then from the despotism of Richard Wagner.

JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 23, 1911.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC AT THE SYMPHONY

Subscribers Insist On Bit of Real Yuletide Melody and Get It.

Even Symphony programs are not beyond the influence of the day. The one played yesterday, and to be played again tonight, opens with the little pastoral symphony from Bachs "Christmas Oratorio," and thereby hangs a tale.

It was not Mr. Fiedler's intention to have any Christmas music at all. The program first selected for this tenth pair of concerts consisted of the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," which Wagner has nominated as Gluck's best orchestral work; the symphony in G major that Haydn wrote during the period in which he enjoyed the patronage of the famous Parisian musical Four Hundred who took the name of Concert de la Loge Olympique and gave concerts in the Tuileries; the triad of Debussy tone paintings called "Iberia," and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," the "Ballet of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March."

But this did not satisfy subscribers with a hankering for a bit of real Yuletide melody, and in response to their entreaties the conductor brought out the shepherds' music which the Germans first heard in the old days when Christmas plays were given in churches and the clergy took the part of shepherds. A similar symphony marks the first part of Handel's "Messiah."

Those who attended the Symphony matinee yesterday showed Mr. Fiedler that they thoroughly appreciated his response to the Christmas call. But there is a good deal of seasonable merriment in the Haydn symphony; and possibly Mr. Fiedler had this in mind when he made up the program first.

Except in parts of the symphony the performance from first to last was exemplary. It was perfection itself in the Debussy "Images," which require the highest technical skill to appear at their best; and the fact that the Symphony Orchestra meets this requirement irreproachably explains to a great extent why these impressionistic tone pictures are so favorably received by Symphony audiences.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK City

Date DEC 24 1911

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on January 11 and 13 respectively. The soloist at both of these concerts will be Josef Hofmann, who comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is likely at one of these concerts Mr. Hofmann will play his own Fourth Concerto.

Estd 1884

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 24 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on January 11 and 13, respectively. The soloist at both of these concerts will be Josef Hofmann, who comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is likely that at one of these concerts Mr. Hofmann will play his own Fourth Concerto.

Estd 1884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on January 11 and 13 respectively. The soloist at both of these concerts will be Josef Hofman, who comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is likely at one of these concerts Mr. Hofman will play his own fourth concerto.

Estd 1884

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date

One of the most important announcements of the season is that concerning the forthcoming appearance in New York of Josef Hofmann. He will appear first at the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on January 11 and 13, and will give a recital on January 27.

Established

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 29, 1911

THE FRESH VENTURES OF THE CECILIA

Two Concerts, a New Conductor, Interesting Pieces and Interesting Singers—Mr. Mees and the Choir—The Details of the Re-engagement of Mr. Stransky—Weingartner's New Symphony Played in New York—A Silly Yarn About Mr. Hammerstein and the Metropolitan—A Kind Word for "Mignon"—Items as They Pass

THE Cecilia is making ready for new ventures under new auspices. Wisely it has reduced the number of its concerts to two—one with orchestra and one largely of unaccompanied music. Wisely, it has reserved these concerts for January and March, when the musical pressure upon the public, willing or reluctant, is lower than it is in the autumn. Wisely, it has engaged assisting singers of eminence, and most wisely of all, it has called a new conductor, Arthur Mees, the ablest leader of choral music in this country. More than once his merits have been recited in this place—the mingling in him of the energetic and exacting drillmaster and of the interpretative and fusing conductor; his due sense of orchestra and singers in choral music; his ability to make a choir diligent, responsive, excited even. If the Cecilia is to win and deserve general interest and support again it should do so under Mr. Mees. He will not spare his own pains; he will rightly ask like diligence and ambition of his chorus; he may yet accomplish all that he has accomplished at Worcester in the re-animating of choral music and of public interest in it.

The two concerts of the Cecilia are thus appointed for the evenings of Thursday, Jan. 25 and March 21, in Symphony Hall. At the first, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," unheard here for some years, interesting always, and well liked by the average concert-goer, will be performed. Mr. Mees will conduct the chorus and a band from the Symphony Orchestra, and the assisting singers will be Alice Nielsen, late of the Boston Opera House, who has never sung here in such a choral concert; Mr. Hamlin, the ablest of American tenors of the concert-room, and Mr. Witherspoon, of the Metropolitan. At the second concert the programme will comprise much unaccompanied music for male, female and mixed choir; Verdi's beautiful hymn to the Virgin; an eight-part chorus by Cornelius; a motet by Bach and Mr. Loeffler's choral piece, the lament "For One who Fell in Battle." Furthermore, Mme. Eames and Mr. de Gorgorza, both admired singers here, will assist the choir. In this wise the Cecilia will fulfil its two purposes—the performance of large and emphatic choral music like Berlioz's and the renewal of the fine vocal qualities and the rare pleasure of unaccompanied choral singing. Its fortunes with either depend much upon the diligence, the ambition, the responsiveness of its choir. Its chorus has rare ability in plenty and Mr. Mees will do his part—and more.

GLOBE—

DECEMBER 23, 1911

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Christmas Time Observed by Bach Pastorale.

Debussy's Pictorial "Iberia" Is Heard for Second Time.

Mr Fiedler observed the Christmas time by beginning the program of his 10th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon with the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas Oratorio. The idyllic hymning of the wood wind instruments against the responses of the strings bore its own quaint and hallowed suggestion yesterday. It is music of tenderness, and breathes forth good will to all men who may bathe their souls in its tranquillity and repose.

Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" followed with suggestions of classic form the breadth of treatment. The playing of it was with becoming dignity.

Haydn's symphonies are filled with much of caution and delight. They are not merely the transparent network of archaic patterns. Their form is refreshing in its clearness, as it is in content. The vivacious, sprightly first movement, the largo of sustained and not unemotional song, the stately elegance of the minuet, for this is for patrician feet, and the ebullient exuberance of the closing movement.

Debussy's imaginative music grows upon another hearing. Here illusion must be as an invisible vapor, an incense detected, but not seen. It is music of a gorgeous palette of color, strangely incoherent, yet of moving beauty, music of subtle contrast, of pages so evanescent in texture as to defy orchestral reproduction or to be heard only in the dreams of the composer. Mr Fiedler and the players gave a careful and sympathetic performance.

Scenes from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" closed the program.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 21, 1911

Forthcoming Concerts

Mr. Fiedler, at the request of those who must have Christmas even in their concerts, has prefixed the Pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" to the pieces already chosen for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday.

The conductor purposes to perform at an early day the youthful symphony by Beethoven, the manuscript of which was discovered in Jena last summer and which was lately played there. Mr. Fiedler had even proposed it for the concerts of next week, but the parts have not arrived in season, and he has deferred his "Beethoven première" accordingly.

The chamber concert announced by Mr. Witek of the Symphony Orchestra for the evening of Jan. 4 in Jordan Hall has been postponed to a date, still to be chosen, in March.

At the concert [illegible] on the evening of Monday, Jan. 1, in Jordan Hall, Mr. Noack, the violinist, Mr. Férir, the viola player, other members of the Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. R. J. Hall, saxophonist, will assist the wood-wind players. All the music to be performed is new; an octet by Woollett; five pieces for clarinet, viola and piano; and a set of "Dutch water colors" by the Hollander, Kriens.

GLOBE—DECEMBER 24, 19

Mme Berta Morena as Symphony Soloist

One of the most significant musical discoveries of recent years was the finding of the manuscript of the youthful symphony of Beethoven in the library in Jena. Mr Fiedler has the score of this work and had expected to put it on the coming week's Symphony program, but the parts have not yet arrived in this country. Consequently he will use instead the familiar Bach suite in D-major. His other purely orchestral number will be a suite by the Roumanian Enesco, which was so favorably received last year.

The soloist will be Mme Berta Morena of the Court Opera of Munich and the Metropolitan Opera of New York. Mme Morena was a highly interesting and artistic singer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here March 5, 1909. She sang for the first time in this city as Sieglinde in "The Valkyrie" April 8, 1908.

Her appearance will enable Mr Fiedler to close his program with a Wagnerian excerpt that has not appeared on a Symphony program in seven years. This is the closing scene from "Gotterdammerung," familiarly known as "Brunnhilde's Immolation," the culminating episode in Wagner's "Ring." Mme Morena will sing the music allotted to Brunnhilde. Her other aria will be the big "Abscheulicher," taken from "Fidelio," by Beethoven.

JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 30, 1911.

"JENA" SYMPHONY PRESENTED HERE

Question as to Whether It Is One of Beethoven's Compositions.

Was it a Beethoven symphony that was played for the first time in America at the Symphony matinee yesterday? It was announced as a Beethoven work, a la Haydn; but the program book editor put a question mark after the imposing name of the genius of Bonn.

Anyhow, the fact remains that the Symphony audiences this week are the first on this shore of the Atlantic to hear this so-called Beethoven symphony, now known as the "Jena" symphony, for the reason that the manuscript was found a year or so ago in the library of the university in the town where Napoleon held a hare in 1808 to remind the Prussians how roundly he had licked them two years before. That was several years after Beethoven had written his "Eroica" symphony, which is supposed to be based on the rise of the "Little Corporal."

But whether this "Jena" symphony was written by the same hand that penned the incomparable Fifth symphony is not worth a controversy. It is a tradition that Beethoven composed several symphonies before he left his native town and before what is known as the First symphony, op. 21, was performed in Vienna, at a concert given by Beethoven for his own benefit. This "Jena" symphony may be one of them. If so, then it must have been written when the composer was very young and under the spell of "Papa" Haydn. It is intrinsically trivial. It may interest the magical archaeologists, but, judging by the reception it got here yesterday, it will bore the public. It sounded commonplace alongside Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, which is even older than the "Jena" symphony.

Mme. Berta Morena, the dramatic soprano from Munich, is this week's soloist. She looked a very tragic queen yesterday in her severe emerald green gown—a large, statuesque woman, with clean-cut profile and lustrous raven hair and a manner befitting her reputation as an interpreter of the mighty Wagnerian heroines. She sang the aria "Komm Hoffnung" and the preceding scene from Beethoven's "Fidelio" in

JOURNAL-

JANUARY 6, 1912.

HOFMANN SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

Polish Pianist Begins Brief American Tour and Is Warmly Welcomed.

Josef Hofmann began a brief American tour here yesterday, when he performed the Chopin concerto, No. 2, in F minor, with the Symphony Orchestra. It was this engagement with the Symphony Orchestra that alone induced the noted young Polish pianist to cross the ocean and interrupt his successful engagements abroad, and in this way, as his talented compatriot Paderewski used to do, he pays tribute to Boston's renowned band.

The concerto offers its best advantages to the soloist, and Hofmann made a splendid success with them. It was an artistic achievement pure and simple, without the frills or idiosyncrasies that are still assiduously cultivated by some of these virtuosi. As Hofmann would have the public make light of the fact that he was once trundled around the country as a juvenile prodigy, so he would have it ignore his personal appearance, which is plain and modest withal, and devote its attention entirely to his interpretations.

Hofmann is sensational only in so far as he is a complete artist, with a highly polished technique and with the feeling and intelligence that raise the truly great player above the familiar rank and file. All these attributes of his artistry were in evidence yesterday, and the large audience enjoyed them thoroughly. The pianist's success was built solidly upon beautiful tone and rare musical intelligence.

The seventh Bruckner symphony, which is the first number on this week's program, is impressive here and there. The adagio is famous, but Mr. Fiedler also gave a fine reading of the finale. The long applause was in a large measure a direct compliment to the orchestra for its excellent work.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture finishes this twelfth program of the season. The orchestra will be away next week, taking Mr. Hofmann with it as soloist.

[101]

POST,

DECEMBER 23, 191

CHRISTMAS AT SYMPHONY

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Christmas concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was one of far more than ordinary brilliancy and interest. The orchestra played old and ultra-modern music with uncommon distinction; the programme was especially well constructed. Pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio," Bach; overture to "Iphigenie in Aulis," Gluck; symphony in G major, Haydn; Iberia, "Images," for orchestra, Debussy; minuet of "Will-'o-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs," "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The pastorale of Bach was not only appropriate to the season, but what is of vastly more importance, it is wonderful music. The pace set by Mr. Fiedler was exactly such as to do most honor to a seraphic melody—for this pastorale, which is played for perhaps 10 minutes by the orchestra, consists of one single melodic thought, that grows out of the inexhaustible soil of Bach's mind as inevitably as a plant springs and comes to flower from the ground.

Mr. Fiedler appeared to be in rare sympathy with all that he interpreted, and to have prepared these compositions with particular thoroughness. This was not only true of Bach, and Haydn's exhilarating symphony, and the grandly classic overture of Gluck, but also of the subtle and impressionistic music of Debussy and the brilliant orchestral diversions of Berlioz.

Debussy's "Iberia" was heard here last spring, and then it puzzled most of those who listened. If memory is reliable, the performance yesterday was vastly superior to that of last spring, and whether it was the performance, or the music, or the hearer, or all three, it is seldom that this writer has been so impressed by any of the recent music of Debussy. There are many who consider the singular Frenchman to have said his last word, that his race as a discoverer of new things is run. It is still too soon for such discussion of a composer who is so master of his means that he can write something beautiful and extraordinary, whether he means it or not, to be anything but a futile waste of time. It was yesterday that we heard "Iberia"; it is today that we talk about it. It is astonishing music. When the composer has not another end in view, it is unspeakably beautiful; when it is taken as a whole, it appears to me to be one of the most exquisite manifestations of Debussy's indisputable genius that have yet appeared. And it seems hardly possible to deny that, as no one else, this man has liberated music first from the thraldom of the classic masters, and then from the despotism of Richard Wagner.

JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 23, 1911.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC AT THE SYMPHONY

Subscribers Insist On Bit of Real Yuletide Melody and Get It.

Even Symphony programs are not beyond the influence of the day. The one played yesterday, and to be played again tonight, opens with the little pastoral symphony from Bachs "Christmas Oratorio," and thereby hangs a tale.

It was not Mr. Fiedler's intention to have any Christmas music at all. The program first selected for this tenth pair of concerts consisted of the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," which Wagner has nominated as Gluck's best orchestral work; the symphony in G major that Haydn wrote during the period in which he enjoyed the patronage of the famous Parisian musical Four Hundred who took the name of Concert de la Loge Olympique and gave concerts in the Tuileries; the triad of Debussy tone paintings called "Iberia," and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," the "Ballet of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March."

But this did not satisfy subscribers with a hankering for a bit of real Yuletide melody, and in response to their entreaties the conductor brought out the shepherds' music which the Germans first heard in the old days when Christmas plays were given in churches and the clergy took the part of shepherds. A similar symphony marks the first part of Handel's "Messiah."

Those who attended the Symphony matinee yesterday showed Mr. Fiedler that they thoroughly appreciated his response to the Christmas call. But there is a good deal of seasonable merriment in the Haydn symphony; and possibly Mr. Fiedler had this in mind when he made up the program first.

Except in parts of the symphony the performance from first to last was exemplary. It was perfection itself in the Debussy "Images," which require the highest technical skill to appear at their best; and the fact that the Symphony Orchestra meets this requirement irreproachably explains to a great extent why these impressionistic tone pictures are so favorably received by Symphony audiences.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK City

Date DEC 24 1911

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on January 11 and 13 respectively. The soloist at both of these concerts will be Josef Hofmann, who comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is likely at one of these concerts Mr. Hofmann will play his own Fourth Concerto.

Esta 884

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 24 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on January 11 and 13, respectively. The soloist at both of these concerts will be Josef Hofmann, who comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is likely that at one of these concerts Mr. Hofmann will play his own Fourth Concerto.

Esta 884

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on January 11 and 13 respectively. The soloist at both of these concerts will be Josef Hofman, who comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is likely at one of these concerts Mr. Hofman will play his own fourth concerto.

E k, 1884

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date

One of the most important announcements of the season is that concerning the forthcoming appearance in New York of Josef Hofmann. He will appear first at the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on January 11 and 13, and will give a recital on January 27.

Establishe[illegible] 1

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 29, 1911

THE FRESH VENTURES OF THE CECILIA

Two Concerts, a New Conductor, Interesting Pieces and Interesting Singers—Mr. Mees and the Choir—The Details of the Re-engagement of Mr. Stransky—Weingartner's New Symphony Played in New York—A Silly Yarn About Mr. Hammerstein and the Metropolitan—A Kind Word for "Mignon"—Items as They Pass

THE Cecilia is making ready for new ventures under new auspices. Wisely it has reduced the number of its concerts to two—one with orchestra and one largely of unaccompanied music. Wisely, it has reserved these concerts for January and March, when the musical pressure upon the public, willing or reluctant, is lower than it is in the autumn. Wisely, it has engaged assisting singers of eminence, and most wisely of all, it has called a new conductor, Arthur Mees, the ablest leader of choral music in this country. More than once his merits have been recited in this place—the mingling in him of the energetic and exacting drillmaster and of the interpretative and fusing conductor; his due sense of orchestra and singers in choral music; his ability to make a choir diligent, responsive, excited even. If the Cecilia is to win and deserve general interest and support again it should do so under Mr. Mees. He will not spare his own pains; he will rightly ask like diligence and ambition of his chorus; he may yet accomplish all that he has accomplished at Worcester in the re-animating of choral music and of public interest in it.

The two concerts of the Cecilia are thus appointed for the evenings of Thursday, Jan. 25 and March 21, in Symphony Hall. At the first, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," unheard here for some years, interesting always, and well liked by the average concert-goer, will be performed. Mr. Mees will conduct the chorus and a band from the Symphony Orchestra, and the assisting singers will be Alice Nielsen, late of the Boston Opera House, who has never sung here in such a choral concert; Mr. Hamlin, the ablest of American tenors of the concert-room, and Mr. Witherspoon, of the Metropolitan. At the second concert the programme will comprise much unaccompanied music for male, female and mixed choir; Verdi's beautiful hymn to the Virgin; an eight-part chorus by Cornelius; a motet by Bach and Mr. Loeffler's choral piece, the lament "For One who Fell in Battle." Furthermore, Mme. Eames and Mr. de Gorgorza, both admired singers here, will assist the choir. In this wise the Cecilia will fulfil its two purposes—the performance of large and emphatic choral music like Berlioz's and the renewal of the fine vocal qualities and the rare pleasure of unaccompanied choral singing. Its fortunes with either depend much upon the diligence, the ambition, the responsiveness of its choir. Its chorus has rare ability in plenty and Mr. Mees will do his part—and more.

GLOBE-

DECEMBER 23, 1911

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Christmas Time Observed by Bach Pastorale.

Debussy's Pictorial "Iberia" Is Heard for Second Time.

Mr Fiedler observed the Christmas time by beginning the program of his 10th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon with the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas Oratorio. The idyllic hymning of the wood wind instruments against the responses of the strings bore its own quaint and hallowed suggestion yesterday. It is music of tenderness, and breathes forth good will to all men who may bathe their souls in its tranquillity and repose.

Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" followed with suggestions of classic form the breadth of treatment. The playing of it was with becoming dignity.

Haydn's symphonies are filled much of caution and delight. The not merely the transparent network of archaic patterns. Their form is refreshing in its clearness, as it is in content. The vivacious, sprightly first movement, the largo of sustained and not unemotional song, the stately elegance of the minuet, for this is for patrician feet, and the ebullient exuberance of the closing movement.

Debussy's imaginative music grows upon another hearing. Here illusion must be as an invisible vapor, an incense detected, but not seen. It is music of a gorgeous palette of color, strangely incoherent, yet of moving beauty, music of subtle contrast, of pages so evanescent in texture as to defy orchestral reproduction or to be heard only in the dreams of the composer. Mr Fiedler and the players gave a careful and sympathetic performance.

Scenes from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" closed the program.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 21, 1911

Forthcoming Concerts

Mr. Fiedler, at the request of those who must have Christmas even in their concerts, has prefixed the Pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" to the pieces already chosen for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday.

The conductor purposes to perform at an early day the youthful symphony by Beethoven, the manuscript of which was discovered in Jena last summer and which was lately played there. Mr. Fiedler had even proposed it for the concerts of next week, but the parts have not arrived in season, and he has deferred his "Beethoven première" accordingly.

The chamber concert announced by Mr. Witek of the Symphony Orchestra for the evening of Jan. 4 in Jordan Hall has been postponed to a date, still to be chosen, in March.

At the concert [illegible] on the evening of Monday, Jan. 1, in Jordan Hall, Mr. Noack, the violinist, Mr. Férir, the viola player, other members of the Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. R. J. Hall, saxophonist, will assist the wood-wind players. All the music to be performed is new; an octet by Woollett; five pieces for clarinet, viola and piano; and a set of "Dutch water colors" by the Hollander, Kriens.

GLOBE—DECEMBER 24, 19

Mme Berta Morena as Symphony Soloist

One of the most significant musical discoveries of recent years was the finding of the manuscript of the youthful symphony of Beethoven in the library in Jena. Mr Fiedler has the score of this work and had expected to put it on the coming week's Symphony program, but the parts have not yet arrived in this country. Consequently he will use instead the familiar Bach suite in D-major. His other purely orchestral number will be a suite by the Roumanian Enesco, which was so favorably received last year.

The soloist will be Mme Berta Morena of the Court Opera of Munich and the Metropolitan Opera of New York. Mme Morena was a highly interesting and artistic singer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here March 6, 1909. She sang for the first time in this city as Sieglinde in "The Valkyrie" April 8, 1908.

Her appearance will enable Mr Fiedler to close his program with a Wagnerian excerpt that has not appeared on a Symphony program in seven years. This is the closing scene from "Gotterdammerung," familiarly known as "Brunnhilde's Immolation," the culminating episode in Wagner's "Ring." Mme Morena will sing the music allotted to Brunnhilde. Her other aria will be the big "Abschiedlicher," taken from "Fidelio," by Beethoven.

JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 30, 1911.

"JENA" SYMPHONY PRESENTED HERE

Question as to Whether It Is One of Beethoven's Compositions.

Was it a Beethoven symphony tha was played for the first time in Americ at the Symphony matinee yesterda It was announced as a Beethoven wo a la Haydn; but the program bo editor put a question mark after imposing name of the genius of Bon Anyhow, the fact remains that Symphony audiences this week are first on this shore of the Atlantic hear this so-called Beethoven s phony, now known as the "Jena" s phony, for the reason that manuscript was found a year or so in the library of the university in town where Napoleon held a hare in 1808 to remind the Prussians roundly he had licked them two before. That was several years Beethoven had written his "Er symphony, which is supposed t based on the rise of the "Little poral."

But whether this "Jena" symp was written by the same hand penned the incomparable Fifth s phony is not worth a controversy. a tradition that Beethoven compo several symphonies before he left native town and before what is kno as the First symphony, op. 21, w performed in Vienna, at a concert giv by Beethoven for his own benefit. Th "Jena" symphony may be one of them. If so, then it must have been written when the composer was very young and under the spell of "Papa" Haydn. It is intrinsically trivial. It may interest the magical archaeologists, but, judging by the reception it got here yesterday, it will bore the public. It sounded commonplace alongside Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, which is even older than the "Jena" symphony.

Mme. Berta Morena, the dramatic soprano from Munich, is this week's soloist. She looked a very tragic queen yesterday in her severe emerald green gown—a large, statuesque woman, with clean-cut profile and lustrous raven hair and a manner befitting her reputation as an interpreter of the mighty Wagnerian heroines. She sang the aria "Komm Hoffnung" and the preceding scene from Beethoven's "Fidelio" in

JOURNAL-

JANUARY 6, 1912.

HOFMANN SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

Polish Pianist Begins Brief American Tour and Is Warmly Welcomed.

Josef Hofmann began a brief American tour here yesterday, when he performed the Chopin concerto, No. 2, in F minor, with the Symphony Orchestra. It was this engagement with the Symphony Orchestra that alone induced the noted young Polish pianist to cross the ocean and interrupt his successful engagements abroad, and in this way, as his talented compatriot Paderewski used to do, he pays tribute to Boston's renowned band.

The concerto offers its best advantages to the soloist, and Hofmann made a splendid success with them. It was an artistic achievement pure and simple, without the frills or idiosyncrasies that are still assiduously cultivated by some of these virtuosi. As Hofmann would have the public make light of the fact that he was once trundled around the country as a juvenile prodigy, so he would have it ignore his personal appearance, which is plain and modest withal, and devote its attention entirely to his interpretations.

Hofmann is sensational only in so far as he is a complete artist, with a highly polished technique and with the feeling and intelligence that raise the truly great player above the familiar rank and file. All these attributes of his artistry were in evidence yesterday, and the large audience enjoyed them thoroughly. The pianist's success was built solidly upon beautiful tone and rare musical intelligence.

The seventh Bruckner symphony, which is the first number on this week's program, is impressive here and there. The adagio is famous, but Mr. Fiedler also gave a fine reading of the finale. The long applause was in a large measure a direct compliment to the orchestra for its excellent work.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture finishes this twelfth program of the season. The orchestra will be away next week, taking Mr. Hofmann with it as soloist.

[101]

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 30, 1911

REMARKABLE PROGRAMME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

LEANED HEAVILY THE CLASSICAL SIDE

Feature Was First American Performance of Beethoven's "Jena" Symphony, a Work of Doubtful Merit.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—"Marriage of Figaro" Overture.
Beethoven—"Jena" Symphony. (First performance.)
Beethoven—Aria. "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio."
Soloist—Mme. Berta Morena.
Enesco—Suite. Op. 9.
Wagner—Finale from "Goetterdaemmerung."
Mme. Morena.

A remarkable programme, dignified or interesting in its every number and free from the vices that beset the modern school. The Mozart overture, short, chatty, and without development, was a good example of that middle ground where the musician and layman can meet and both be delighted. No introduction, clear themes, a short coda, everything is symmetrical, yet it all seems charmingly informal. It was well-played, too, and here at least Mr. Fiedler had good warrant for his rapid speed.

Now came a symphony, for the first time in America, by a composer named Beethoven. This man exhibits learning and learning and nothing but learning, and it is learning of a crude and undigested sort. It is a weariness to plod with him on his tiresome journey. When he attempts to vary a theme he does not know either how to choose his theme or how to treat it. He has not a bit of melody, not a bit of song.

No! Most ferocious reader, these are not our thoughts. They are exact reprints of reviews of Beethoven's works, printed in 1799, in "Die Allgemeine Musikzeitung," a little after the time at which this symphony is supposed to have been written. This is a work of Beethoven's earliest career, if it is Beethoven's at all. It was discovered in the university library at Jena, a few years ago, and a conflict is being waged as to whether it is genuine or not. In any event it does not represent the Beethoven that we know, and it is scarcely an honor to his memory to produce it. Yet, as the world always craves to know everything concerning its heroes, it will be intensely interested in hearing this work irrespective of its merits or defects.

The introduction had Beethoven chords if somewhat Haydnish modulations. The exposition was more coherent than Haydn, whose themes are seldom long breathed. The expressive power with simple means was emphatically a Beethoven characteristic. There was a short development to the first movement, but it showed the Beethoven power of tone-color.

The adagio was especially like Beethoven. Here Mozart or Haydn would have been less intense. Both this and the first movement were more unified in effect than Haydn or Mozart could have achieved. The orchestration, all through, was more lucid and effective than one would expect in a Haydn or Mozart symphony, and the themes were better balanced than those of the earlier masters.

The symphony seems undoubtedly to be a work of a young follower of Haydn who had greater ideas than his model. But, for all that, the new work will not disturb the nine sisters and will not take its place among them. It is too evidently in the school of Haydn and, in spite of its moments of power, is too evidently a copy to be of very great importance. Yet it is a feather in Boston's cap to have had a "premiere" of a Beethoven work.

The Enesco suite has been performed here within a year and therefore requires no renewed analysis. The young Roumanian is impressive enough from the unison passages of the prelude, to the counterpoint of the finale. There was more than a tinge of Debussy in some parts.

It was a keen delight to hear a great Wagnerian artist in two great numbers of the German school, supported by full orchestral accompaniment. We are having all the Italian and French operatic music that we can digest, and we are later on to have a Wagnerian feast under the direction of Weingartner, but just at present we have been hungry for some of the solid music of this broad and dramatic character with its symphonic background.

Beethoven's "Abscheulicher!" is an intensely dramatic work when one considers its epoch. It follows the regular "scena" model pretty closely, the opening passages being recitative, the beautiful adagio—"Komm Hoffnung,"—being like a Cavatina, and the rapid finale,—"Ich folg' den innern Triebe"—having some of the display work of the Italian vein, but for all that it remains German music, especially in its orchestral support. It does not deal in coloratura nor does it give extremely high notes (B in alt is its highest), but its sustained intensity is difficult to portray, and, like all of Beethoven's songs, it takes no heed of the needs of the voice. It has some most unsingable skips, one of nearly two octaves, and its furious ending is very trying to the singer. The Beethoven of this aria is a very different Beethoven from the composer of the "Jena" symphony.

All the difficulties were bravely met and overcome by Mme. Morena, who sang like a conscientious artist. But we doubt whether the world at present will vibrate much to the vocal ecstasies of Beethoven. The Beethoven of song and the Beethoven of symphony are two very different composers.

But the glory of this concert came in its last number, where singer and orchestra combined to give a picture which none but Wagner could have created. It was a wonderful idea to end the great trilogy in this manner. The chorus are all upon the stage, but they are mute. All the interest centres upon the single figure of the unhappy woman consummating her sacrifice. Any other composer would have ended with a powerful combination of soloists, chorus and orchestra. Not so Wagner. His treatment was the simpler, but infinitely the greater.

The present writer recalls this number, sung in Villa Wahnfried, by Materna, in her prime, with Mottl playing the piano arrangement of the orchestral score, Mme. Cosima Wagner turning the leaves, and a crowd of Wagner devotees drinking it in. But even that remarkable performance was nearly equalled by Mme. Morena yesterday afternoon.

The orchestral support must have inspired her. Every guiding-motive was clearly brought out by Mr. Fiedler and his musicians. The tempo was never exaggerated, the ensemble never disturbed.

At the close the singer was recalled two or three times with very spontaneous enthusiasm. It was a noble ending of a concert which leaned heavily to the classical side.

POST,

DECEMBER 30, 1911

JENA NOVELTY BY SYMPHONY

Beethoven Given Credit for Not Publishing Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

A "novelty" by Ludwig van Beethoven does not fall to the lot of every concert-goer. Yesterday afternoon at the 11th public rehearsal of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a symphony now nicknamed by its finder, Professor Fritz Stein, as the "Jena Symphony in C Major." Professor Stein attributes the work to Beethoven, and believes that it was written prior to the appearance of the work known as the First Symphony, between 1787 and 1790.

Some years ago Professor Stein discovered parts of an unknown symphony in C major, along with a number of other manuscripts belonging to various of the great dead, in the archieve room of the College of Music, Jena. The portfolio that contained these parts, as well as a hand-written catalogue dated 1858, in which the parts were entered as "No. 20," under the heading of symphonies by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, bore the inscription "Ludwig van Beethoven." The word Beetnoven was afterward penciled out." But on the second violin part was written "Par Louis van Beethoven," and the 'cello part "Symphonie von Beethoven." "It should be here said," adds the compiler of the symphony programme books, "that the significance of these inscriptions is hotly disputed."

The question is now, of what worth is the symphony? If Beethoven wrote this symphony, he made an excellent exercise in writing in the strict classic form established by Haydn, and he knew enough not to publish it.

In the last measures of the adagio, mentioned by Dr. Fritz Steiner as evidence of Beethoven's authorship, and also in the introduction, where the composer modulates suddenly to a remote key, there is enough to admit of the possibility that Beethoven wrote the work. But if he did, he wisely put it back in his portfolio and kept it from the world.

Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" one of the finest comedy overtures in existence, and delightfully played, opened the programme. Mme. Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang the scena, "Abscheulicher," and the aria, "Komm Hoffnung," from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and the final scene from "Die Gotterdammerung."

The Beethoven aria, now approaches the sentimental, the passe. The preceding scena is stronger, and it was in this part that Mme. Morena was heard at her best. In the aria there were defects of execution and of taste in interpretation. The qualities of the music which should be transmuted by the art of the singer were emphasized to its disadvantage, and the great underlying spirit, which, if revealed, would doubtless thrill us again, was not strongly felt. In the Gotterdammerung excerpt the orchestra carried Mme. Morena to glory. Bernard Shaw thought this closing scene of the trilogy "a prolonged scena, extremely moving and imposing, but yielding nothing to resolute intellectual criticism except a very powerful and elevated exploitation of theatrical pathos psychologically identical with the scene of Cleopatra and the dead Antony in Shakspere's tragedy."

Some of the music is [illegible] and some is [illegible] but all of it the most [illegible] music, and [illegible] unspeakable magnificence. [illegible] in a concert hall [illegible] Walhalla burns before our eyes and the joyous song of the Rhine maidens who have recovered their ring floats up from the welling stream; and the deliverance of the world is sung with eloquence of 100 Homers. So we will enjoy our Wagner, and even be vastly moved by him, regardless of G. B. S., and resolute intellectual criticism.

The other feature of the programme was the masterly and original suite of Georges Enesco, which was introduced to the Symphony audiences with such success last spring. The composer has struck an individual note of his own, and his superb technic enables him to express himself in a manner to win the highest praise. How seldom do we encounter new music today—written ex-

HERALD, DECEMBER 29, 1911.

Mme. Morena First Noted for Her Beauty as Artist's Model

Berta Morena.

Voice Was "Discovered" by Lenbach, Munich Painter for Whom She Posed.

SINGS AT SYMPHONY TODAY

Mme. Berta Morena, who will sing at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow evening, did not begin life as a singer. Born at Wuerzburg in 1878, she was famous in Munich for her beauty as an artist's model. Lenbach, the painter, who admired her greatly, discovered that she had a voice and urged her to go on the stage. She studied with Mme. Roehr-Brajnin of Munich and later with Mme. de Sales in London. Her first appearance on the stage was at the Munich Court and National theater, with which she has been connected ever since. She has won applause as Senta, Sieglinde, Bruennhilde at the Wagner Festivals in Munich. It was in March 1908, that Mme. Morena sang for the first time at The Metropolitan Opera house, New York. She there took the part of Sieglinde.

Mme. Morena has sung twice in Boston: once as Sieglinde at the Boston Theatre, April 8, 1908; once at a Symphony concert, March 6, 1909. At this concert she sang "Ocean Thou Mighty Monster" from "Oberon" and songs by Wagner and Strauss. This afternoon her choice will be the grand air from "Fidelio" and the [illegible] scene from "Goetterdaemmerung."

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date DEC 31 1911

Established

***

The telegraph brought word the other day from Boston that a newly found symphony by Beethoven would be played there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts on Friday and Saturday. The story of its discovery in the university library at Jena is interesting; but it does not carry absolute proof that the symphony is really by Beethoven. Prof. Fritz Stein, director of the music at the University of Jena, found a portfolio with the orchestral parts of a symphony in C. They had been in this portfolio since 1858, when the library was catalogued, and it was marked, "Sinfonie par L. von Beethoven?" The word Beethoven was afterward crossed out with a lead pencil. Two of the parts, and only two, bear Beehthoven's name as the composer, in these cases written rather carelessly and hastily in a contemporary hand, which experts have judged to belong to the last decade of the eighteenth century.

Dr. Stein, who has set forth the facts of his discovery in the quarterly magazine of the International Musical Society, enters into some historical and biographical considerations that, in an interesting manner, go to uphold the belief that this is a symphony of Beethoven's youth. Bartholomäus Fischenich, who was a professor in Bonn while Beethoven still lived there, corresponded actively with Charlotte von Schiller, wife of the great poet, living then in Jena. He sent her some youthful compositions of Beethoven, with admiring comments on the young man's promise. Among them may have been this symphony; the correspondence, however, does not mention it. Christoph von Breuning, son of a family in Bonn intimately connected with Beethoven, was a student then at Jena. He may have had the symphony sent him for performance in the university concerts. Another conjecture is that Karl Stamitz, Musical Director of the university, obtained a copy of the work of the rising young composer of Bonn for these concerts.

Dr. Riemann, editor of the German revision of Thayer's life of Beethoven, naturally suggests that skepticism is called for in relation to so important a new "find" purporting to be from Beethoven's hand. There seems to be, in truth, no positive evidence that the symphony is really Beethoven's. In this particular case, however, it is almost as good evidence of the genuineness of this manscript, marked as by Beethoven, that there was no motive for forgery or false attribution.

It is well known that Beethoven's first fame was as a piano virtuoso, and that he became known as a composer only later. His first symphony was not played till 1801, was not published till the next year. What object was there, in the last years of the eighteenth century, to attribute improperly to Beethoven a work that was not his, when he was an obscure young musician in a small town, known to comparatively few people? [illegible] would have added no importance to the work for the general public of Jena. Furthermore, the careless way in which that name is affixed to only two of the orchestral parts (in one case being misspelled as it often was by the good people of Bonn before it was famous) does not suggest a deliberate intention to falsify. It rather suggests indifference concerning a young man little known.

In his critical consideration of the work itself, Dr. Stein finds many points in it that are "Beethovenish"; also a number of anticipations of traits to be [102]

GLOBE-

DECEMBER 30, 1911.

"JENA" SYMPHONY'S FIRST PRODUCTION

Beethoven's Authorship Fails of Proof.

Mme Berta Morena Is Soloist for Orchestra Rehearsal.

At the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon Mr Fiedler brought to its first performance in America the new "Jena" symphony, which is ascribed by its discoverer to Beethoven.

The other orchestral numbers were Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Enesco's Suite for orchestra, and the finale of "Goetterdaemmerung," with Mme Berta Morena as soloist. She was also heard in the aria "Komm Hoffnung," and in the preceding scene from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

A year ago last Winter the following account of the resurrection of the "Jena" symphony appeared in the London Times: "On Jan 17, 1910, was played at the Academische Konzert in Jena, a university town in Saxe-Weimar, a symphony in C major, dating from the end of the 18th century, an unknown work discovered in the archives of the A. K. in Jena, and prepared for the present performance by Fritz Stein."

It is said that Prof Stein firmly believes this symphony to have been a product of Beethoven's "first period," composed between the years 1787 and 1790, and has written a defense of his belief, in which he elects to find unmistakable traces of the master's hand in certain portions of the work.

The name of Beethoven is also said to have been deciphered upon certain of the parts. Even so, the theory of his authorship has not gained universal credence in European cities, as at Leipsic, where the work has already been played.

The symphony is scored for one flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums and the usual quintet of strings. The absence of trombones does not cause surprise, for Beethoven introduced them into but three of the nine symphonies, a trio in both the fifth and ninth, and a pair of them in the sixth.

The lack of clarinets is perhaps more noticeable and significant. Beethoven wrote parts for two of these instruments in each of his nine sumphonies, and the first was performed for the first time in 1800.

This was a decade or more after the time when Prof Stein assumes that Beethoven wrote the "Jena" symphony, but even in 1787, the earliest date named by him, was the clarinet altogether a stranger in the orchestra?

Between June 26 and Aug 10 of the following year, Mozart wrote his three crowning symphonic works. It is true that the last of these to be completed, the "Jupiter" in C major, had no clarinets. They were absent in the original score of the G minor, but were afterward added, while the E flat, the first of the three, contained parts for two of the instruments, as did a symphony of his in D major, written as early as 1782.

Although Haydn used a full complement of wood wind when he had arrived at his "Creation," he had been sparing in his use of the clarinet in the symphonies which had preceded. With him the oboe was queen of the wood wind choir, and its naive yet aristocratic voice is the more characteristic in his music in the absence of the clarinet, characteristic in a manner not foreign to pages heard in this symphony yesterday.

It is not impossible that Beethoven could have written an early work without the clarinet, for Mozart was the first to give the instrument a permanent place in the orchestra, and Beethoven was unquestionably much indebted to him for models of style.

It is rather in the character of the work, the texture of mind and quality of mood which it betokens that the authorship is to be sought or confirmed. Taken generally, it was the thought, the spirit and even the idiom of Haydn rather than of Beethoven, which spoke yesterday.

The symphonies of Haydn and Beethoven have been not inaptly compared by styling those of the former as comedies, those of the latter as tragedies. Beethoven did not begin to feel the premonitions of deafness until several years later, but the fundamental elements of tragedy were ever present in his life. His spirit was never reconciable to his environment. There is little of this note of combat in the "Jena" symphony.

When at the final concert of the season a year ago Mr Fiedler prefaced the ninth symphony with the first, there were the signs of a youthful Beethoven that foretold the master. The work of yesterday would precede that, but it is difficult to find a clear kinship, either in effectiveness of instrumental grouping, boldness of modulation, display of invention in development, or, above all, in the character of the movements.

The first suggests the opening movement of a dance suite, the form which Haydn extended and built up into the symphony. The chief theme is typical of him in its arch and naive resiliency and the second is frankly feminine and tender, although it is approached at times in a manner to suggest that of Beethoven.

The slow movement opens with a simple theme of folksong character which presently returns in a variation for the first violins which reminds of Haydn in its attendant contrapuntal guise. But it is in the dapper and tripping neatness of the minu that Haydn is most clearly recalled. It might have been written to piquantly remind aristocratic feet of the pleasures of the dance, and the first subject of the finale likewise would be expected to bear his signature.

It is a work of interest chiefly for historical association. It holds no pregnant or engrossing musical thought or reveals no processes of technic or of orchestral evolution that may not be found in symphonies by Haydn, in pages of Mozart, although it lacks his exquisite grace and his pensive melancholy, or in what has been known heretofore as the first symphony of Beethoven.

The performance of it was not always fortunate. Mr Fiedler's hot pace in the first allegro was prohibitive of authority or clearness, even with this body of virtuosi. The clarity and beauty of the orchestra in Haydn is well known.

Mme Morena sang the "Fidelio" aria, the one of which Beethoven's note books were said to contain 18 different drafts, with dramatic feeling, and interpreted effectively in its openings[illegible] mood of abhorrence and in the calm[illegible] applauded in[illegible] heavy dramatic roles; [illegible] are [illegible]us to take

HERALD,

DECEMBER 30, 1911.

"JENA" HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Boston Symphony Orchestra Performs Musical Work New to This Country.

ITS COMPOSER IN DOUBT

Supposed to Have Been Written by Beethoven Between 1787 and 1790.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House and the Munich Court and National Theatre was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"...Mozart
"Jena" Symphony in C minor...Beethoven (?)
Scene and aria from "Fidelio"...Beethoven
Suite for orchestra op. 9...Enesco
Finale of "Geotterdaemmerung"...Wagner

The "Jena" symphony was performed for the first time in this country. The parts were discovered some years ago by Prof. Fritz Stein of Jena, who was rummaging in the archive room of the university's music department. The portfolio that inclosed these parts bore the inscription "Sinfonie par. L. van Beethoven," and on two of the parts the composer's name was written. Prof. Stein, who is a firm believer in the authorship of Beethoven, arranged the score from the parts, and the symphony was played at Jena on Jan. 17, 1910. It has been performed in other cities, as Leipsic and Munich.

Prof. Stein has written a long and elaborate study of the work. He concludes that the symphony was composed by Beethoven at Bonn some time between 1787 and 1790; that Beethoven sent it to an acquaintance at Jena. It may have been performed there at one of the "Akademischen Konzerte."

It should be said that certain critics in Germany, having examined the symphony and heard it, do not share Prof. Stein's opinion. They speak of the danger of using old parts as the basis of a hypothesis; they fail to find any hints at the later Beethoven; they believe that the symphony was composed by some minor composer who followed in the steps of Hadyn.

It was natural that Mr. Fiedler should produce the symphony in Boston, for there was a mild curiosity concerning the nature of the work. It would be unnatural, inhuman in any one to ask for a second performance. For, apart from the question of authorship, the music is not interesting. There is an amiable arrangement of notes, after the manner of Hadyn in his weakest and most perfunctory mood, but without any exhibition of Haydn's technical skill. There are a few echoes of Mozart in the finale. Nowhere in the whole symphony is there a hint at the Beethoven of the first symphony which was brought out at Vienna in 1800.

Let us supose that the "Jena" Symphony was composed sometime between 1787 and 1790. Both Mozart and Haydn had written far better symphonies than this, before 1787. The three great symphonies of Mozart were composed a year later. Haydn's delightful Paris symphonies were written between 1784 and 1788. It is not easy to think that either one of these composers wrote the "Jena," with its childish prattle. In their lesser symphonic works preceding there is the promise of what was to come. Where in the "Jena" symphony is there anything that points to the first acknowledged symphony of Beethoven? It is not at all unlikely that the "Jena" was composed by some industrious and forgotten Herr Schuster or Herr Mueller, an admirer of Haydn and Mozart.

The suite by the Roumanian, who, studying in Vienna, suffered for some time from Brahmsitis and then made Paris his dwelling place, where a little chapel was built for him and maintained through the pious interest of the Princess Bibesco, was performed here last spring toward the end of the season. In spite of Enesco's early devotion to Brahms and his association with Gabriel Faure, there is a certain individuality of expression in the suite, more pronounced than in his other works that we have heard, yet not commanding. The first movement is chiefly in unison for the strings, a unison of monotony. The chief theme of the minuet that follows is clumsily announced, and if this awkwardness were deliberate in the attempt to gain antique flavor, the result is disagreeable; but the development of the theme is unusual, harmonically and by reason of the pale coloring.

There are charming effects in this movement, also in the Intermede. The finale with its ground bass is somewhat exotic in tonality. The Suite as a whole is a singular one in the blend of archaic thought and modern expression. The performance technically was not up to the high standard of the orchestra. More than once there was uncertainty in the unison movement, and later there were disconcerting slips.

Mme. Morena was pleasantly remembered here as Sieglinde at the Boston Theatre nearly four years ago. She sang at a Symphony concert a year afterward. A singer is not often the best judge of her capability and her limitations. Too many lyric sopranos wish to [illegible]

Mme. Morena has a fine voice of lyric quality. She sings much better than the great majority of her sisters in German opera, far better than the majority of the French and Italian singers who have been imported of late years. Her choice of [illegible] as yesterday was not favorable to her. She lacks the tragic breadth and intensity demanded for the full expression of Leonora's and Bruennhilde's emotions. As an exhibition of pure, free, tasteful singing, her performance gave pleasure. In the storm and fury of Wagner's music, she did not yield to temptation; she did not shriek; she accepted her lot and was a comparatively minor instrument in a boisterous ensemble.

The program of [illegible] concerts next week will be as follows: Bruckner, symphony in E major, No. 7; Chopin, concerto in F minor, No. 2, for the piano; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 28, 1911

NEW BEETHOVEN?

THE EARLY SYMPHONY RECENTLY FOUND

The Discovery at Jena—The Performance Here Tomorrow—The Discoverer's Ingenious Pamphlet Describing the Music and Defending Its Authenticity—His Arguments and Their Value

THE authenticity of the newly discovered symphony, supposed to be by Beethoven, which the Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow and the day after, is discussed with exhaustive eagerness by Fritz Stein* in a forty-six page pamphlet. The text proves conclusively that Beethoven may possibly have had something to do with the work, and if this seems somewhat indefinite, let it be remembered that many a controversial treatise accomplishes much less. The pamphlet is not without "human interest," for it shows tender and confiding traits in the character of Mr. Stein.

Mr. Stein first points out that very few orchestral compositions are to be found among the works of Beethoven's "first period," so called, and he suggests that Beethoven very probably wrote more in this style than he suffered to be published—a reasonable possibility, since every conscientious artist destroys fully as much as he preserves. The question then arises, did Beethoven write a symphony, in whole or in part, before the one commonly called his first? Mr. Stein points out that plans for symphonies, other than the familiar nine, are to be found in Beethoven's early notebooks, and he cheerfully disposes of the somewhat uncomfortable objection that no sketches for this particular symphony are to be found in existent Beethoven notebooks, by pointing out that probably not all of the composer's notebooks have been preserved, and that no sketches have been found for one or two Beethoven works whose authorship is unquestioned.

The documentary evidence quoted by Mr. Stein is as follows: Instrumental parts to the symphony in question were found by Mr. Stein in the library of music at Jena, among the parts for a number of miscellaneous compositions by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Romberg, and others. The second violin part bears an inscription, "Par Louis van Beethoven," the 'cello part, "Symphonie von Bethoven" (sic); the watermark in the paper has been found elsewhere only in the wind parts of a symphony by Friedrich Witt, a contemporary and associate of Beethoven's. The cover containing the parts is labelled "Sinfonie par L. van Beethoven?", and the word "Beethoven" is struck out with a lead pencil. Mr. Stein points out that a deliberate forger would have introduced the name Beethoven oftener, which is a reasonable contention; thence he wildly jumps to the conclusion that the signature must be authentic. It does not seem to occur to Mr. Stein that the inscriptions, which are of course not in Beethoven's hand, may have been placed on these parts, not by the original copyist, but by some hasty cataloguer, or even by some practical joker. Moreover, the first violin part is marked as the possession of "F. W."; Mr. Stein immediately thinks of Beethoven's friend, Franz Wegeler—but why not that Friedrich Witt, a first violinist, be it remembered, whose symphony was copied on paper of the same watermark as this?

Mr. Stein quotes correspondence between Ludwig Fischenich and Frau von Schiller to show that Beethoven composed some works during this period which have not been preserved to us; but while a "Dies Iræ" is specifically mentioned, the new symphony is not. Moreover, Beethoven is not specifically mentioned by either correspondent in Mr. Stein's quotations, though the "young man whom the elector has sent to Haydn in Vienna" and who "will set Schiller's 'Ode to Joy'" is presumably Beethoven.

A thematic analysis of the work follows, from which I must confess the work does not give promise of being especially stimulating in performance. Then Mr. Stein devotes seventeen pages to proving that the style is Beethoven's by citations from the work. The melodies and harmonies, according to Mr. Stein, are characteristic of Beethoven in his early works; granting this cheerfully, I find them none the less characteristic of any other facile composer of the period, for Beethoven had at this time not parted company with his contemporaries; this bit of evidence is therefore suggestive rather than conclusive. Long passages which practically quote similar passages in familiar works by Beethoven seem greatly to impress Mr. Stein; but such

In summing up, Mr. Stein resorts to a familiar form of argument; if Beethoven did not write this symphony, who did? The question, apart from its poor quality as argument, is not so hopeless as Mr. Stein seems to think. According to Mr. Stein, the nameless author would have to be a contemporary of Beethoven familiar with his style; and he dismisses the case by pointing out that Beethoven at the period when this symphony was composed was not sufficiently well known either to have imitators or to be a name by which a forger could conjure filthy lucre from the pockets of obdurate publishers. Very good; yet why could not this same Friedrich Witt, for instance, who knew Beethoven's work and was composing music at this time, have written a symphony in which he consciously or unconsciously imitated his more individual contemporary? I am not for an instant advancing the theory that Witt and not Beethoven composed the Jena symphony. I merely point out that the style of the work is not conclusive; that the original score is lost, leaving only a number of anonymous parts in a copyist's hand; that while the name "Beethoven" appears on two parts, the initials "F. W." and the watermark of the paper used by Witt's copyist also appear; that the inscription on the cover in which the parts were found is evidently the opinion, perhaps hasty, of a library official, and that the erasure shows that some later person having access to the manuscripts disagrees with him.

On the whole Mr. Stein cannot be said to have proved anything except that Beethoven possibly wrote this symphony; but equally possibly, Witt or even some third person wrote it. The work itself is fifth-rate; and the recording angel will have to credit Mr. Stein, if not with establishing his theory, at least with investing with a sentimental and controversial interest a work which could never under any circumstances have interested the public on its own merits.

P. G. C.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND ITS HARP

The Insistent Question of One Harp or Two—The Dancers, Their Skirts and "Coppelia"—Mme. Tetrazzini and Mr. Constantino in "Lucia" at the Metropolitan—Mme. Maeterlinck Disembarks—Rostand's Sonnets to Massenet—Berlin and Municipal Music—Items as They Pass

ONCE more Mr. Fiedler has shifted the position of the harp in the Symphony Orchestra. It has gone from the side of the first violins, next the edge of the stage, and it stands now more obscurely near the violoncellos in the body of the orchestra. Any such change catches the eye at the Symphony Concerts, where orchestra and audience are weekly habituated to each other; but these frequent shiftings of the harp also indicate the conductor's occasional preoccupation with it. Does Mr. Fiedler shift it, as he has more than once, in the hope that it may sound more effectively and characteristically in the tonal mass? If he does, there is reason for his preoccupation. The Symphony Orchestra is one of the very few bands of its numbers and rank, either in Europe or in America, that regularly employs only one harp. It has two on occasion when the score imperatively requires them, but sometimes when the composer wishes, but does not exact, two, like Debussy in "Iberia," it disregards his desires.

When a particular piece asks two harps, as much contemporary music does, other orchestras have them in regular service. When the piece calls for a single harp, as much of the music of the nineteenth century does, these orchestras double the harp part and thereby make its voice clearer and more significant. The orchestra at the Opera House, which is by no means so large or sonorous as the Symphony Orchestra, employs two harps this season and the gain in intensive tone is obvious and commendable. It is not fair to reproach Mr. Schuecker, who is an able harpist for the relative insignificance of the harp in many a concert at Symphony Hall. The simple truth is that two harps are necessary to such a tonal mass, if the voice of the harp is to have its proportional place in it. Moreover, contemporary composers, who are sensitive and adept with harp tone, will more and more exact them. Very seldom does the Symphony Orchestra so lag behind the orchestral times—and its own necessities. Small economies, at the cost of exact and effective performance, have not usually been its way.

H. T. P.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

By special arrangement Josef Hofman has come to America this winter to play at a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and incidentally give one or two recitals, one of which will be in New York. His appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are set for the next pair of concerts on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. At the Thursday evening concert he will play Rubinstein's seldom heard Concerto in G major, No. 3. On Saturday afternoon he will play Chopin's Concerto in F minor, No. 2.

Conductor Fiedler's principal offerings will be, on Thursday night, Debussy's "Iberia" and Cesar Frank's Symphony in D minor, and on Saturday afternoon the only work in the least novel will be Enesco's Suite Op. 9.

884

[103]

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 30 1911

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 12, will gain particular interest through the fact that Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. Following its policy of relying in the course of a season on only a few soloists and to have them of the very highest class the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enabled to offer artists exceptional advantages in the way of a series of engagements and thus is able to secure many that never appear with other orchestras. This year, for example, Josef Hofmann, who by all odds is the greatest of the younger pianists, comes to America for the sole purpose of playing a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, for the time being, has entire and exclusive command of his time. It has consented to one recital in New York and one in Boston. Mr. Hofmann arrived in America shortly before Christmas and has been spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date DEC 30 1911

Josef Hofmann, the pianoforte virtuoso, who has come to America this season to appear in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, incidentally, to give one or two recitals, one of which will be in New York, will be heard in Rubinstein's now seldom performed G-major concerto, No. 3, at the concert of the Boston Orchestra, Thursday evening, January 11, in Carnegie Music Hall. At the matinee concert on the Saturday afternoon following, he will essay Chopin's F-minor concerto, No. 2. He will be the soloist, also, in the Brooklyn concert, Friday evening, January 12.

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 31 1911

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 12, has particular interest because Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and also because this is to be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. Following its policy of relying on a few soloists of the very highest class, the Boston Symphony Orchestra can offer to artists exceptional advantages through a series of engagements. Hence, it is able to secure many who never appear with other orchestras. This year, for example, Josef Hofmann, who by all odds is the greatest of the younger pianists, comes to America for the sole purpose of playing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, for the time being, has entire and exclusive command of his time. It has consented to one recital in New York and one in Boston. Mr. Hofmann arrived in America shortly before Christmas and has been spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C. He was one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony last season, and he made an extraordinary impression on those who heard him. The promise of his precocious youth has been fulfilled and today he stands with Paderewski as one of the greatest pianists the world has ever known and it seems as though he will be Paderewski's successor.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address NEW YORK CITY DEC 31 1911

Date

...Herbert

By special arrangement Josef Hofmann has come to America this winter to play at a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and incidentally give recitals, one of which will be in New York. His appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are set for the next pair of concerts on Thursday evening January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. At the Thursday evening concert he will play Rubinstein's seldom heard concerto in G major, No. 3. On Saturday afternoon he will play Chopin's concerto in F minor, No. 2. Mr. Fiedler's principal offerings will be on Thursday night, Debussy's "Iberia" and César Frank's symphony in D minor, and on Saturday afternoon the only work in the least novel will be Enesco's suite, op. 9.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date DEC 30 1911

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give its third concert at the Academy of Music, one week from next Monday evening, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. This, it is announced, will be Mr. Hofmann's only appearance in Philadelphia this season.

From INQUIRER,

Address PHILADELPHIA,

Date DEC 31 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, January 8, gains very particular interest through the fact that Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. Following its well-established policy of relying in the course of a season on comparatively few soloists and on only the best of these available, with its large number of concerts in important cities outside of Boston, it can offer artists exceptional advantages in the way of a series of engagements and thus is able to secure many exclusively.

Hofmann was one of last year's soloists with the Boston Symphony in Philadelphia and his appearance at that time was one of the sensations of the season. He has fulfilled all the promise of his precocious youth and at least is second only to Paderewski among the pianists of our time.

From JOURNAL

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date DEC 31 1911

TWO concerts will attract the attention of local music lovers this week. They are the third Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, this organization, as has been customary for a number of seasons, furnishing the first musical offering of the new [illegible] and the recital Ludwig Hess in the Students' Course Friday evening in Memorial Hall.

To-morrow tickets will go on sale at Steinert's for the concert by Mme. Tetrazzini in Infantry Hall Jan. 16, while on Wednesday the sale of seats for the first Kneisel Quartet concert, Jan. 10, will open in the lobby of the Journal building. The quartet will give only two concerts here this season, the second being March 20. The membership of the quartet is unchanged from previous years.

From

Address HARTFORD, CONN. JAN 1 1912

Date

performances.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The climax of the local musical season will be reached Monday evening, January 15, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Parson's Theater with Harold Bauer as soloist, for the grand concert of the series of three.

Mr. Bauer is received everywhere as one of the great pianists of all times, and is meeting with the greatest successes of his career during the present season. It is nearly three years since this artist last appeared in Hartford and his return will be welcomed. The seat sale opens at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store on Saturday.

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 30 1911

By special arrangement Josef Hofmann has come to America this winter to play at a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, incidentally, to give one or two recitals, one of which will occur in New York. His appearances with the Boson Symphony Orchestra in New York are set for the next pair of concerts, Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. At the Thursday evening concert he will play Rubinstein's seldom heard concerto in C major, No. 3. On Saturday afternoon he will play Chopin's concerto in F Minor, No. 2. The orchestral numbers announced for Thursday night are Debussy's "Iberia" and Ceesar Franck's symphony in D minor. On Saturday afternoon the only work in the least novel will be Enesco's suite Op. 9.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date DEC 31 1911

Josef Hoffman will be the soloist Jan. 12, at the Philharmonic Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City. DEC 30 1911

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next pair of concerts in New York Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. Josef Hofman will be the soloist.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date 1911

THE LATEST MUSIC GOSSIP

Josef Hofmann, the eminent pianist, will make his only appearance in Philadelphia this year at the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, at 8.15. Mr. Hofmann comes to America this season for the sole purpose of filling a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aside from his appearances with the orchestra he will give one pianoforte recital in New York and one in Boston. After filling these engagements early in January he will spend the rest of the Winter at his country home at Aiken, S. C.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC 31 1911

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 12, will gain particular interest through the fact that Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. Following its policy of relying in the course of a season on only a few soloists, and to have them of the very highest class, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enabled to offer artists exceptional advantages in the way of a series of engagements and thus is able to secure many that never appear with other orchestras. This year, for example, Josef Hofmann, who, by all odds, is the greatest of the younger pianists, comes to America for the sole purpose of playing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, for the time being, has entire and exclusive command of his time. It has consented to one recital in New York and one in Boston. Mr. Hofmann arrived in America shortly before Christmas and has beenu spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C. Hofmann was one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony last season and he made a most extraordinary impression. All the promise of his precocious youth has been fulfilled, and to-day he stands with Paderewski as one of the greatest pianists the world has ever known.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date DEC 3

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, at 8:15, gains very particular interest through the fact that Josef Hofman will be the soloist, and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probaly for several seasons to come. Following its well-established policy of relying in the course of a season on comparatively few soloists, and on only the best of these available, with its large number of concerts in important cities outside of Boston, it can offer artists exceptional advantages in the way of a series of engagements and thus is able to secure many exclusively. This year, for example, Josef Hofmann, who is by all odds the greatest of the younger generation of pianists, has come to America for the sole purpose of playing a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for the time being has entire and exclusive command of his time. The management has consented willingly to his request to give a recital in New York and another in Boston, and to his taking part in a memorial concert in New York. He arrived just before Christmas and has been spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C.

Hofmann was one of last year's soloists with the Boston Symphony in Philadelphia and his appearance at that time was one of the sensations of the season. He has fulfiled all the promise of his precocious youth.

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date DEC 31 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

By special arrangement Josef Hofmann has come to America this winter to play at a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, incidentally, to give one or two recitals, one of which will be in New York. His appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are set for the next pair of concerts, on Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. At the Thursday evening concert he will play Rubinstein's seldom heard concerto in G major, No. 3. On Saturday afternoon he will play Chopin's concerto in F minor, No. 2.

Mr. Fiedler's principal offerings will be, on Thursday night, Debussy's "Iberia" and César Franck's symphony in D minor, and on Saturday afternoon the only work in the least novel will be Enesco's suite, Op. 9.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From AMERICA

Address BALTIMORE.

Hofmann to Play Chopin Work.

Josef Hofmann, whose only appearance in Baltimore during the course of the present season will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Wednesday evening, will play Chopin's concerto in F minor.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of seats for the third Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street, Saturday morning. The soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond, one of the most distinguished American singers of the day. She will sing two numbers, Chadwick's "Aghadoe," an Irish ballad composed for and dedicated to her, and an aria from Debussy's "Azael Recitative" from "The Prodigal Son." The symphony will be Franck's in D-minor.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL

Address

Date

... Montreal and other Northern cities.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry Hall, with Lilla Ormond, mezzo-soprano, as solcist.

Established: London,

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date JAN 3 - 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert takes place in Infantry Hall this evening. The programme is as follows: Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21, Mendelssohn; Symphony in D-Minor, Franck; "Aghadoe," Irish ballade for contralto solo and orchestra, Chadwick; prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; Azael's recitative "These Joyous Airs" and aria "O Time That is No More," from the lyric scene, "The Prodigal Son," Debussy; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in Rondo form, Op. 28, Strauss. The soloist is Miss Lilla Ormond.

[104]

From ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address .....

Date .....

The programme that Conductor Max Fiedler has prepared for the Boston Symphony concert Tuesday presents plenty of varieties and contrast. Unusual in a symphony concert, it contains six numbers, none of which is of great length. The orchestral part comprises

Esta

Lilla Ormond.
Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Cesar Franck's symphony in D-minor, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The Cesar Franck symphony in D-minor will be heard in Providence for the first time. It was first performed in 1889 and had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1899.

While not an epoch-making work in the use of some of the compositions of Debussy, Franck's Symphony is regarded by many as the most beautiful music that has yet come from France. Franck, although a Belgian by birth, spent the greater part of his life in Paris, and is recognized among the French composers. The work is one with which Conductor Fiedler has had much success, and it shows off to great advantage the tonal qualities of the orchestra.

Debussy, whose prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" is on the programme, is one of the musical sensations of France. Although he has taken many hints from his master, he has gone far beyond him. His "Afternoon of a Faun" is taken from the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme and is a bit of rustic poetry in which the flute must be regarded as solo instrument. It is one of Debussy's earlier works and the ideas in it are not so elusive as in many of his later compositions.

The soloist, Miss Lilla Ormond, has many admirers in Providence, who will be glad to welcome her again. Her two numbers will comprise Chadwick's Irish ballad "Aghadoe," which was written for her and dedicated to her, and "Azael's Recitative" and "Aria" from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

* * *

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From .....

Address ..... NEW YORK CITY

Date ..... DEC 31 1911

Two interesting artists who will be heard in joint recital next month at the New Amsterdam Theatre are Anton Witek, first master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the world's greatest violin virtuosos, and Vita Witek, a Berlin pianist.

Establis

From ..... N. Y. AMERICA

Address .....

Date ..... DEC 31 1911

Established: I

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

By special arrangement, Josef Hofmann has come to America this Winter to play at a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, incidentally, to give one or two recitals, one of which will be in New York. His appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are set for the next pair of concerts on Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. At the Thursday evening concert he will play Rubinstein's seldom-heard concerto in G major, No. 3. On Saturday afternoon he will play Chopin's Concerto in F minor, No. 2. Mr. Fiedler's principal offerings will be on Thursday night, Debussy's "Iberia" and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. On Saturday afternoon the only work in the least novel will be Enesco's Suite, Op. 9.

ork, 188

From ..... RECORD,

Address ..... Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ..... DEC 31 1911

Establ

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening, January 8, gains interest through the fact that Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. This year Hofmann has come to America for the sole purpose of playing a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The management has consented to his request to give a recital in New York, and of another in Boston, and to his taking part in a memorial concert in New York. He arrived just before Christmas and has been spending the holidays on his estate in Aiken, S. C.

* * *

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ..... PRESS PRESS

Address .....

Date ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Esta

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which will be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, January 8, gains very particular interest through the fact that Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. Following its well-established policy of relying in the course of a season on comparatively few soloists and on only the best of these available, with its large number of concerts in important cities outside of Boston, it can offer artists exceptional advantages in the way of a series of engagements and thus is able to secure many exclusively. This year, for example, Josef Hofmann, who is by all odds the greatest of the younger generation of pianists, has come to America for the sole purpose of playing a series of engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for the time being has entire and exclusive command of his time. The management has consented willingly to his request to give a recital in New York and to another in Boston, and to his taking part in a memorial concert in New York. He arrived just before Christmas, and has been spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C.

* * *

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ..... JOURNAL

Address ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date .....

Establ

The "Jena" symphony in Cruinor, attributed to Beethoven, was performed for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. Its parts were discovered some years ago by Prof. Fritz Stein of Jena, who was rummaging in the archive room of the university's music department. The portfolio that inclosed these parts bore the inscription "Sinfonie par. L. van Beethoven," and on two of the parts the composers name was written. Prof. Stein, who is a firm believer in the authorship of Beethoven, arranged the score from the parts, and the symphony was played at Jena on Jan. 17, 1910. It has been performed in other cities, as Leipsic and Munich.

"It was natural that Mr. Fiedler should produce the symphony in Boston, for there was a mild curiosity concerning the nature of the work," writes Philip Hale in the Boston Herald. "It would be unnatural, inhuman in any one to ask for a second performance. For, apart from the question of authorship, the music is not interesting. There is an amiable arrangement of notes, after the manner of Haydn in his weakest and most perfunctory mood, but without any exhibition of Haydn's technical skill. There are a few echoes of Mozart in the finale. Nowhere in the whole symphony is there a hint at the Beethoven of the first symphony which was brought out at Vienna in 1800."

* * *

From ..... EVENING SUN.

Address ..... Baltimore, Md.

Date .....

UNEARTHED WORK OF BEETHOVEN PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Renders "Jena Symphony" At Home Concert.

A newly discovered symphony by Beethoven was given for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its home concert last week. Mr. Fiedler took considerable care in the performance of this recently unearthed work, and as it is attributed to the greatest of symphonic writers, there was a spirit of reverential acceptance on the part of the listeners.

The manuscript of the symphony was discovered in the university library in Jena early in the year just ended, hence it is called the "Jena Symphony." Prof. Fritz Stein, in an elaborate essay which was published in the Quarterly Magazine of the International Music Society October-December, 1911, tells of the finding of this work in the archive chamber of the College of Music, Jena, and states that the various parts and sections of the manuscript bore the inscription "Sinfonie par L. van Beethoven." On some of the parts the name of Beethoven has been canceled with a pencil mark. Therefore the significance of the inscription has been hotly disputed. It is well known that Beethoven in his early youth (1794-1795) had begun sketching a symphony, but abandoned the task and shortly thereafter composed his first symphony in C major, opus 21, which was performed for the first time in Vienna April 12, 1800.

Authenticity Doubted.

Critical opinion as to the authenticity of the "Jena Symphony" is divided, for those who have had opportunity of examining the score in Europe seem to find little that firmly establishes the hand of Beethoven throughout these pages. The reviewer for THE EVENING SUN heard this first American performance, and while the supposed Beethoven score had a decidedly comforting effect in its simple structure it, as a whole, seemed more like a work of Haydn in its charm and spirit. The naive melodies which constitute the thematic matter of the first movement show but few traces of the master who molded the celebrated nine, for the style of this youthful symphony is by no means a forerunner of the "Eroica," the "Pastoral" or the "Choral Symphony."

Yet there are slight traces in the writing that can be attributed only to Beethoven. There are certain harmonic sequences and peculiar countrapuntal treatment which the later works of Beethoven hold in rich abundance. The adagio of this symphony is again in the spirit of Haydn and so is the minuet, which could in fact be labeled as a movement from one of the celebrated Haydn String Quartets. But in the last allegro there is an individual stroke—namely, a bit of choral-like writing for the woodwind against passage work in the strings—which produces a delightfully interesting moment.

Audience Impressed.

The Boston audience was impressed with Mr. Fiedler's presentation, which as a piece of orchestral directing was refined and noble in conception. As a curious novelty the "Jena Symphony" will form part of a program, but whether the work will become associated among the nine symphonies of Beethoven, which have gladdened the civilized races and have ennobled mankind with their uplift, is a point that depends upon the present evolutionary tendencies of gigantic orchestral conception.

If we are advancing toward complexity, this addition to the Beethoven literature will leave no lasting impress; but, on the other hand, if musical art is seeking a level of quiet simplicity after the apparent chaos of ultra-modernism, the "Jena Symphony" may have been discovered at a fateful moment and form a valuable link in the re-establishing of the former classical style of musical composition. This, however, must remain a conjecture which time alone will properly solve. F. C. B.

POST,

DECEMBER 31, 1911

Hofmann's Recital

Josef Hofman, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming week, is announced to give a recital in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 20. Full details will be made known in due time.

Symphony Concerts

Josef Hofmann is the next soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at its 12th public rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This year he has elected to play Chopin's Concerto in F minor, No. 2. The Bruckner seventh symphony in E-flat major, will open the concert. The last number will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

GLOBE-

DECEMBER 31, 1911.

Josef Hofmann, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, is announced to give a recital in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Jan 20.

[165]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau TRIBUNE

From .....

Address .....

Date ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

LILLA ORMOND.
Soloist at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening.

Local Concert Events Announced

Symphony Orchestra Tuesday Evening and Ludwig Hess in Students' Course Friday. Madame Tetrazzini to Sing at Infantry Hall Later in the Month.

CONDUCTOR MAX FIEDLER has arranged another fascinating programme for the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which is to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Jan. 2. The programme begins with the ever-delightful overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn. This work has long since joined the immortals in music and it is all the more extraordinary when one remembers that Mendelssohn was but 17 years old when he wrote it. It has been said with much surety that he never quite touched this work again in all the music that followed.

This will be followed by Cesar Franck's superb symphony in D-minor. Franck, a Belgian by birth, a Frenchman by choice, is one of the most notable figures in the history of French music. All the French musicians of to-day who have made their mark were either pupils of his or studied with his pupils. An extraordinary man, he not only had vast erudition to give to his music, but wonderful imaginative fancy.

His Symphony in D-minor, when it was first played in this country a matter of 20 years ago, was thought to be very abstruse. As a matter of fact, it is one of the most brilliant musical works in the literature of symphonic music and in nothing has Mr. Fiedler had greater success. The other two orchestral numbers will be Debussy's exquisite Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Strauss's jovial rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond, one of the most eminent of our American mezzo-sopranos. Her two numbers will be Chadwick's "Aghadoe," an Irish ballad for contralto solo and orchestra, and Aria from Debussy's "Azel's Recitative" from the "Prodigal Son." The Chadwick piece is a setting to John Todhunter's well-known poem and he has written it principally for Miss Ormond and dedicated it to her.

JOURNAL-

JANUARY 4, 1912.

The soloist at this week's Symphony concerts is Josef Hofmann, who will play the Chopin F minor concerto. The symphony will be Bruckner's seventh. The final number will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Josef Hofmann This Week's Symphony Soloist

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at its 12th public rehearsal and concert this week. Hofmann arrived in New York just before Christmas and went to his home in Aiken, S C, to spend the holidays.

When he was here a year ago, Mr Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, made a contract with him whereby Mr Hofmann was to return to America this Winter and give his exclusive services to a series of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston and other cities. It was agreed that he should give one recital in Boston and one in New York.

This week he will play Chopin's F minor piano concerto, No. 2. There will be but three numbers on the program, Bruckner's seventh symphony will lead

GLOBE—JANUARY 7, 1912

Distinguished Soloists Will Be Heard at the Cecilia Concerts—Recitals by Wilhelm Bachaus, Elena Gerhardt and Harold Bauer—Flonzaley and Kneisel Quartets.

EMILIO DE GOGORZA

There is no choral work more popular with the Boston audiences than Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which the Cecilia Society is to give at its first concert in Symphony Hall Thursday evening, Jan 5. More than ordinary interest will be attached to this work inasmuch as it will be the first concert of the society under its new conductor, Mr Arthur Mees.

Rehearsing has been going on during the past weeks with unwonted enthusiasm. The ranks of the society have been largely recruited and many of the older members, who had given up active participation in recent years, have returned.

The artists engaged for this performance are Miss Alice Nielson of the Boston and Metropolitan Opera Companies, who will sing the part of Marguerite; George Hamlin, who will sing Faust; Herbert Witherspoon, who will sing Mephistopheles, and L. B. Merrill, who will sing the song allotted to Brander. The orchestra will be composed of Symphony players.

Under the new arrangement only two concerts will be given by the society, this first concert and then an "a Capella" concert, which falls on Thursday evening, March 21. The assisting artists at this concert will be Mme Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza. The principal works will be the "Motet," by Bach; a chorus in eight parts, by Cornelius; "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," Verdi, and Loeffler's chorus, "For One Who Fell in Battle." There will be lighter part songs and solo numbers. The season sale is now in progress at Symphony Hall.

AMERICAN.

JANUARY 7, 1912

CECILIA CONCERT JAN. 25.

Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" Will Be Produced.

There is no choral work more popular with the Boston audiences than Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which the Cecilia Society is to give at its first concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening January 25. More than ordinary interest will be attached to this concert, inasmuch as it will be the first concert of the society under its new conductor, Arthur Mees. The work of rehearsing has been going on during the past weeks with unwonted enthusiasm.

The ranks of the society have been largely recruited and many of the older members of the society who had given up active participation in recent years have returned.

Mr. Mees has, to say the least, made a favorable impression in the rehearsals and it is expected that under his leadership the society will get decidedly a new lease of life.

The artists who have been engaged for this performance are Miss Alice Nielsen of the Boston and Metropolitan Opera companies, who will sing the part of Marguerite; George Hamlin, who will sing Faust; Herbert Witherspoon, who will sing Mephistopheles, and L. B. Merrill, who will sing the song allotted to Brander. The orchestra will be composed of Symphony players.

Under the new arrangement only two concerts will be given by the society, this first concert, and then an "a Capella" concert, which falls on Thursday evening, March 21. The assisting artists at this concert will be Madame Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza, both of them great favorites with the Boston public. The principal works will be the "Motet" by Bach; chorus in eight parts by Cornelius; "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," by Verdi, and Loeffler's chorus "For One Who Fell in Battle." There will be lighter part songs and, of course, sole numbers. The season sale is now in progress at Symphony Hall.

Mardones, who will interpret an aria from "Simon Boccanegra," by Verdi.

The opera in oratorio form chosen for the evening will be "Pagliacci," of which the prologue and first act will be given, with Edith Barnes and Messrs Gaudenzi, Polese, Barreau, Giaccone and Huddy and the full chorus of the Boston Opera Company.

The orchestra selection will be the overture to "Mignon."

The list of operas for the week is as follows:

Tomorrow evening, "Faust," with Mmes Brozia, D'Olige, Leveroni and Messrs Zenatello (first time here as Faust), Rothier and Barreau (first time here as Valentine), Charles Stron, conductor (first time here).

Wednesday, "Pelleas and Melesande," with the cast as given above.

Friday, "Lucia," with Mme Tetrazzini, Messrs Constantino and PoJese.

Saturday matinee, "Pelleas and Melesande," with the cast as given above.

Saturday evening, at popular prices, "Rigoletto," with Misses Scotney, Leveroni, Messrs Constantino, Polese and Mardones.

Symphony Orchestra Traveling.

The Symphony Orchestra is away this week on its third Southern trip. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist for the entire week. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In New York Mr Fiedler will play the Franck symphony and the Haydn; also, on Thursday evening, the "Iberia" of Debussy. Mr Hofmann will play the Chopin F minor concerto which he played here and the seldom-heard Rubinstein concerto in G major No. 3

MONITOR,

JANUARY 6, 1912

HOFMANN WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, presented twelfth program in Symphony hall today afternoon, with Josef Hofmann, pianist, assisting in a Chopin concerto. The program counts as one of the important of Mr. Fiedler's efforts of the year, since it contained a symphony by a composer of the heaviest technical demand, Anton Bruckner. There was warm applause for Mr. Hofmann's playing of the concerto and for Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony, though it was not a day when the tide of enthusiasm was at high run. The program was as follows: Bruckner, symphony in E major, No. 7; Chopin, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, No. 2, op. 21; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Hofmann came bringing the Chopin message; and that is so different from the Rubinstein message which he brought last year, that the listener was half inclined to the opinion that the pianist had remodeled his style of playing. But of course he is the same Hofmann. You recognize him by the vigorous way he leads into his music, by the emphasis which he puts on the beginnings of his sentences, by the power he has to keep you intent on his thought until his paragraphs are completed. You recognize him because everything he says is so clear. His crystalline thinking is incomparable with anything you ever observed in other players. No, Mr. Hofmann's interpretation is just exactly what it was before. There is a change of composers, that is all.

Concerto was never better under the control of soloist than the Chopin F minor concerto is under the control of Mr. Hofmann. There seems to be no such thing as a problem of technique about it, nor any mechanical question whatever for the listener to consider. Neither is there any pleading for a new theory of interpretation. Nor yet is there apologetic presentation of conservative formulas. The music is read with perfect balance of motives. Composer is there and there as of his period, yet the playing is not a study in the history of romantic music. The player is there an artist possessing the latest musical ideas of the day and sympathizing with them. In fact a poet of clear vision is before you telling you one moment about the present day, the next putting today in its relation with the past, and the next indicating what men of tomorrow will turn their attention to. A man in command of himself temperamentally, a man who can put together all tenable views of music into well-proportional statement, is speaking in America to the great enlightenment of such citizens of artistic inclinations as can hear him.

The old way to discuss pianists is to describe their accomplishments in tone and execution, and to place above the rest of the field that artist who can win the praise of the most adjectives, high of color and lively of motion. If Mr. Hofmann is discussed in this way, he will win about everything from the flattering section of the critic's vocabulary. Beckmesser, after listening, comes out from behind his curtain, and behold! not a mark on his slate against Josef Hofmann. Perhaps it is to the applause of the man that, thinking clearly, he runs down his scales, single or double, with every note perfectly etched; no doubt it is to his applause that he can declare the upper melodies of Chopin with a sparkling elocution that is his and nobody else's. But these things seem only the necessary consequences of his art, not the art itself.

A reading of great nobility Mr. Fiedler and his men gave to the Bruckner symphony. All that is characteristic of the genius of this composer comes out strikingly under Mr. Fiedler's conducting. The Brucknerian writing displays the Symphony conductor's specialties of interpretive method better even than the Straussian scoring. To Bruckner the orchestra is an assemblage of strings and brass players, with wood-wind players assisting. And to Mr. Fiedler it is practically the same thing. Scarcely anywhere in the seventh symphony does Bruckner put his choirs in the relation of three equal contributing elements. And the idea of a wood-wind aristocracy has no place whatever in his tonal commonwealth.

With strings Bruckner cannot do all the feats of expression which composers have done with them, but he can do all that produce the profound effects. A symphony starting off with the impressiveness of his 'cello statement of first theme is not often heard. When Bruckner is sure of himself, he is absolutely sure; and he knew what he wanted to say when he wrote these measures. With brass Bruckner is even more facile and powerful than with strings. If Wagner showed him how to make the right hand side of the orchestra effectively express itself, he needed no more than an indication. His treatment of trombones and tubas and the allied instruments is his own and marks him out from all other symphony builders. A beautiful reading the men gave of the second movement, the scoring of which shows Bruckner inspired in subject and happily restrained in handling of his tone masses.

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date JAN 8 1912

Esta

The third pair of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Fiedler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each of them are works of the modern French school which have had but one hearing in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D major, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner. On Saturday afternoon the programme will comprise Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13; Chopin's F Minor Concerto No. 2, Enesco's Suite, opus 9, and three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"—"Minuet of the Will of the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy" March. The only work on the programme that has the savor of novelty is the Enesco suite, which was played in New York for the first time by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same concert in which Mahler presented Debussy's "Iberia."

From

Address

Date

Estabi

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, January 11, and next Saturday afternoon, January 13. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Mr. Feidler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each of them are works of the modern French school which have had but one hearing each in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner. The "Iberia" of Debussy is the second part of a series of compositions which he groups under the name of "Images." It was first played here by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Mahler on January 3 a year ago. Mr. Fiedler has had it on two different programmes in Boston since that time, and it has had a greater success there than any of Debussy's later works.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13, Chopin's F minor Concerto, No. 2, Enesco's Suite Opus 9, and the three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust," minuet of the "Will of the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and the Rakoczy March. The only work on this programme that has the savor of novelty is the Enesco Suite, which was first played in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same concert at which Mahler played the "Iberia." It was not played in Boston until last April, and Mr. Fiedler repeated it again a week ago.

From EAGLE,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 7 1912

Music Events in Brooklyn.

Esta

The third Boston Symphony concert is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 12, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. This is to be Mr. Hofmann's only appearance in Brooklyn this season. He is to play twice with the Symphony Orchestra in New York and to take part, later in the year, in a memorial concert which will be his only appearances with orchestra in Manhattan. He has been brought over here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, for this year, has exclusive command of his services. He will play here Chopin's "Concerto in F Minor for pianoforte and orchestra No. 2." Haydn's sparkling and gay "symphony in G Major, No. 3," is to lead the programme, and it is to be followed by the "Concerto." The second part of the programme comprises Enesco's "Suite," Opp. 9, and three familiar compositions from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," viz., "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March."

Enesco's name is new on Boston Symphony programmes here and it probably will be new to the majority of the musical public of Brooklyn. Enesco is a Roumanian and is thirty years old. He was a "boy prodigy," having taken first prizes for violin and harmony in the Vienna Conservatory when he was eleven years old, when he was a pupil of Joseph Hellmesberger, the elder. From Vienna he went to Paris, where he studied with Massenet, Faure and Marsick. There, in 1899, he won first prize for violin playing. He gave a concert of his works in Paris in 1897 and since that time he has been a notable figure in French music. The "Suite" which the Boston Symphony is to play here is in four movements, the first two being played without a break. The first is called a "Prelude in Unison," followed immediately by a slow "Minuet." Then comes an "Intermezzo" and the "Finale" is a wild Roumanian dance.

From RECORD,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date JAN 4 - 1912

Visit of Josef Hofmann.

The only opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear Josef Hofmann, the greatest of the younger generation of pianists this year will be at the third Boston Symphony concert which will be given at the Academy of Music next Monday night. Hofmann is in this country to play a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Philadelphia is one of the cities to be favored. He will play Rubinstein's seldom heard Concerto in G major, No. 3.

Estat

[106]

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13, respectively. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each of them are works of the modern French school which have had but one hearing each in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner. The "Iberia" of Debussy is the second part of a series of compositions which he groups under the name of "Images." It was first played here by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Mahler on January 3 a year ago. Mr. Fiedler has had it on two different programmes in Boston since that time, and it has had a greater success there than any of Debussy's later works.

MME. GADSKI.
(Copyright, Aimé Dupont.)

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Haydn's symphony in C major, No. 13; Chopin's F minor concerto, No. 2; Enesco's suite, Op. 9 and the three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will of the Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March. The only work on this programme that has the savor of novelty is the Enesco suite, which was first played in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same concert at which Mahler played the "Iberia." It was not played in Boston until last April, and Mr. Fiedler repeated it again a week ago.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and next Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, respectively. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," César Franck's symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" by Wagner. The "Iberia" of Debussy is the second part of a series of compositions which he groups under the name of "Images." It was first played here by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mahler on Jan. 3 a year ago. Director Fiedler has had it on two different programmes in Boston since that time and it has had a greater success there than any of Debussy's later works.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Haydn's symphony in G major No. 13, Chopin's F minor concerto No. 2, Enesco's suite, opus 9, and the three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will of the Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March. The only work on this programme that savors of novelty is the Enesco suite, which was first played in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same concert at which Mahler played the "Iberia."

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will have as soloist Josef Hofmann, who will play a Rubinstein concerto on Thursday evening and Chopin's F minor concerto on Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler will present Debussy's "Iberia," Cesar Franck's D minor symphony and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Saturday afternoon he will give Haydn's symphony in G major, Enesco's suite and three sketches from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz.

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will furnish a number of interesting things at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at both concerts. At the first he will play the Rubinstein D-minor concerto, and at the second the Chopin F minor concerto. The Caesar Franck symphony and Debussy's "Iberia" will be the chief numbers at the Thursday concert, and Enesco's suite for orchestra and selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" at the Saturday concert.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and next Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, respectively. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each of them are works of the modern French school which have had but one hearing each in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." The "Iberia" of Debussy is the second part of a series of compositions which he groups under the name of "Images." It was first played here by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Mahler on Jan. 3 a year ago.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13; Chopin's F minor Concerto No. 2, Enesco's Suite, Opus 9, and the three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"—minuet of the will o' the wisps, Dance of the Sylphs, and the Rakoczy March. The only work on this programme that has the savor of novelty is the Enesco Suite, which was first played in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same concert at which Mahler played the "Iberia." It was not played in Boston until last April, and Mr. Fiedler repeated it a week ago.

From

Address

Date

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon to give its brace of concerts, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler. The soloist at both will be Mr. Josef Hofmann, who has come from Europe to play at only this series of concerts and give two extra recitals. On Thursday night he will play Rubinstein's seldom heard G major concerto, while at the matinee he will play Chopin's familiar F minor concerto. The Boston Symphony on Thursday night will play Mons. Debussy's "Iberia," Cesar Franck's D minor symphony and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude.

At the Saturday matinee the orchestral part of the programme comprises Haydn's G major symphony, Mr. Enesco's Suite, op. 9, and three excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

From

Address

Date

A week of music has the devotees of technique and harmony on edge for what is coming. On Tuesday afternoon the Boston Symphony will be on hand for one of its series of dates with Josef Hofmann as soloist, Harold Bauer, pianist, following on Thursday afternoon and the following day the Flonzaley Quartette will give the first concert of their Washington season in the New Willard ballroom.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Close upon the news that Carl Mack has pledged himself to the Boston Symphony Orchestra next fall, after two years' waiting, the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. A returning

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

JOSEF HOFMANN.

star at both concerts will be Josef Hofmann.

Max Fiedler's music for Thursday comprises Debussy's "Iberia," César Franck's symphony in D-minor, Rubinstein's piano concerto in G and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

For Saturday afternoon there are Haydn's symphony in G-major, Chopin's F-minor concerto, Enesco's suite op. 9, and the Berlioz "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Dance of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March" from "The Damnation of Faust."

This second programme is also to be played by the Bostonians in Brooklyn on Friday night.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 11, and next Saturday afternoon, January 13, respectively. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each are works of the modern French school which have had but one hearing in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, Rubinstein's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G Major and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date JAN 7 1912

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and next Saturday afternoon. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each of them are works of the modern French school which have had but one hearing each in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," César Franck's symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" by Wagner. The "Iberia" of Debussy is the second part of a series of compositions which he groups under the name of "Images." It was first played here by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Mahler on January 3 a year ago. Mr. Fiedler has had it on two different programmes in Boston since that time and it has had a greater success there than any of Debussy's later works. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 13; Chopin's F minor concerto, No. 2; Enesco's Suite, opus 9, and the three familiar pieces from "The Damnation of Faust," Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March. The only work on this programme that has the savor of novelty is the Enesco suite, which was first played in New York by the Philharmonic Orchestra at the same concert at which Mahler played the "Iberia." It was not played in Boston until last April and Mr. Fiedler repeated it again a week ago.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

A piece of very good news was made known last week, when it was announced that Dr. Karl Muck would return at the beginning of next season to be again the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presumably for an indefinite period. The news is good for Boston and for New York. When Dr. Muck came to this country six years ago to succeed Mr. Gericke at the head of the famous organization from Boston, it took him only a very short time to establish himself firmly in the admiration and esteem of the audiences of the orchestra. It was much regretted that his engagement at this time could not last longer than two seasons, because he was under contract with the Royal Opera of Berlin, and was given only a leave of absence, owing, it is said, to the offices of a great and good friend of his royal master, the German Emperor, on this side of the ocean. In his two seasons with the Boston Orchestra he showed himself to be a conductor of remarkable gifts. He took up, to be sure, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant and gratefully preserved. Without sacrificing any of this perfection, Dr. Muck swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the expression of his own purposes. And it is giving him the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes were always those of the composer. Few conductors have shown, as he has, temperament and fire with so much poise and clear comprehension; so wide sympathies with music of every school, and so catholic an understanding of it.

Few have been so free from "fads" and eccentricities of every sort. His two years with the Boston Orchestra were years of great enjoyment for its audiences in Boston and the other cities that have the privilege of listening to it; and his return promises more of the same sort of enjoyment. Mr. Fiedler will take with him back to Germany respect and appreciation of his several excellent qualities. It was recognized that his appointment to conduct the orchestra was not a permanent one. It has, no doubt, been an experience for him that he will not easily duplicate on his return to the Fatherland.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

JAN 6 1912

Da

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. At both concerts Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on either programme, but on each of them are works of the modern French school, which have had but one hearing each in this city. The programme for the Thursday evening concert comprises Debussy's "Iberia," César Franck's Symphony in D-Minor, Rubinstein's Concerto for Pianoforte and orchestra in G-major, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The "Iberia" of Debussy is the second part of a series of compositions which he groups under the name of "Images." It was first played here by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Mahler on January 3 a year ago. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Haydn's Symphony No. 13, Chopin's second concerto, Enesco's Suite, opus 9, and the three familiar pieces from the "Damnation of Faust," "Minuet of the Will of the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs," and the "Rakoczy March."

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date JAN - 1912

Josef Hoffman to Make His Only Appearance at Academy.

Several musical treats are in store for Brooklynites in the near future. The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, which will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 12, has particular interest because Josef Hoffman will be the soloist. This will be his only appearance here this season and probably for several seasons to come. Following the policy of relying in the course of a season only on a few soloists and to have them of the highest class, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is enabled to offer exceptional advantages to artists in the way of a series of engagements and thus can secure many that never appear with other orchestras. Mr. Hoffman arrived in America shortly before Christmas and has been spending the holi-

[107]

From TIMES,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 6 1912

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, January 12, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. This will be Hofmann's only appearance in Brooklyn during the course of the present season. He is to play twice with the Symphony Orchestra in New York, and take part later in the year in a memorial concert which will be his only appearances with orchestra in Manhattan. He has been brought over here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, for this year, has exclusive command of his services. He will play here Chopin's Concerto in F Minor for pianoforte and orchestra No. 2. Haydn's sparkling and gay symphony in G Major No. 13 will lead the programme. This will be followed by the concerto. The second part of the programme comprises Enesco's Suite Opus 9 and three familiar compositions from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust—Minuet of the Will of the Whisps, Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March. The name Enesco is new on Boston Symphony programmes here. Enesco is a Roumanian, 30 years old. He was a boy prodigy, having taken first prizes for violin and harmony in the Vienna Conservatory when he was 11 years, and at that time a pupil of Joseph Hellmesberger, the elder. From Vienna he went to Paris, where he studied with Massenet, Faure and Marsick. There in 1899 he won first prize for violin playing. He gave a concert of his works in Paris in 1897, and since then he has been a notable figure in French music. The Suite which the Boston Symphony is to play here is in four movements, the first two being played without a break. The first is called a Prelude in unison, followed immediately by a slow Minuet. Then comes an Intermezzo and the Finale is a wild Roumanian Dance.

Establi

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date JAN 8 1912

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden in Carnegie Hall kommenden Donnerstag Abend resp. Samstag Nachmittag unter Mitwirkung des berühmten Pianisten Herrn H. Josef Hofmann abgehalten, der am Donnerstag Rubinstein's G-dur-Konzert und am Samstag Chopin's F-moll-Konzert No. 2 spielt. Herr Fiedler dirigirt am Donnerstag Debussy's „Iberia", Cesar Frank's Symphonie in D-moll und das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel. In der Matinee dirigirt er Haydn's C-dur-Symphonie No. 13, Enesco's Suite op. 9 und drei Excerpte aus Berlioz' „Faust Verdammnis".

Die Nachmittage von Freitag, den 19. Januar, und Sonntag, den 21. Januar, sind gänzlich Richard Wagner gewidmet. Im Konzert vom 28. Januar wird die Novität eines amerikanischen Komponisten geboten werden.

Das nächste Konzertpaar der Philharmoniker findet am 18. und 19. d. M. statt, weil das Orchester nach dem heutigen Konzert eine auf zehn Tage anberaumte Tournee nach Albany, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toronto, Pittsburg, Baltimore und Washington unternimmt.

Das zweite diesjährige Konzert des Volpe'schen Symphonie-Orchesters findet unter Leitung von Herrn Arnold Volpe Dinstag Abend in Carnegie Hall mit folgendem Programm statt: Weber's „Oberon"-Ouverture, Floridia's D-moll-Symphonie (zum ersten Mal), Tschaikowsky's „Romeo und Julie"-Phantasie und desselben Komponisten "Marche Slave". Als Solist wird Herr Ludwig Heß, der bekannte deutsche Sänger, eine Arie von Donizetti, ferner Hugo Wolf's „Der Rattenfänger" und Liszt's "Oh, quand je dors" zum M[illegible]n.

Establishe

From STANDARD UNION,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 7 1912

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Jan. 12, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. This will be Hofmann's only appearance in Brooklyn during the course of the present season. He is to play twice with the Symphony Orchestra in Manhattan and take part later in the year in a memorial concert, which will be his only appearances with the orchestra in Manhattan. He has been brought over here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for this year has exclusive command of his services. He will play here Chopin's concerto in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 2. Haydn's sparkling and gay symphony in G major, No. 13, will lead the programme. This will be followed by the concerto. The second part of the programme comprises Enesco's suite opus 9, and three familiar compositions from Berloiz's "Damnation of Faust," minuet of the Will of the Wisps, dance of the sylphs and the Rakoczy march. The name of Enesco is now on Boston Symphony programmes here and probably will be new to the majority of the musical public of Brooklyn. Enesco is a Roumanian, 30 years old. He was a boy prodigy, having taken first prizes for violin and harmony in the Vienna Conservatory when he was 11 years old, he then being a pupil of Joseph Hellmesberger the elder. From Vienna he went to Paris, where he studied with Massenet, Faure and Marsick. There, in 1899, he won first prize for violin playing. He gave a concert of his works in Paris in 1897, and since then he has been a notable figure in French music. The suite [illegible] the Boston Symphony is to

Estal

POST,

JANUARY 6, 1912

HOFFMANN AT SYMPHONY

His Performance of Chopin Concerto Musicianly

BY OLIN DOWNES

Bruckner's seventh symphony and Joseph Hoffmann's performance of the Chopin F minor concerto were features of the 12th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Hoffmann gave a finished and musicianly performance of the concerto. His tone was almost unfailingly beautiful, save when he saw fit to change the gay concluding measures of the last movement into a modern virtuoso tour de force—an unnecessary and distasteful proceeding.

Otherwise Mr. Hoffmann's performance was marked by refinement and continence and sane appreciation of the qualities of a concerto old-fashioned in its style, but not old-fashioned in its melodic appeal. For Chopin, even when he had just escaped from his early tutors, wrote exquisite music. Not as individual, perhaps, as later in his career, but bearing the stamp of that delicate poetry and youth that time has not yet effaced.

No pianist can afford to ignore this concerto. It should be remarked in the same breath that few can afford to sit through a performance of the naive and exquisite composition under the hands of the average pianist. Mr. Hoffmann played the piece well.

Its technics, so far as hitting a given number of notes in a given amount of time is considered, are of course a little elementary today, and occasionally we catch a virtuoso in the act of maltreating the piano passages and doctoring up the thin orchestration to suit a public taste more swollen than in Chopin's time. Fortunately these "revisions," these detestable animadversions, do not last very long. The purity and refinement of Chopin's music has been its own preservation.

Well, Mr. Hoffmann gave a brilliant, a musicianly, above all, a level-headed performance of the concerto, and it must be added that he was long and loudly applauded. It must also be added, to be quite sincere, that his performance seemed a very long way from the music that Chopin must have dreamed and played almost in the manner of an improvisation.

Yet the rubato, the elasticity of tempo and of phrasing were all there, and in perfectly good taste. Where was the essential Chopin? The moonshine had departed, even in the adagio. The spirit of the man who wrote the piece was not there, and lacking its presence, it would have been more distinctive if Mr. Hoffmann had given a worse performance.

Bruckner's symphony is one of those great works from which generations of composers that follow derive sustenance. It seems that no man was more simple and more sincere, and very few men, indeed, could be said to have entered with Bruckner into his heaven, to have beheld with him his cosmic visions, to have gone on his knees, simply as a child, before the mighty universe unfolded to his sight, to have struggled with God, and then endeavored to put the experience on paper.

The defects in Bruckner's writing are common properties with reviewers today, and they furnish plentiful opportunities for those not sympathetic with this great genius to disparage him, but as a matter of fact, in nearly every symphonic movement that Bruckner wrote, from the 4th symphony onward, there is enough stuff for an entire symphony, if this material were given to lesser men, with more leisure to think out the manner and less desire to reflect upon the matter of their message.

The adagio of the seventh symphony remains one of the greatest movements written since the days of Beethoven, and its speech is tremendously enriched by the grand style and the gorgeous coloring that Bruckner derived from Wagner. The scherzo, like most of Bruckner's scherzi, is redolent of the sod, strong with the savor of the good brown earth. The last movement is perhaps the weakest of the four.

Mr. Fiedler gave a superb reading of the work, a reading that was eloquent in the highest degree, without exaggerating or rendering emptily pompous passages of pontifical majesty. It was not necessary to drag the tempo in the adagio for the music to exert its greatest effect. The pace was happily taken. The whole work made a profound impression, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled. The concert came to an end with an enthusiastic performance of some of the most stirring and picturesque music that Wagner ever composed, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

MONITOR, JANUARY 6, 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away next week on its third southern trip. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist for the entire week. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In New York Mr. Fiedler will play symphonies of Franck and Haydn. On Thursday evening he will play the "Iberia" of Debussy. Mr. Hofmann will play the Chopin F minor concerto and the seldom-heard Rubenstein concerto in G major, No. 3. The orchestra will return to Boston Saturday evening and will leave again Monday afternoon on a special train for Hartford, returning the same night.

Josef Hofmann gives a recital in Symphony hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 20. He is to give recitals also in New York [illegible]

From CITIZEN,

Address Brooklyn, JAN 6 1912

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY NIGHT

Josef Hofmann, Pianist, to Be the Soloist.

BONCI RECITAL WEDNESDAY

N. Y. Symphony and Philharmonic Programmes for To-Morrow—Coming Week Schedules Many Musical Events of Interest.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music next Saturday evening, Jan. 12, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. This will be Hofmann's only appearance in Brooklyn during the present season. He is to play twice with the Symphony Orchestra in Manhattan and take part later in the year in a memorial concert. He has been brought over here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for this year has exclusive command of his services. He will play here Chopin's concerto in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra No. 2. Haydn's sparkling and gay symphony in G major, No. 13, will lead the programme; this will be followed by the concerto. The second part of the programme comprises Enesco's Suite, opus 9, and three familiar compositions from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—"Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy" march.

Est

AMERICAN—

DECEMBER 31, 1911

HOFMANN WILL BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Violinist to be Heard With Orchestra Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra at its twelfth public rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Hofmann arrived in New York just before Christmas and went to his home in Aiken, S. C., to spend the holidays.

When he was here a year ago Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, made a contract whereby Mr. Hofman was to return to America this Winter and give his exclusive services to a series of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston and other cities. It was agreed that he should give one recital in Boston and one in New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only orchestra in this country which can offer such inducements to such a great artist as to command his services. Last year Hofmann played twice here with the orchestra, at a regular concert, when he played the Rubinstein concerto, and at the second pension fund concert, when he played Beethoven's concerto in G major. This year he has elected to play Chopin's concerto in F minor, No. [illegible].

The annual performance of a Bruckner symphony comes this week. Mr. Fiedler announces the seventh in E flat major, the symphony which he played two years ago. This will lead the program. The last number, for the program consists of but three, will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

activity will be confined to concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts of Jan. 19 and 20 will be Anton Witek, the concertmaster of the orchestra. He will present the Brahms concerto for violin in D major. The symphony will be Gustav Strube's in B minor.

* * *

The two Symphony hall concerts of the Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees, conductor, will take place Thursday evening, Jan. 25, and Thursday evening March 21. At the first concert, "The Damnation of Faust," dramatic legend by Hector Berlioz, will be given with assisting artists as follows: Miss Alice Nielsen, Margarite; George Hamlin, Faust; Herbert Witherspoon, Mephistopheles; L. [illegible] Merrill, Brander. Orchestra of Symphony players. At the second concert the choral program will be unaccompanied music as follows: Motet for chorus and [illegible] "Praise the Lord, All ye Heathen," chorus in eight parts, "Liebe dir [illegible] ich mich," Cornelius; chorus for women's voices, "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," Verdi; chorus in eight parts, "For Those Who Fell in Battle," Loeffler. Also [illegible] songs, solo numbers and duets. The assisting artists will be Mme. Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza.

GLOBE—

JANUARY 6, 1912.

HOFMANN DELIGHTS.

Plays Chopin Concerto in Admirable Vein.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony Takes an Hour in Performance.

The program at the 12th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Bruckner, seventh symphony in E major; Chopin, second concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Josef Hofmann, soloist; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The seer of music may rise with the sun, consult his calendar, turn his face toward Jerusalem, and say it will be a large day when Josef Hofmann comes to town. It was so yesterday, for he is not as other men are; yet he is neither Pharisee, Philistine, pedant nor pounder. May he fluorish long, and live to be full of years and good deeds, even as that of yesterday.

Herculean pianists who would put to flight a whole orchestra of 100 men find little comfort or means for display in either of Chopin's concertos. They are as clusters of fragrant verse in pianistic literature, rather than poems of heroic proportions.

Chopin was unique in the shorter forms and, as a pianist, felt himself obliged to write the inevitable concerto. He was a lyric and not an epic poet; his imagination was more fanciful and exquisite in the miniature than when spent upon a bolder canvas, his muse better suited to a shorter than to a longer and more sustained flight.

The meagreness of the accompaniment may be heard, even in Klindworth's re-edited score, for Chopin did not know the orchestra. Except a trio and a 'cello sonata, neither of them happily undertaken, he evaded other instruments and, unlike Liszt, wrote for the piano alone. He thought in terms of it, even created an idiom for it.

How many pianists have respect for the delicacy and the grace of Chopin's diction, for a tonal vocabulary which indulged in expletives rarely, and whose whole scale of dynamic values set a larger price upon beauty than upon the rumblings of basic thunders?

Mr Hofmann's playing yesterday was such as one might believe, from the accounts of Ehlert and the contemporaries of Chopin, that the composer himself would have approved. The concerto is not to be heard as a work developing certain subject matter. It appeals by its simple naive beauty when the pianist so permits.

Yesterday Mr Hofmann played with admirable reticence, yet not without spontaneity. There was the tenderness, the touch of latent melancholy never long absent in Chopin, the utmost clarity of design, both in the sensitively molded melody and in the wealth of arabesque into which it flowers ever and anon.

There was tonal beauty, not too sensuously colored, yet not without imagination and the play of half-tints. It was memorable playing of Chopin, in what may be called the true manner of Chopin. Would that those who perform upon the piano as though upon a training machine for a rowing crew would learn of Mr De Pachmann and of Mr Hofmann.

The pianist's art was not a thing of vital and refreshing imagination merely because it succeeded a mortal hour of Bruckner's symphony. An hour of platitudes, however dressed or delivered, is conducive to heaviness and slumber rather than to nimbleness and flambuoyancy of spirit.

The venerable schoolmaster knew his trade, and in his meagre and insular experience evolved some imposing musical thoughts. The noble first theme of the slow movement is one of them, as heard in the G string of the first violins, and as translated to other choirs and at length glorified in the brass. But what of the pedantic sequences, the dry reiteration, the wearisome and futile method of approach to a climax, upon an unending stretch of the final tonality, so that nothing arrives?

True, Bruckner knew and assimilated his Wagner, introduced the tenor tubas of the "Ring," and even as Mottl, then in his classes at Vienna, worshiped in the name of the projected Bayreuth. Nor was it in vain.

One morning the professor appeared in the class room dilating and stammering with joy, waving a letter in his hand. It was from the master. It read: "What I am to the music drama, you are to the opera." His cup was full; neither God nor man could say more.

In the light of this, what of the scherzo and its clownish, bumptious theme, italicized in the brass to the apotheosis of boredom? It speaks of the relentless logic of a pedantic, pitiably restricted mind and occluded senses, unquickened by the flame of life, by the spell of such an inspiration as Wagner knew in the days of the composition of "Tristan," days with secrets which Cosima's edition of his life have not fully revealed.

There will be no symphony concerts next week in the event of the orchestra's absence.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AWAY.

The Symphony orchestra is away next week on its third southern trip. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist for the entire week. The usual concert will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. The orchestra will return to Boston next Saturday evening and will leave again Monday afternoon on a special train for Hartford, returning the same night.

HERALD, JANUARY 7, 1912.

Alice Nielsen Engaged For Cecilia Society's Concert

Miss Alice Nielsen.

Herbert Witherspoon.
George Hamlin.

Ranks of the Organization Recruited Under Leadership of Conductor Arthur Mees.

MANY OLD MEMBERS RETURN

There is no choral work more popular with Boston audiences than Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which the Cecilia Society will give at its frst concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening Jan. 25. More than ordinary interest will be attached to this concert in as much as it will be the first concert of the society under its new conductor, Arthur Mees.

The ranks of the society have been largely recruited and many of the older members of the society, who had given up active participation in recent years, have returned. Mr. Mees has made a favorable impression in the rehearsals and it is expected that under his leadership the society will get decidedly a new lease of life.

The singers engaged for this performance are Miss Alice Nielsen of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will sing the part of Marguerite; George Hamlin, who will sing Faust; Herbert Witherspoon, who will sing Mephistopheles, and L. B. Merrill, who will sing the song allotted to Brander. The orchestra will be composed of symphony players.

Under the new arrangement only two concerts will be given by the society, this first concert, and then "a Capella" concert, which falls on Thursday evening, March 21. The assisting singers at this concert will be Mme. Eames and Emilio de Gegorzai.

The principal works will be a Motet by Bach, chorus in eight parts by Cornelius, Hymn to the Virgin Mary by Verdi, and Loeffler's Chorus "For One Who Fell in Battle." There will be lighter part songs and solo numbers. The season sale is now in progress at Symphony Hall.

ORCHESTRA TRIP

The Symphony orchestra is away this week on its third southern trip. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist for the entire week. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In New York, Mr. Fiedler will play the Franck's symphony, and one by Haydn. Also on Thursday evening he will play "Iberia," by Debussy. Mr. Hofmann will play Chopin's F minor concerto, which he played here, and the seldom heard concerto in G major, No. 3, by Rubinstein. The orchestra will return to Boston next Saturday evening, but will leave again Monday afternoon on a special train for Hartford, returning the same night.

TRAVELER, JANUARY 6, 1912.

HOFMANN THE SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruckner's seventh symphony, a Chopin concerto with Josef Hofmann at the piano, and the "Flying Dutchman" overture provided a far more interesting afternoon at the 12th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra than seemed possible from the mere reading of the programme. It was decidedly pleasing to see the Boston music lovers warm to Bruckner. After yesterday's playing and reception of the seventh symphony, it will not do to say that Bruckner has no Boston following. True, the composer is not always heard at his best in this number in that he appears to be groping his way a little too frequently, but when the real Bruckner speaks, there is music that not only compels attention, but wins admiration.

Josef Hofmann was charming in the Chopin concerto, playing like the true artist that he is, losing sight of self and surroundings in the all-absorbing desire to give his audience Chopin's real thoughts. He was deservedly recalled and recalled.

The Wagner overture provided just the right finish to one of the best concerts of the season. The orchestra is ever at its best with Wagner and can always count upon sympathetic hearing.

There will be no concerts the coming week. Anton Witek is to be the soloist on the 19th and 20th.

CECILIA SOCIETY.

There is no choral work more popular with the Boston audiences than Perlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which the Cecilia Society is to give at its first concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 25. More than ordinary interest will be attached to this concert inasmuch as it will be the first concert of the society under its new conductor, Arthur Mees.

The artists who have been engaged for this performance are: Miss Alice Nielsen of the Boston and Metropolitan Opera Companies, who will sing the part of Marguerite; George Hamlin, who will sing Faust; Herbert Witherspoon, who will sing Mephistopheles, and L. B. Merrill, who will sing the

TRANSCRIPT, JANUARY 6, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE ANNUAL RITE TO BRUCKNER CELEBRATED

This Time with the Symphony of the Tenor Tubas—Audiences and Bruckner's Music—Inspiration and Its Penalties—Mr. Fiedler's Pains with the Piece—Mr. Hofmann Plays a Concerto by Chopin—The Discerning Beauty of the Performance

ONCE upon a time the manager of a theatre slipped a blank bearing a few questions into each programme and politely asked each spectator to answer them that he might learn his audience's view of his play. It would have been interesting so to question each listener at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon as to the impressions he or she had received from the annual performance of a symphony by Bruckner. Mr. Gericke used to play one or another of the nine when he chose to put it on his programme. He might elect to play two in a single season; he might elect to play none for three years. It was Dr. Muck—for the present generation of conductors is loyal to Bruckner—who set the fashion of an annual rite and with the single exception of last season, Mr. Fiedler has continued it. They have "musical solemnities" in Germany, or the devout call them so, and this annual performance of a symphony by Bruckner is becoming such at Symphony Hall.

Anyhow to be so solemnized much increases the esteem of the audience for Bruckner. In its heart, it may repine at symphonies that are sure to be nearly an hour long. It may suspect, and with reason, that there are frequent passages in which Bruckner is only groping, not very clear himself as to what he intends musically to do, or only marking time in counterpoint until he is ready to make a stroke that may be of beauty or of power. It may weary of his tricks of instrumental manner—of his liking for tremulous strings over songful horns and bass, of his liking for great, wavelike, tossing crescendos, of his Wagnerian idiosyncrasies. If it is musically learned, it will repine under his repeated inversions of his themes. If it is emotionally sensitive, it will weary of the plaintive note in his music, of the querulous urgency of an aspiration that very seldom attained its tonal and imaginative goal. But this same audience is seated at a musical solemnity. It listens gravely; it applauds generously; it suppresses all inclination to read the more interesting programme-book, and if mind and spirit try to rebel with weariness, it curbs them as the old anchorites mortified their rebellious, but natural, flesh. No; Bruckner's music must be exalted music. Do not conductors annually "solemnize" it?

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler chose for the rite of yesterday was that in E major numbered seven—the symphony that utilizes the tenor tubas of Wagner's "Ring" operas and the slow movement of which Bruckner wrote as a kind of anticipatory dirge to "the master" because (as he naively explained) he once reflected that in the course of nature Wagner had not long to live. Certainly, the conductor spared no pains upon the performance, and the cynical might have believed him in his turn aware of Bruckner's shortcomings and idiosyncrasies and resolved to cloak and mitigate them. Diligently Mr. Fiedler sought to give movement and diversity to the music by variety of pace and range of tonal force and shadings. He read each movement largely, and in the finale in particular, except when long passages of aimless orchestral agitation, held his hand, he attained the sweeping bigness of utterance that seems Bruckner's goal. Steadily he sharpened rhythms, sought clarifying contrasts, tried to make weak places strong and assimilated the quality of tone, especially in strings, horns and Bruckner's beloved brass, to the voice that the striving composer would give them. Here and elsewhere Bruckner is well performed nowadays. The conductors believe in his symphonies, or play them as though they did. They help his music by their orchestral insight and tonal sense; while the ears of the hearers nowadays are better attuned to his full-throated, his sharply contrasted, his laboriously overlaid instrumental voices. Aptly, once upon a time a Viennese caricaturist drew Bruckner, sitting in the Elysian fields and smiling his cunning peasant smile at his fair fortunes with posterity.

This seventh symphony excels most of its sisters—for are not symphonies muses when they are animated on the stage around Beethoven's or—may be some day—Bruckner's dying bed. It nowhere matches the slow movement of the eighth symphony wherein for once Bruckner attained the sublimated ecstasy idea and expression to which he aspired and sloughed away all the gropings and haltings that usually beset him. Yet in this seventh symphony, there is more compensation for the hampering weaknesses, the tedious idiosyncrasies of some of their predecessors, perhaps there is even less of them. Bruckner conceived noble musical thoughts. There are melodic ideas in the first movement, in the slow movement, in the finale, which exalt the mood of the listener. The whole adagio is conceived in a spirit of austere lament, too grave and deep to be shrill and comforted by as grave a consolation. The Wagnerian echoes in it are the stirrings of beloved memories. Bruckner's idiosyncrasies fell away, as they do in the adagio of the succeeding symphony in the intensity of his mood. He invents, he goes forward almost in spite of himself. In the first and in the final movements, there are passages of like loftiness.

Inspiration is a perilous word; but it may be justly used of the singular Bruckner. His melodies do seem to come to him by inspiration—in these days when composers usually contrive them. They are beautiful, eloquent, exalted, they thrill when they first, and usually gravely, enter the musical web. Then, when Bruckner would develop and make play with them, inspiration, mere invention even, often forsake him. He cannot write continuously, as a composer with a sense of musical design; he cannot discriminate between the commonplace and the significant like a composer with a true sense of self-criticism; he falls away into aimless repetitions, into pedantic counterpoint. And then inspiration comes again; his long melodies find breath; they move and mount. Yet often, especially to the ears of our time, the richness of his harmonies, the sonorities and diversities of the instrumental dress, save him. He knew his horns and his brass with a sympathy for their mellowness that does not quicken all composers. Not for nothing, though seldom for imitation had he studied the harmonies and the instrumentation of Wagner. When he is not exacting as by his exaltation, he leaves us to recall that he helped to prepare for the glowing harmonies, the sonorous instrumentation, that we crave in the symphonies of our immediate time. Inspiration is fitful at best and Bruckner paid the penalty for it. At his highest in this seventh symphony, it is easy to agree with his partisans that he had a unique and sublimated genius. But he sorely needed talent also, to discriminate and design. The composers have the two.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 30, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

IN Germany, in Austria and in America, the conductors at least hold Bruckner's music in honor. If they do not exactly make a propaganda for it, each of them that has a series of concerts usually plays every year one or another of the composer's lengthy symphonies. Here in Boston Mr. Gericke in his time nearly went the round of them; Dr. Muck did not neglect the annual offering; and Mr. Fiedler omitted it only last year. For this season he will make it at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, when Bruckner's seventh symphony, in E-flat, will lead the programme. It is the symphony of the slow movement of noble and solemn lamentation which some say Bruckner wrote in memory of Wagner, though actually he composed it a year before Wagner died. For any purpose anywhere, it is exalted music, wherein Bruckner's strange imagination rises high. With all his limitations, his symphonies have their exceptional qualities. They deserve the conductors' propaganda. The other purely orchestral number is Wagner's overture to his opera "The Flying Dutchman"—sea-music such as he wrote nowhere else. Between the symphony and the overture, Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will play the second, the less familiar and the less admired of Chopin's two concerts—that in F minor. Last year, in recital and at the Symphony Concerts, he established himself anew here as a mature pianist of the first rank, master of his tone, his music and his audience.

/ / + / /

Jordan Hall: The Longy Club

MUSIC hitherto unheard here makes, as it often does, the entire programme of the Longy Club for its concert of pieces for wind instruments at Jordan Hall on Monday evening. The list begins with an octet for saxophone, oboe, clarinet, two violins, viola, violoncello and double bass by Woollett, the practised and fanciful composer of such chamber music. In it, Mr. Longy and Mr. Grisez will have the assistance of Messrs. Noack, Férir, Bak, Keller and Huber of the Symphony Orchestra for the strings, and of Mrs. R. J. Hall for the saxophone. The second item comprises five pieces for clarinet (Mr. Grisez), viola (Mr. Férir), and piano (Mr. de Voto), by Bruch, the veteran German composer of "nice feeling" for his instruments. The final number is evidently pictorial and colorful music—three "Watercolors" of Holland, written by a young Dutch composer, Kriens, and scored for flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns, bassoons and bells. Decidedly a unique concert.

/ / + / /

GLOBE—

JANUARY 12, 1912.

DR MUCK TO RETURN.

Engaged for Term of Years to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra —Vienna and Munich Wanted Him.

Dr Karl Muck of Berlin will return to Boston next Fall to conduct the Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, according to the announcement made yesterday by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra.

When Dr Muck left this city in the Spring of 1908 it was generally understood that as soon as his engagement with the Royal Opera Company of Berlin was ended he would return to the conductorship here. Unexpected obstacles, however, prevented his coming here until now.

Since he left Boston the German Emperor has made Dr Muck musical director, the highest post in the Imperial Theatres. Great efforts have been made to get him for Vienna as Weingartner's successor, and last Summer he received strong inducements to accept the post occupied by Felix Motti as general intendant in the Royal Theatres of Munich. He would not even consider these offers, however, having made up his mind to return to Boston.

[109]

AMERICAN—

DECEMBER 30, 1911

JENA SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

There is mystery in music as there is in murder, and yesterday's Symphony audience heard the first American performance of a mysterious symphony of whose authorship Beethoven is suspected.

The symphony is causing great excitement among the musical experts, who are discussing its authorship with the calmness, moderation, self-restraint and politeness of a pack of timber wolves.

A gentleman writing in the Transcript the other day after devoting two columns to proving to his own satisfaction that nobody wrote this symphony, added with magnificent effrontery, considering that he had never heard a note of the music, that it was a fifth rate symphony anyway.

The symphony was discovered by Dr. Fritz Stein of Jena University, among old papers in the music library of Jena, and is believed by him to have been written by Beethoven in about 1790 or ten years before the First Symphony of Beethoven in C Major appeared.

The doctor makes out a pretty good case and far be it from us to get into the controversy. Whether Beethoven, Mozart, Hayden or John Philip Sousa wrote this symphony Dr. Stein has done a service in adding it to the existing repertory.

The Jena Symphony might have been written by Mozart or Hayden or the young Beethoven, for it is worthy of any of them. It is full of fresh, vivid themes, tunes that fall most pleasantly upon the ear.

The minuet is graceful and full of charm. The finale is sparkling, joyous. The treatment is as elegant and as graceful as Haydn. Far from being fifth rate, the symphony is charming. If old Doc Stein wrote it himself he is a marvelous musician because the composer who can write like Beethoven or Haydn is as scarce as writers who can imitate Shakespeare.

The soloist yesterday was Madame Berta Morena of the Munich Opera, who was with the Metropolitan several seasons ago. Morena sang an aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and the finale of "Gotterdammerung." She is a dramatic soprano with a voice of considerable beauty, but her bad method was shown up by the lyric music of Beethoven. In the death of Brunhilda, where she could scream all she liked, she was very effective, while the archestral part of the finale was impressive as ever.

The immortal "Marriage of Figaro" overture of Mozart opened the concert, and a charming orchestral suite by Enesco, the Roumanian violinist, which was successful last season, was repeated with no loss of attractiveness.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 8, 1912

Symphony Hall: Wagner's Sea-Music

WHILE Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra, in which nearly every part was doubled, were making their impassioned and emphatic way through the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" at the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening, it was curious to reflect how little sea-music Wagner wrote. There is sea-music, of course, throughout "The Flying Dutchman"; the matter and the scenes of the drama require it; while Wagner's imagination had been stirred by his experience of calm and tempestuous seas and his glimpses of the rocky Norwegian coast on his voyage from Pillau to London. The orchestral delineation, at the beginning of the overture, of the physical storm that tosses the Dutchman's ship and of the emotional storm that answers within him are typical enough of this sea-music. It recurs often in the first act of the opera and has character and force; it helps to individualize the old skipper, Daland; and it does not become conventionally operatic until the crews of the two ships begin to sing choruses at each other. (It is time to revive "The Flying Dutchman" in America; for a whole operatic generation knows it not.) There is sea-music—the music of a following breeze and a tranquil sea—at the beginning of the first act of "Tristan"; some profess to hear it in the song of the sailor at the masthead and in the joyous acclaim with which Tristan's ship draws into harbor. Yet there and elsewhere it is quickly smothered in the emotional stress of the fated pair. We listen for the voices of Tristan and Isolde and not for those of the sea.

Elsewhere in Wagner's music, unless it be in the early overture, "Columbus," there is not, in cursory recollection, a bar of sea-music. "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," the Ring operas, "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" are all well within the land. He could write sea-music of many moods, and write it with vivid delineative quality, as "The Flying Dutchman" and the episodes in the first act of "Tristan" prove; but, apparently for a whole opera threaded with such music, he needed the suggestion of an immediate and strange experience. He had it once in that stormy voyage, twenty-five days long, from Pillau to London in 1839, when he was a young man. He lived his mature, his creative life on land, deep into the land as it were, in France, in Germany and Switzerland. Without actual impulse, his imagination never turned again to the sea except when and where sea-music was for the moment necessary as in "Tristan." Once he contemplated a journey to America, when crossing the Atlantic required a fortnight or more of varied experiences. If he had made the voyage, he might have written another sea-opera, to be "The Flying Dutchman" of his maturity.

H. T. P.

Forthcoming Programmes

Mr. Hofmann's programme for his concert in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 20, falls into three groups: one of music by Beethoven, one of music by Chopin, and one of miscellaneous pieces chiefly by Debussy and Rachmaninoff. In detail, the generous list is:

Sonata, Op. 110.—Rondo a Capriccio.—Andante Favori.—March from "The Ruins of Athens" (Transcription by Rubinstein) ..... Beethoven
Barcarolle.—Nocturne in C Minor.—Nocturne in D-flat.—Waltz in E Minor.—Studies in C-sharp Minor, A-flat and G-flat ..... Chopin
Nocturne ..... Sgambati
Soirée dans Grénade ..... Debussy
Polichinelle.—Prelude in F-sharp Minor.—Prelude in G Minor ..... Rachmaninoff

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Return of Dr. Muck

IT is a piece of very good news that Dr. Karl Muck will return at the beginning of next season to be again the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presumably for an indefinite period. The news is good for Boston and for New York. When Dr. Muck came to this country six years ago to succeed Mr. Gericke at the head of the famous organization from Boston, it took him only a very short time to establish himself firmly in the admiration and esteem of the audiences of the orchestra. In his two seasons with the Boston Orchestra he showed himself to be a conductor of remarkable gifts. He took up, to be sure, an instrument brought to the highest perfection by his predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, whose memory is still fragrant and gratefully preserved. Without sacrificing any of this perfection, Dr. Muck swayed the orchestra with his own spirit and made its playing the expression of his own purposes. And it is giving him the highest praise as a conductor to say that those purposes were always those of the composer. Few conductors have shown, as he has, temperament and fire with so much poise and clear comprehension, so wide sympathies with music of every school, and so catholic an understanding of it. Few have been so free from whims and eccentricities of every sort. His two years with the Boston Orchestra were years of great enjoyment for its audiences in Boston and the other cities that have the privilege of listening to it; and his return promises more of the same sort of enjoyment. [The New York Times.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET

R. I.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN MODERN OFFERING

Splendid Audience Hears Boston Players in Third Concert of Season.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played in Infantry Hall, Providence, last evening, with another splendid audience present. One feature of these concerts which was manifest at the opening of the course seems to have become permanent. The entire capacity of the large hall has been taxed on the last two occasions, and it seems that this great orchestra has at last come into its own in Providence.

A programme full of novelty, and of a thoroughly modern character, was chosen by Conductor Fiedler, with Caesar Franck's symphony in D-minor given the place of honor. The offering follows:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21 ..... Mendelssohn
Symphony in D-minor ..... Franck
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
"Aghadoe;" Irish ballade for contralto solo and orchestra (MS.) ..... Chadwick Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme) ..... Debussy
Azael's Recitative, "These joyous airs," and aria, "O time that is no more," from the Lyric Scene, "The Prodigal Son" ..... Debussy
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in "Rondo Form," Op. 28 ..... Strauss

Although not by any means as well known as many of the older symphonies, Franck's work is no stranger to local music lovers, and it was received with many marks of approval. It was superbly played, and Conductor Fiedler seemed to throw the whole force of his vigorous personality into the interpretation, as indeed appeared to be a characteristic of all his work last evening.

Miss Lilla Ormond, a contralto who sang with the orchestra last season, was the soloist, and she was in splendid form, her fresh, young voice showing to superb advantage in a new Irish ballad, "Aghadoe," with orchestra, this being the first performance of the work. The fourth concert in the course will be played Tuesday evening, Feb. 13, and the soloist will be Miss Katharine Goodson, pianist.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 30, 1911

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, presented its eleventh program at Symphony hall, Friday afternoon, with the solo assistance of Mme. Berta Morena, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York. One piece had its first performance in America, the Jena symphony, ascribed to the youthful Beethoven. Another piece, Enesco's suite with the unison introduction for violins was on the program, perhaps to give those who liked it at its first performance eight months ago opportunity to revise their impressions, or perhaps to brush up some striking pages of modern instrumentation for reading to the audiences of the next tour. Mme. Morena sang two arias of the greatest possible dramatic impressiveness, in one characterizing Beethoven's Leonora; in the other, Wagner's Bruennhilde. The works performed were the following:

Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven, "Jena" symphony in C major, edited by Fritz Stein; first time in Boston. Beethoven, scene, "Abscheulicher!" and aria, "Komm, Hoffnung" from "Fidelio." Enesco, suite for orchestra, op. 9; Wagner, closing scene of "Gotterdammerung."

The new work of course is the one the program is remarkable for. A delicately scored little symphony that might have been written by some one of Beethoven's day or could have been compiled from several works of the epoch of Beethoven and of the one preceding and of the one following him. It could have been built also by somebody writing a good while after the classic period, but schooled in its manner and technique. If the scholar who unearthed this little epic in the depository of documents of the Jena Music College will next bring to light some youthful Beethoven fragments wherewith to supplement it, he will give the world a veritable musical Ossian to hear and discuss. The Jena library find is an interesting work, whatever its authorship. It is pleasing to listen to for its own musical sake, whether it discloses any valuable facts in archeology or not. If the German conservatory professors positively know that Beethoven composed it, they would have a good deal to explain as to how the youth of Bonn could be a musician of such character as he shows himself to be in the Jena symphony and how the man of Vienna a musician of such decidedly different character. The child is not father of the man.

It is not possible to believe that Beethoven wrote the whole work as it stands and it is not easy to see how he could have written any part of it just as it stands. The symphony is conceivably a compilation, though it is by no means a collection of odd movements strung together. For it is an organized composition and must have been set up as we hear it by a single hand. The ideas may have come from a number of sources and have found their unity in the orchestration. There is show of reason that Beethoven was one source of the ideas. The second movement of the Jena symphony in one spot reminds the listener of the andante of the G major sonata, opus 14, No. 2. But if we knew the composer was somebody not Beethoven, we should pay little heed to the resemblance. A great composer and a forgotten one of the same period have a common idiom. Many a minor Elizabethan poet wrote lines of Shakespearian quality. Dittersdorf composed passages of music in a style like Beethoven's best, did it before Beethoven had fairly matured his style. In going back to an epoch of great achievement we are easily misled into supposing that one man did everything. Small cause is there for thinking that some work of the great man's epoch which is dug up in the archives of an ancient musical institution must be ascribed to him just because its style bears here and there a resemblance to his.

Of course the judgment of American listening counts in the case of the new music only so long as its authorship is disputed on evidence of record. If the Jena symphony were proved to Beethoven's by unimpeachable documentary evidence, there would be nothing to do but accept it. But German academic opinion does not vouch for the authenticity of the piece on that ground and so resort has to be made to the internal evidence of the music itself. And that lets American symphony audiences into the controversy.

Some Bostonians will say that more convincing to them than any evidence of analysis is the evidence of interpretation. And on this point the German professors may consider that they have found out something important by sending the Jena symphony to the United States. It has come to be pretty generally agreed that the present conductor of the Symphony orchestra is not a great Beethoven interpreter. The work of the last three years of the Symphony concerts has led listeners to expect two things: A Strauss program, a brilliant concert; a Beethoven program, an undistinguished concert. Now on general principles, if the new piece rehearsed in Symphony hall Friday afternoon was really composed by Beethoven, Max Fiedler would be quite likely to miss giving it an appealing interpretation. The truth is, he gave it a most interesting reading. Let the German professors know, then, that the first performance of the Jena symphony in Boston develops strong interpretive evidence against the work having been composed by Ludwig von Beethoven, who once lived at Bonn and afterwards at Vienna; or at any rate by the man who wrote the Beethoven symphonies which precede the ninth.

The "Jena" symphony deserves revival for its own sake; for it has much beauty of form, though it is at times monotonously faithful to the early, strict principles of symphonic structure. If it is a genuine old composition and was ever in the repertory of an eighteenth century orchestra, it must have gone with much acclaim in performance. Modern works no nearer in merit to the compositions of Mozart and Haydn, hold their own with the program builders.

Mme. Morena and the orchestra gave an accredited Beethoven piece a hearing immediately after the doubtful "Jena" symphony. The soprano lent the best of her powers of German art to the "Fidelio" aria, singing with rich, full tone and an exalted style of declamation, and adding the true symphony solo touch to the afternoon. Later she sang the finale of "Gotterdammerung" and would doubtless have made a fine vocal exhibition thereof, had not Mr. Fiedler's Wagnerian enthusiasm become assertive and turned Bruennhilda's lament for Siegfried into an orchestral scene. As it was, the whole effect was one of remarkable dramatic amplitude and one to make a listener hope for the day when the drama of "The Ring" will be something more in Boston than a yearly excerpt or two at a Symphony concert.

The performance proved that the orchestra can be at home in many styles when the program is such that no one number has absorbed all the practise time. The modern piece of Enesco, familiar to the players from last year, did not crowd the classic Mozart overture to the wall. Indeed, the orchestra made a much better general showing at this concert, in which nothing pretentious was undertaken, than it makes some weeks when it expends all its virtuosity in the conquest of a Strauss tone poem. It has two well-rehearsed pieces which should be serviceable to it on its next tour, one because of its controversial interest, the "Jena" symphony; and the other because of its expression of the French orchestral mood of the present moment, the Enesco suite with octave prelude for 58 virtuosi violinists.

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 6, 1912

HOFMANN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

AS USUAL, PIANIST SCORED BIG SUCCESS

A Bruckner Symphony and the "Flying Dutchman" Overture Splendidly Handled by Mr. Fiedler.

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Symphony in E major, No. 7.
Chopin—Piano Concerto, F Minor, No. 2.
Pianist—Mr. Josef Hofmann.
Wagner—"Flying Dutchman" Overture.

This list is not so short as it looks, for a modern symphony is often a concert in itself. Bruckner ranges himself alongside of Paderewski and Elgar in the matter of length, although he is far beyond and above them in the matter of breadth. He has more to say than most of the long-winded symphonists, and he has mastered his learning better than many of them, so that he is not ruled by it.

Nevertheless there are at least two other of his symphonies which we like better than his seventh. Whether his music be held dry or interesting in quality, concise or prolix in expression, he moved in the correct path and succeeded where others have failed.

The first movement shows here a German d'Indy, a man who can bend his material to any form that he chooses. The tone-coloring is not especially brilliant, but the figure and phrase treatment most masterly. It is music that one needs to study in order to fully comprehend, but it is noble even to the non-student. Mr. Fiedler delights in making such mazes clear, and he worked wonders in the interpretation of this.

The second movement with its solemn tribute to Wagner was very impressive. Just as Beethoven wrote Napoleon's funeral music while the latter was alive, so Bruckner did with Wagner. The trombones and tubas were very well played. This movement is too long. But we took the keenest delight in the Scherzo with its six-noted trumpet-theme. It made a splendid foil to the sombre effects of the lofty Adagio, and it was played with an exciting vigor that swept everything before it.

The Finale does not fall off in interest and it was not astonishing to hear this long, intricate and learned work arouse popular enthusiasm for once. Mr. Fiedler was twice recalled.

Josef Hofmann is one of the greatest of pianists. There was a time when the world thought that he was to become one of the greatest of composers, but in that field he was much greater when he was much smaller. Nevertheless, it is something to be in the front rank of executants in this 20th century, when great pianists and fiddlers grow on every bush.

The Chopin concerto which Hofmann played is not a work in which the soloist can display much grandeur, although it gives chance enough for brilliancy and poetic sentiment. It stands to Mr. Hofmann's credit that he did not allow the latter to degenerate into sentimentality, that he was not swamped by the emotional side of the subject as not a few pianists are.

[110]

It is an old story that this concerto is more of a piano solo with accompaniment, than a symphonic work such as a concerto ought to be, but the defect remains ever present, even after the revisions which the composition has had, of which Richard Burmester's is the best. The concerto is best in its first movements and falls off in its finale, a fault which can be found in some of the other famous concertos. But there is considerable breadth in the first movement and this, and in fact every movement, was given by Mr. Hofmann with virility and earnestness that gave the concerto almost a new flavor. His octave and chord work in the opening movement were wonderful. In the second movement, the love-song to Constantia Gladkowska, some degree of sentiment may be permitted, but this was never allowed to become effeminate.

Mr. Hofmann played the finale with such brilliancy that it really seemed the best part of the concerto; his runs and scale work were electrifying and when he concluded a storm of enthusiasm burst forth. He was recalled again and again with very spontaneous fervor.

In these days of aviation there may be some enthusiasts who look for new altitude records and great cross-country flights in "The Flying Dutchman." To these we may say that although Wagner built the work on a very high plane it was not an aeroplane. It begins with a figure which is the beginning of Beethoven's Ninth symphony, turned upside down, but this figure makes a splendid sailor's call.

Mr. Fiedler was in his element in the chromatic storm which rages in the early part of the work. The contrast with the sweet theme of salvation was very well drawn. The glory of the sailor music (choruses in the opera) never seems to grow tame. The salt sea is in every measure. We wish that, for purposes of illustration, to point a moral and adorn a tale, Mr. Fiedler could have placed Debussy's picture of the ocean in juxtaposition with this splendid sea-scape. By skilful navigation the craft was brought to weather the storm, and make a safe harbor, whereupon the passengers departed after a hearty round of applause for a very spirited performance.

HERALD,

JANUARY 6, 1912.

SYMPHONY GIVES BRUCKNER AGAIN

Public Growing Tolerant of His Music, Once Treated with Scant Applause.

ANALYSIS OF 7TH SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann Gives an Enchanting Performance of Chopin's Concerto.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 12th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Josef Hofmann was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E major No. 7.....Bruckner
Concerto No. 2, F minor for piano.....Chopin
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"..... Wagner

There have now been 10 performances of symphonies by Bruckner at these concerts. The seventh was the first to be played. Of the other nine we have heard the third, fourth, fifth, eighth and ninth. The seventh has been played thrice, and the ninth twice. But the performances have been scattered through the last 25 years and it can hardly be said that we are well acquainted with this composer, who was naive and at the same time shrewd, in his music as in his daily walk and conversation.

The public is more tolerant toward Bruckner's music than it was. It has seen that Messrs. Gericke, Muck and Fiedler in turn thought this music should be heard. Each one of the three if any one had said to him, "We don't like this music," might have answered in the words of Carl Bergmann to some one complaining of pieces by Wagner: "Then they must hear it, till they do like it." There was a time when the announcement of a symphony by Bruckner aroused angry protestation; some stayed at home; some went to confirm their suspicions; there was faint, scarcely courteous applause. Yesterday there was hearty applause after each movement, and at the end Mr. Fiedler was recalled. It is true that the seventh is probably the least annoying of these symphonies, though some would give the fourth the precedence; it is also true that the performance was impressive

If Bruckner's music were played here frequently, who knows whether there might not be a Bruckner cult? There is a Brahms cult; there is a Debussy cult, and the Debussyites, young and old, are at present in an agitated state; why should there not be devoted bands of Brucknerites, and Mahlerites, for Mahler as a symphonic writer is little known here. The Regerites in Boston at present are, like the conies, but a feeble folk.

The performance clearly revealed the strength and the weakness of this symphony, or rather of Bruckner's symphonic methods. He had noble thoughts and his manner of expression was often wonderful, overwhelming. He had little sense of proportion; he had not the knack of maintaining a continuous flow in the development; his habit of endless repetition became as tiresome as his trick of stopping his speech, to begin all over again. A most unequal composer, strangely gifted by nature, strangely

In this symphony there are passages that remind one of the great Beethoven, passages of supernatural grandeur and unearthly beauty. There is music which, like that of Cesar Franck, is of another world, music that is disembodied. In each movement these passages are as prominent as the peaks of a mountain range, but between these peaks there are disappointing valleys, without refreshing verdure, without imposing glacier or rocky gorge, valleys of straggling vegetation or dreary wastes.

There is nothing more arresting in music than the opening of this symphony, the exposition of the first theme; there is hardly anything more stupendous than the long coda. Then there is the superb Adagio, probably the most complete and best rounded of the composer's works. The Scherzo has demoniacal energy. There are noteworthy pages in the finale.

The echoes of "Parsifal" and "The Ring" need not disturb anyone. Bruckner adored Wagner and at times deliberately borrowed from him, quoted him. The reminiscences in this symphony are harmonic or recollections of moods rather than copies of melodic lines. There is so much that is noble and spiritual that petty weaknesses, childish delight in tawdry contrapuntal ornamentation, the reiteration of something inherently commonplace, may well be ignored at the time. They are soon forgotton; that which is great endures, an abiding joy.

Mr. Hofmann's performance of Chopin's concert was enchanting. There are some—and they are among Chopin's admirers—who maintain that this concerto is only a pretty tinkling, tolerable in a small hall. They may be right theoretically in demanding a small auditorium, but now and then a pianist comes along, Mr. de Pachmann, or Mr. Hofmann, and proves that the concerto has sufficient vitality to be a thing of beauty even in huge Symphony Hall.

Mr. Hofmann did not inflate this delicate music for the sake of effect, nor did he condescendingly dwarf himself as a grown man sporting with a child. There was exquisite proportion, the purest taste, the lyric flight, brilliance that was not irrelevant or aggresive, the perfection of mechanism. Mr. Hofmann might easily have revealed to us the "heroic Chopin." As a virtuoso he might have done this. As an artist, as an interpreter of Chopin, he could not.

A spirited performance of Wagner's overture brought the close.

There will be no concerts next week.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 13, 1912

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal of Jan. 19, and at the concert of Jan. 20. He will play the Brahms concerto. Three years ago Mr. Fiedler placed Gustav Strube's symphony in B minor on a program and it will again be played the coming week. The program comprises Strube's symphony in B minor, Brahms concerto for violin in D major, and Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture.

Josef Hofmann will be soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge Thursday evening, Jan. 18. He will play the Chopin concerto in F minor which he played in Boston last week. The program will comprise the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 13, Chopin's F minor concerto, Debussy's "Iberia" and three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust."

* * *

The sale of tickets for the first of the two concerts to be given in Symphony hall by the Cecilia Society on Thursday evening, Jan. 25, will open at the box office of Symphony hall next Friday morning, Jan. 19. As already announced the Cecilia gives only one choral work with orchestra this year and that is at the first concert, when Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be sung. At the second concert in March the program will comprise choruses, with groups of songs by Mme, Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza.

Arthur Mees, the new leader of the Cecilia Society, has conducted "The Damnation of Faust" in many cities and is thoroughly familiar with it. The chorus will have the assistance of an orchestra of Symphony players. Miss Alice Nielsen will sing the part of Marguerite. It is only recently that she has been branching out in concert work and this will practically be her debut in a choral concert of large dimensions. Miss Nielsen in opera has sung both Gounod's and Boito's Marguerite. The part of Faust will be sung by George Hamlin of the Chicago opera company. Mephistopheles will be sung by Herbert Witherspoon of the Metropolitan opera company of New York. The part of Brander will be sung by L. B. Merrill.

* * *

Josef Hofmann gives a recital in Symphony hall Saturday afternoon, Jan. 20. Mr. Hofmann this year is giving three recitals in America, one in Boston, one in New York and one in Chicago; these are his only appearances besides those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His program comprises the following works: Beethoven, sonata, op. 110; "Rondo a Capriccio," "Andante Favori" and the march from "The Ruins of Athens," transcribed by Rubinstein. Chopin, "Barcarolle," nocturne in C minor, nocturne in D-flat major, valse in E minor, etudes in C sharp minor, A flat major, F major and G flat major. Sgambati, modern music: Nocturne, [illegible] "Barcelle," prelude in

---

TRAVELER,

JANUARY 13, 1912.

HOFFMANN'S RECITAL.

The last opportunity to hear Josef Hofmann this year in Boston and the only opportunity of the season to hear him in recital will come next Saturday at 2:30 P. M. in Symphony Hall. Hofmann this year is giving three recitals in America, one in Boston, one in New York and one in Chicago.

He has arranged a most comprehensive programme for his recital, and one which contains several compositions that have at least the savor of novelty.

His first group will be devoted to Beethoven, comprising the Sonata, Op. 110; "Rondo a Capriccio," "Andante Favori," and the march from "The Ruins of Athens," which was transcribed by Rubinstein. The second group on the programme will be Chopin, "Barcarolle"; Nocturne in C-minor; Nocturne in D-flat major; Valse in E-minor, and the Etudes in C-sharp minor, A-flat major, F major and G-flat major.

Modern music comprises the last group. A nocturne by Sgambati, Debussy's "Soiree Grenade" and three pieces by Rachmaninoff, "Dolichinelle," prelude in F-sharp minor and prelude in G-minor.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY.

Josef Hofmann will be soloist at the next Symphony concert in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Jan. 18. He will play the Chopin Concerto in F-Minor, with which he won such success in Boston last week. The programme will comprise the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Haydn's Symphony in G-Major, No. 13, Chopin's F-Minor Concerto, Debussy's "Iberia" and three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One of the most memorable features of the Symphony season of 1910-1911 was the debut as soloist here of Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra when he played the Beethoven Concerto. In the coming week at the 13th public rehearsal and concert, Mr. Witek will again be soloist and this year he has elected to play the Brahms' Concerto.

Three years ago Mr. Fiedler placed Gustav Strube's Symphony in B-Minor on a pragramme and it will again be played the coming week. The programme as it stands is Strube's Symphony in E-minor, Brahme's Concerto for violin in D-major and Beethoven's "Fidello" overture.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 13, 1912

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Strube's Striking Symphony to Be Heard Again—A Second Song Recital by the Notable Miss Gerhardt—Mr. Hofmann in a Recital of His Own — Mr. Schroeder Again—Miss Nielsen's and Mr. Proctor's Concert

CONCERTS are fewer next week; but one is the recital of a notable singer and another the recital of a remarkable pianist. At Jordan Hall on Thursday afternoon, Elena Garhardt will sing for a second time, again in classic and contemporary German songs. No singer to match her in interest of personality, in quality of voice, in command of vocal artistry and in warmth and discrimination of feeling has come to America to sing songs in recent years. At Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Hofmann, now established here as a pianist of the first range, will play through a generous and an interesting programme of the music of Beethoven, Chopin, Debussy and Pachmaninoff. For more virtuosi, Mr. Schroeder, the admired violoncellist, and Mr. Fischer, the pianist, announce a recital at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening, and Mme. Szumowska will continue her "lesson recitals" there on Thursday afternoon. Finally, at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mr. Fiedler will revive Mr. Strube's brilliant symphony, first heard three or four years ago, and Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, will play Brahms's concerto for violin.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

THE second half-year, as the colleges say, of the Symphony Concerts begins with the thirteenth pair on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. At them Mr. Fiedler has happily chosen to revive Mr. Strube's symphony in B minor, first played three or four years ago. It then proved exceptionally interesting, distinguished by its brevity in these long-winded days, by surprising harmonic invention, by a rich diversity of instrumental color and a pervading eloquent voice. It was a notable symphony, as contemporary symphonies go, though it was written by a member of the orchestra whose work, so far, it has crowned. It deserves to be heard again. For the rest of the programme, Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, will play Brahms's concerto for violin—music that suits the idiosyncrasies of his temperament and the qualities of his style; while for ending will come the overture that actually precedes Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio." Usually we hear one of the "Leonore" overtures, for which it was finally substituted.

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

MR. Hofmann, the pianist, will go with the Symphony Orchestra to Cambridge next Thursday, when it plays in Sanders Theatre for the fourth of its concerts in Cambridge. He will repeat there Chopin's concerto in F minor, which he played very discriminatingly and beautifully in Boston last Saturday. The purely orchestral numbers on the programme are Debussy's pictorial and impressionistic "Iberia," Haydn's [illegible] in G, Mozart's gay overture to

---

HERALD,

JANUARY 14, 1912.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Jan. 18. He will play Chopin's Concerto in F minor, with which he won such success in Boston. The program will comprise the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13; Chopin's F minor Concerto; Debussy's "Iberia" and three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust."

MR. HOFMANN'S RECITAL

The last opportunity to hear Josef Hofmann this year in Boston, and the only opportunity of the season to hear him in recital will come next Saturday afternoon when he gives a recital in Symphony Hall at 2:30. Hofmann, this year, is giving three recitals in America, one in Boston, one in New York, and one in Chicago, these being his only appearances besides those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Hofmann has arranged a comprehensive program for his recital and one which contains several compositions that have at least the savor of novelty. His first group will be devoted to Beethoven, comprising the Sonata, Op. 110; "Rondo a Capriccio"; "Andante Favori" and the March from "The Ruins of Athens," which was transcribed by Rubinstein. The second group on the program will be Chopin—"Barcarolle"; Nocturne in C minor, Nocturne in D flat major, F major and G flat major. The third will include a Nocturne by Sgambati, Debussy's "Soiree dans Grenade" and three pieces by Rachmaninoff, "Polichinelle," prelude in F sharp minor and prelude in G minor.

CECILIA CONCERT

The sale of tickets for the first of the two concerts to be given in Symphony Hall by the Cecilia Society on Thursday evening, Jan. 25, will open at the box office of Symphony Hall next Friday morning, Jan. 19. The Cecilia gives only one choral work with orchestra this year, and this is at the first concert, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." At the second concert, in March, the program will comprise Capella choruses with groups of songs by Mme. Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza.

"The Damnation of Faust" is one of the few works dating from the middle of the last century which shows few if any signs of wear. It probably has more performances in the course of a year than any other choral work with the exception of Handel's "Messiah."

Arthur Mees, the new conductor of the Cecilia, has conducted "The Damnation of Faust" many times in many cities, and is thoroughly familiar with it. Much is expected of the chorus under the new regime, for Mr. Mees has succeeded in filling its members with an enthusiasm which in recent years has been notable chiefly by its absence. Rehearsals have been well attended, and a considerable increase in membership has been noted.

The chorus will have the assistance of an orchestra composed of Symphony players ample in size for the work involved. Much interest surrounds the appearance of Miss Alice Nielsen in this, for her, new field. She will sing the part of Marguerite. It is only recently that she has been branching out in concert work, and this will practically be her debut in a choral concert of large dimensions. Miss Nielsen, in opera, appeared as Gounod's Marguerite and Boito's Marguerite.

The part of Faust will be sung by George Hamlin, who is now a member of the Chicago opera company, while Mephistopheles will be sung by Herbert Witherspoon, a member of the Metropolitan opera company of New York. The music of Brander will be sung by L. B. Merrill.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 11, 1912

DR. MUCK TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

OFFICIAL CONFIRMATION THAT HE WILL RETURN TO HIS OLD POST NEXT FALL

The management of the Symphony Orchestra officially announces this afternoon the return of Dr. Muck to be again its conductor, beginning with the concerts of next autumn. The fact of Dr. Muck's return has been a matter of common knowledge and congratulation for so long that the official bulletin can now lend only agreeable confirmation to it. The bulletin says:

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that it has at last been definitely settled that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for a term of years. Rumors of Dr. Muck's return have been published more or less of late, but all reports that the matter had been settled were decidedly premature. When he left Boston in the spring of 1908 it was generally understood that as soon as his engagement with the Royal Opera Company of Berlin was ended, that he would return to Boston to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Unexpected obstacles, however, have prevented his coming up to this time and only now have the great efforts to keep him in Germany ceased to be made.

Since Dr. Muck left Boston the German emperor has made him general musical director, which is the highest post in the imperial theatres. Great efforts were made to get him for Vienna as the successor of Weingartner and last summer the strongest inducements were held out to him to accept the post occupied by the late Felix Mottl as General Intendant of the royal theatres of Munich. None of these offers would Dr. Muck consider, for he had made up his mind definitely that once he was able to get away from Berlin he would return to Boston.

[111]

HERALD,

JANUARY 12, 1912.

DR. KARL MUCK IS COMING BACK

Settled He Will Be Conductor of Orchestra for Term of Years.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announces that it has at last been definitely settled that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony orchestra for a term of years. Rumors of Dr. Muck's return have been published more or less of late, but all reports that the matter had been settled were premature.

When he left Boston in the spring of 1908 it was generally understood that as soon as his engagement with the Royal Opera company of Berlin was ended he would return to Boston to become the conductor of the Symphony orchestra. Unexpected obstacles, however, have prevented his coming up to this time and only now have the great efforts to keep him in Germany ceased to be made.

Since Dr. Muck left Boston the German Emperor has made him general musical director, which is the highest post in the imperial theatres. Great efforts were made to get him for Vienna as the successor of Weingartner, and last summer the strongest inducements were held out to him to accept the post occupied by the late Felix Motti as general intendant of the royal theatres of Munich.

None of these offers would Dr. Muck consider, for he had made up his mind definitely that once he was able to get away from Berlin he would return to Boston.

The news that he is coming back next fall to resume the post he held with such success for two years, will be received with much pleasure by his many friends in this city.

AMERICAN

JANUARY 14, 1912

HOFMANN'S RECITAL.

Last Appearance This Year of the Brilliant Pianist Next Saturday.

The last opportunity to hear Josef Hofmann this year in Boston and the only opportunity of the season to hear him in recital will come next Saturday afternoon, when he gives a recital in Symphony Hall at 2:30. Hofmann this year is giving three recitals in America, one in Boston, one in New York and one in Chicago, these being his only appearances besides those with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He has arranged a most comprehensive program for his recital and one which contains several compositions that have at least the savor of novelty. His first group will be devoted to Beethoven, comprising the Sonata, Op. 110; "Rondo a Capriccio," "Andante Favori" and the March from "The Ruins of Athens" which was transcribed by Rubinstein. The second group on the program will be Chopin—"Barcarolle," Nocturne in C-Minor, Nocturne in D-Flat Major, F-Major and G-Flat Major.

Modern music comprises the last group. A Nocturne by Sgambata, Debussy's "Soiree Grenade" and three pieces by Rachmaninoff, "Polichinelle," Prelude in F-Sharp Minor and Prelude in G-Minor.

ANTON WITEK TO PLAY.

Concert Master of Symphony Orchestra Will Be Soloist.

One of the most memorable features of the Symphony season of 1910-1911 was the debut as soloist here of Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra when he played the Beethoven concerto. It was generally agreed that few finer performances of this master work had been heard in Boston. In the coming week at the thirteenth public rehearsal and concert, Mr. Witek will again be soloist and this year he has elected to play the Brahms' Concerto.

Three years ago Mr. Fiedler placed Gustav Strube's Symphony in B Minor on a program, and it will again be played the coming week. The program as it stands is Strube's Symphony in B Minor, Brahms's Concerto for Violin in D Major and Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture.

NEW CONDUCTOR FOR CECELIA CONCERT

"Damnation of Faust" to Be Sung by Distinguished Artists on January 25.

The sale of tickets for the first of the two concerts to be given in Symphony Hall by the Cecilia Society on Thursday evening, January 25, will open at the box office of Symphony Hall next Friday morning. As already announced, the Cecilia gives only one choral work with orchestra this year, and this is at the first concert, when Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" will be sung. At the second concert, in March, the program will comprise a Capella choruses with groups of songs by Madame Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza.

"The Damnation of Faust" is one of the few works dating from the middle of the last century which shows few, if any signs of wear. In many respects it must be regarded as Berlioz's highest achievement in music, and it probably has more performances in the course of a year than any other choral work, with the exception of Handel's "Messiah."

Mr. Arthur Mees, the new conductor of the Cecilia, has conducted "The Damnation of Faust" many times in many cities, and thus is thoroughly familiar with it. Much is expected of the chorus under the new regime, for Mr. Mees has succeeded in filling its members with an enthusiasm which in recent years has been notable chiefly by its absence. Rehearsals have been well attended and a considerable increase in membership has been noted.

The chorus will have the assistance of an orchestra composed of Symphony players ample in size for the work involved. Much interest surrounds the appearance of Miss Alice Nielsen in this, for her, new field. She will sing the part of Marguerite. It is only recently that she has been branching out in concert work and this will practically be her debut in a choral concert of large dimension. Miss Nielsen in opera has sung both Gounod's Marguerite and Boito's Marguerite.

GLOBE—

JANUARY 12, 1912.

CORDIALLY RECEIVED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Josef Hofmann, Pianist, Fill Carnegie Hall, New York City.

NEW YORK, Jan 11—Whenever the Boston Symphony Orchestra elects to play here it is assured of a warm welcome, no matter what the program. Tonight not a seat was vacant in Carnegie Hall when this fine body of musicians began its third evening concert of the season. One of the reasons for the interest was the reappearance of Josef Hofmann, the pianist.

It was unfortunate, however, that Hofmann selected so inferior a concerto as Rubinstein's No. 3 in G major. Hofmann played with every variety of tone demanded, splendid musicianship and a technique almost flawless. His efforts were enthusiastically rewarded.

JOURNAL—

JANUARY 12, 1912.

DR. KARL MUCK TO RETURN NEXT FALL

Will Conduct Symphony Orchestra for Term of Years.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for a term of years. When Dr. Muck left Boston in the spring of 1908 it was generally understood that as soon as his engagement with the Royal Opera Company of Berlin was ended he would return to Boston to become conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Unexpected obstacles, however, have prevented his coming up to this time, and only now have the efforts to keep him in Germany ceased to be made.

Since Dr. Muck left Boston the German Emperor has made him general musical director, which is the highest post in the imperial theaters. Great efforts were made to get him for Vienna as the successor of Weingartner, and last summer the strongest inducements were held out to him to accept the post occupied by the late Felix Mottl as general intendant of the Royal Theaters of Munich.

GLOBE

—JANUARY 14, 1912

Anton Witek, Soloist at the Symphony Concerts

One of the memorable features of the Symphony season of 1910-1911 was the debut as soloist here of Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, when he played the Beethoven concerto. The coming week, at the 13th public rehearsal and concert. Mr Witek will again be soloist and this year he has elected to play the Brahms concerto.

Three years ago Mr Fiedler placed Gustav Strube's Symphony in B Minor on a program and it will again be played this week. Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture will complete the selections.

Cecilia Concerts.

The sale of tickets for the first of the two concerts to be given by the Cecilia Society Thursday evening, Jan 25, will open at Symphony Hall next Friday morning. The Cecilia gives only one choral work with orchestra this year and this is at the first concert, when Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be sung. As the second concert in March the program will comprise a Capello chorus, with groups of songs by Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza.

The chorus will have the assistance of an orchestra composed of Symphony players. Much interest surrounds the appearance of Miss Alice Nielsen, who will sing the part of Marguerite. This will practically be her debut in a choral concert of large dimension. Miss Nielsen in opera has sung both Gounod's Marguerite and Boito's Marguerite.

The part of Faust will be sung by George Hamlin of the Chicago Opera Company; Mephistopheles will be sung by Herbert Witherspoon of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Brander will be sung by L. B. Merrill. The concerts will be directed by Arthur Mees, the new conductor.

Only Piano Recital Here by Josef Hofmann

The last opportunity to hear Josef Hofmann this year in Boston and the only opportunity of the season to hear him in recital will come next Saturday afternoon, when he gives a recital in Symphony Hall. Hofmann this year is giving three recitals in America, one in Boston, one in New York and one in Chicago, these being his only appear-

He has arranged a program for his recital which contains several compositions that have at least the savor of novelty. His first group will be devoted to Beethoven, comprising the sonata, op 110; "Rondo a Capriccio," "Andante Favori" and the march from "The Ruins of Athens," which was transcribed by Rubinstein.

The second group comprises a barcarolle, two nocturns, a valse and three etudes by Chopin. Modern music will be in the third part. A nocturne by Sgambati, Debussy's "Soiree Grenade" and three pieces by Rachmaninoff, "Polichinelle," prelude in F-sharp minor and prelude in G minor.

HERALD,

JANUARY 11, 1912.

KARL MUCK ACCEPTS CALL OF SYMPHONY

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announces it has at last been definitely settled that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony orchestra for a term of years.

Rumors of Dr. Muck's return have been published more or less of late, but all reports that the matter had been settled were decidedly premature. When he left Boston in the spring of 1908 it was generally understood that as soon as his engagement with the Royal Opera company of Berlin was ended he would return to Boston to become the conductor of the Symphony orchestra. Unexpected obstacles, however, have prevented his coming up to this time and only now have the great efforts to keep him in Germany ceased to be made.

Since Dr. Muck left Boston the German Emperor has made him general musical director, which is the highest post in the Imperial theatres. Great efforts were made to get him for Vienna as the successor of Weingartner, and last summer the strongest inducements were held out to him to accept the post occupied by the late Felix Mottl as general intendant of the royal theatres of Munich.

The news he is coming back next fall to resume the post he held with such success for two years will be received with much pleasure by his many friends in this city.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 11, 1912

THE RETURN OF DR. MUCK

What the public of the Symphony Concerts has long known by unofficial report, becomes official announcement this afternoon. Dr. Muck will return to the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra next autumn, free from all European engagements, prepared to give his best years and his best talents to a post that he has preferred to many another—and of high distinction—within his acceptance. On leave of absence from the Royal Opera in Berlin, he conducted here for two seasons. He would fain have continued his work in Boston; but his contracts and his "august master" recalled him imperatively. He has now fulfilled these engagements; he is a free man again. In the intervening years, he has made no secret of his desire and intention to return to the Symphony Orchestra. Regretfully on one side of the Atlantic, eagerly on the other, the way is now open to him.

Dr. Muck's service to the Symphony Orchestra in the two years of his conductorship was unique. No wonder that he has been ambitious to renew it and that Symphony Hall, in the managerial offices, on the orchestra platform, and in the auditorium, has been eager for his return. Mr. Gericke left the orchestra to Dr. Muck a perfect instrument that was beginning to be a more expressive and eloquent voice for its music than it had ever been before. Dr. Muck abated not one of these technical and æsthetic perfections. He added thereto a new ardor and a new subtlety of expression. He gave the orchestra a poetizing, dramatizing, characterizing voice. It had all the means to this high eloquence; but he gave it the impulse, led it to the accomplishment. From Mr. Gericke's hands he received also the fine tradition of catholicity, of courage for the new, of equal pains with any and all music. Dr. Muck animated and amplified this inheritance. He would, he did, vitalize the music that he played—and it traversed the whole range of the art—until each piece seemed to sound with its own voice, to give its particular pleasure, to live in its own right. By these titles Dr. Muck did the Symphony Orchestra and orchestral music in America a unique service. By these titles he proved himself a conductor of the first rank. No other is worthy of the Symphony Orchestra as it now is to its own public and to the world.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PRESS

From

Address PHILADELPHIA PA

Date

HOFMANN SOLOIST AT FINE CONCERT

Boston Symphony, Under Max Fiedler's Direction, Plays Franck's Symphony.

Program.

Debussy, Iberia: "Images" for Orchestra, No. 2.
Frank.....Symphony in D minor.
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Rubinstein...Concerto for piano and orchestra in G major, No. 3.
Berlioz..Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust."
Conductor.....Max Fiedler
Soloist.....Josef Hofmann

Max Fiedler selected an especially varied program for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, and in spite of the very bad night an audience that filled every part of the spacious building found unusual delight, even for a Boston Symphony concert. Josef Hofmann, the soloist, came in for an equal share in the enthusiasm, and the young pianist has never played with greater skill in this city, and was never the recipient of more enthusiastic applause. In this even the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler joined, and Hofmann was called to the front a number of times.

The first number on the program was a novelty, Debussy's "Iberia," which is less than two years old and only a little more than one year since it was first heard in this country. It follows out the most pronounced ideas of the modern French school, of which the composer is one of the brightest lights. It is in three movements, descriptive of an evening, night and morning in Spain. Debussy has worked out wonderfully well his subject, the first movement, the gay life of the Spanish city; the second, the quiet of the Latin night, which is especially fine music writing of this character, and the waking to life again of the Spanish people. Bells and aubades are used with good effect, and there is a Spanish atmosphere about the music that is easily recognizable.

The Symphony was Caesar Franck's D minor which is also of the modern school, and familiar to orchestra-goers of this city. It has a prime theme which is well carried out, in a varied style in all three movements. The concluding orchestra number was, three small pieces by Hector Berlioz, different in character but forming a fine combination. The Minuet is a weird and effective piece of music writing, the Ballet of Sylphs, dainty and delicate, while the closing number was the "Rakoczy March" from "The Damnation of Faust," in which the composer has worked up a delightful melody of the Hungarian gypsys.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the first movement of the Symphony was full of grace and sympathy. The middle movement was effectively played, although somewhat hurried at times, and in the last movement, the conductor worked his orchestra up to that pitch of perfection which moved the audience to more than the ordinary expression of its enthusiasm for the work. The conductor gave an admirable reading of the other orchestral numbers, and as accompaniment to the soloist, shared with Hofmann the enthusiastion that the concerto called out.

This was Josef Hofmann's first appearance here this season, and with each return he shows more signs of maturity in his work, always expressed in a greater mastery of his instrument. The Rubenstein concerto is an especially showy number, for it gives emphatic freedom to the instrument, disconnecting it entirely from the other instruments and making it stand out with more individuality. It is a favorite solo number with the pianist, who is especially partial to Russian music, and particularly to the compositions of Rubenstein. His playing showed the proper dignity, height of conception and tenderness of delivery which has marked his work of late, and he well earned all the attention that he received at the conclusion of the concerto.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Total

DR. MUCK RETURNS TO BOSTON.

BOSTON, Thursday.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of three years was announced to-day.

Since leaving here Dr. Muck has been made general musical director of the Imperial Theatres by the Kaiser.

[112]

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Establish

Debussy, Franck and Wag

MAX FIEDLER, who has frequently displayed his skill as an adroit conductor of programmes, gave new evidences in that direction at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall.

To begin with there was Debussy's gestive color, followed by Cesar Franck's gestive color, followed by Caesar Franck's symphony in D minor, with its rich orchestral combinations and its fluent melodies. For contrast, if for nothing more, the next number, Rubinstein's piano concerto in G major was interesting, and the prelude of "Die Meistersinger" brought the concert to a fitting climax and sent the big audience away in a happy mood.

All the music had been heard here before, but never so smoothly rendered as by the big band from Boston. With Josef Hofmann as the soloist even a worse concerto than this one of Rubinstein's would have been worth listening to. The pianist played it with commendable clarity, and aided its obvious quality by his own delightful personality

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

PROVIDENCE, R.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

At Symphony Concert.

In the large audience attending the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night were Mrs. William B. Weeden, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Miss Annie Henshaw, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. George Hall, Mr. Irving P. Irons, Mrs. Frank W. Matteson, Mr. George A. Freeman, Miss Edna Lewis, Miss Sarah T. Potter, Mrs. William van Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. S. S. Lovecraft, Mr. Howard P. Lovecraft, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Miss Francis Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. Walter H. Durfee, Mrs. John Dyer, Miss Elizabeth Hughes, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Herreshoff, Miss Evangeline Larry, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Hess

From EVENING BULLETIN.

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date ...

Hofmann and Boston Orchestra

Two of the four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night were of that quality known among musicians as "big" or "notable." The first was Rubenstein's Concerto in G major, which the composer himself rendered with such success during his American tour in 1872-73. It was interpreted last evening by Josef Hofmann and Mr. Fiedler's organization with a breadth and brilliancy that aroused the audience to enthusiasm exceptional even at a Boston Orchestra concert where enthusiasm is regarded usually as a matter of course.

Judging from his more robust appearance and playing, Mr. Hofmann is in better health than has been reported; his slight frame even betraying traces of stoutness, while his dynamic power has increased considerably. Five times he was called to the front, and the audience, which was large considering the bad weather, clamorously demanded an encore, but Mr. Hofmann declined, in accordance with Mr. Fiedler's seldom broken rule.

The second notable number was Caesar Franck's symphony in D-minor, recently played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, with its flowing melodies and rich color, particularly in the second allegro movement. Debussy's "Iberia," or "Images," and the Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March, completed the program. The Debussy work was fully as accentric. The Berlioz number was utilized to was impressionistic to an extreme degree, ultra-modern Debussy school could wish. It is the most ardent disciple of the in place of the customary Liszt rhapsody or Wagner overture as a tail-ender, and served admirably.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

BOSTON, Jan. 11.—Official announcement was made today by the management of the Symphony Orchestra of the return of Dr. Karl Muck to be again its conductor, beginning with concerts of next autumn.

From EVENING STAR.

Address Washington, D. C.

JAN 7

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Washington musical public will have its only opportunity to hear Josef Hofmann this season, and probably for several seasons to come, at the third Boston Symphony concert to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Mr. Hofmann has come to America this winter by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereby that organization has exclusive control of his time. He will play a dozen concerts with the orchestra and will give a single recital in Boston, New York and Chicago and then return to Europe.

In many respects the most brilliant episode of last year's Boston Symphony concerts in Washington was the appearance of this extraordinary artist, who today is generally conceded to be the greatest of the younger generation of pianists. At this concert he will play the "Concerto in F minor" by Chopin.

The orchestral program will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3; Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 13, and the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," the Will-o'-the-Wisps Minuet, Ballet of Sylphs and Racoczy March.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ENQUIRER

Address ...

Date JAN 7 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music tonight is in many respects one of the most important that Conductor Max Fiedler has ever designed for this city. Moreover, the concert gains decided interest in that it will mark the only appearance here this year of Mr. Josef Hofmann. Mr. Hofmann, who is in this country for a limited period under the exclusive control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has grown widely in the last few years in favor of the American public. With the possible exception of Paderewski, there is no pianist that draw larger houses and is received with greater enthusiasm. This condition is his just due because he is an artist of extraordinary attainment and, with all this, is modest, unassuming and a young man entirely devoted to his art.

PHOTO BY HALL'S STUDIO, N.Y.

JOSEF HOFMANN

The orchestral part of the program will be devoted entirely to French music, the composers represented being Debussy, Cesar Franck and Berlioz. The Debussy work is the "Iberia," the latest published production of his genius. It is the second of a series of three works for orchestra, which he groups under the title of "Images." The first, a "Gigue," is not yet published; the last, "Donde des Printemps," was the first given to the public. "Iberia" was first performed at a Colonial concert on February 20, 1910. The first performance in the United States was by the Philharmonic Society of New York, conducted by Gustav Mahler, on January 3, 1911.

It is in three movements, the titles of which are "In the Streets and Waysides," "The Odors of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day." It may be said that with the possible exception of the second movement, which is in Debussy's most delicate and "atmospheric" manner, "Iberia" is quite the most obvious work that he has produced.

The second number will be Cesar Franck's superb Symphony in D minor, a work which has taken its place among the classics of French music. With ears more accustomed to the methods and manners of French composers than they were when this symphony came out twenty years ago, what critics then considered the abstruse qualities of the symphony have disappeared entirely. It is a work most beautiful in melody and is wrought with consummate skill.

The final number will be the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March."

Mr. Hofmann will play the seldom heard Concerto of Rubinstein in G major, No. 3.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

From AMERICAN

Address ...

Date PHILADELPHIA, PA.

JOSEF HOFMANN IN A CONCERT AT ACADEMY

Distinguished Pianist Makes Appearance With the Boston Symphony

ATTENDANCE IS LARGE

Josef Hofmann visits Philadelphia all too rarely. The appearance of this distinguished pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in the Academy of Music is announced as his only one here this season, and perhaps for several years to come. Music lovers paid him the tribute of a large attendance, for even the city's mantle of snow failed to keep at home numerous and enthusiastic admirers of one of the leading virtuosi of the time.

JOSEF HOFMANN

The crystalline clarity of this pianist's technique, his delicacy of phrasing, command of dynamics and all the varied resources of his instrument were brilliantly displayed in Rubinstein's concerto in G major, No. 3. There was compelling beauty in Mr. Hofmann's reading of the rather suave and gentle first movement, not a little poetic imagination in the adagio, while the more spectacular effects were achieved in the allegro movement which closes the composition. Rubinstein himself played this concerto in St. Petersburg as long ago as 1854, and he gave it also during his American tour in the early seventies.

Partly because of its novelty, Debussy's "Images Pour Orchestre No. 2" proved one of the most interesting features of the concert. "Iberia" is the subtitle of this work, which may be regarded as a tone picture of certain impressions of Spanish life.

The peninsula itself, despite its productivity in the matter of "Zarzuelas," "Seguidillas," "Malaguenas," "Jotas" and other forms of lighter composition, has of late turned out comparatively few ambitious essays in music that have crossed the Pyrenees.

Jules Breton's "Dolores," it may be recalled, was once promised by Oscar Hammerstein, but the work has yet to cross the Atlantic. Outlander composers, however, have persistently strived to remedy this deficiency, as witness Chabrier with his "Espana" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moszkowski and not a few Teutonic and Muscovite musicians.

Debussy has also joined this eminent fold, and "Iberia" is redolent with Celt-Iberian color and charm, though it is still characteristic of the French composer in its rather cloudy outlines and frankly impressionistic treatment.

There are three movements, "Par les Rues et par les Cheimins" ("Along the Streets and Roads"), "Parfums de la Nuit" ("Night Perfumes") and "Le Matin d'un Jour de Fete" ("The Morning of a Fiesta Day").

No whit of the exquisite refinement and delicacy of the original conception was lost in the interpretation given under Mr. Fiedler's baton last evening. The other numbers of the program were the now familiar symphony in D minor by the Belgian, Cesar Franck, and "The Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

It may be noted that Mr. Fiedler has but two more appearances to make here as director of this orchestra. He is to return to Beerman next season, and Dr. Carl Muck will come back to this country to resume his former functions with the Boston players.

TIMES

From ...

Address ...

Date JAN 6 1912

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its second concert of the season at Parsons's theater, Monday evening, January 15. The reappearance of Harold Bauer, the great pianist, after an absence of three years, will make the event notable among the concerts of the season. Mr. Bauer has already begun an extended tour of the United States and his appearances in New York and Boston have won praise not accorded any pianist for many years. The demand for reserved seats precludes the reservation of seats later than Saturday morning of next week. Early application for tickets should be made to John M. Gallup & Co., No. 201 Asylum street. The program of the concert is published in the amusement advertisements of this paper.

From PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date ...

CESAR FRANCK SYMPHONY READ STRIKINGLY BY FIEDLER

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Reveals Technical Wonders.

HOFMANN STAR OF CONCERT

Shows Highly Developed Pianistic Powers in Rubinstein's Concerto in D Major.

With Josef Hofmann, who made his first appearance this season in New York, as "star" of the evening, and an interesting programme, which included Debussy's tripartite orchestral work, "Iberia," Cesar Franck's Symphony in D and the "Meistersinger" prelude, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall attracted a large and enthusiastic audience.

Rubinstein's concerto in D major—not quite as difficult a composition as the one in E flat played last week by Josef Lhevinne, and almost as worthless—furnished Hofmann with a vehicle for his highly developed pianistic prowess and the much-admired virtuoso acquitted himself brilliantly of his task, much to the delight of his auditors, who responded with warm applause.

The little Josef of many years ago has put on several pounds since his last appearance here and has permitted his curly hair to assume a more luxuriant and fantastic aspect. But his extraordinary vigor, zest and power remains unchanged. The verve and snap of his playing are always irresistible. Yet all the technical skill he gave to the performance of Rubinstein's concerto failed to infuse emotional meaning and vitality into the empty musical formulæ of this shallow composition, made all the more trying to the listener because presented immediately after the beautiful Franck symphony.

Debussy's "Iberia," which is the second of the famous French composer's "Images pour Orchestre," had its first production anywhere on February 29, 1910, in Paris, and was heard for the first time in America at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Gustav Mahler on January 3 of last year. It comprises three impressionistic tone-pictures on Spanish subjects. By employing in his orchestra such instruments as a Basque drum, castagnettes, xylophone, celesta, cymbals, bells and harps, the composer has provided himself with resonant pigments that lend themselves well to the atmosphere he evokes. These resources he manipulates not only with extraordinary virtuosity, but with fine poetic imagination. There are concrete suggestions of locality and action. Characteristic dance rhythms are used cunningly and effectively. The ear catches the jingling of bells, the "joyous sounds of wayfarers," as a French critics has noted, and "bells and aubades" announcing the dawn.

But there is more than superficial description in this music. Underneath the tintinnabulations of the xylophone, the flashes of the celesta, the clangor of bells and the glissandos of the harps there are subtle harmonies, fascinating color-combinations and strangely mingled rhythms which cast a peculiar spell on the imagination. The work does not seem as spontaneous and natural as some of Debussy's earlier compositions. At times the composer appears to flaunt his virtuosity. On the other hand, Debussy shows here an unusual amount of vigor and masculinity. The first movement, so full of color, is more important than the other two; the second perhaps is the weakest. In the first part of the last movement there are exquisitely poetic effects, but in its progress this section of the tonal "Image" grows somewhat labored and artificial.

If the technical wonders of the Boston Orchestra were revealed strikingly in Debussy's extremely exacting work, the noble sonority, euphony and expressive power of that incomparable polyphonic instrument stood forth more gloriously still in Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, which Fiedler probably had placed on the programme immediately after "Iberia" in order to bring out forcibly by close juxtaposition with so scintillant and virtuosic a piece the extraordinary sincerity and emotional eloquence of the older composer. Fiedler's profoundly affecting reading of the symphony, which could have been the result only of the loftiest inspiration, came to this writer as a revelation.

It was the third time the D minor symphony had been heard in New York this season, but to many, no doubt, thanks to Fiedler and his incomparable orchestra, it must have carried home, as it did to me, particularly in the opening movement, the first convincing message of the composer's genius. How superficial it seems to accuse Franck of leaning on Wagner in his chromatic themes one can only realize when the underlying feelings he expresses—so essentially different from those of the great operatic composer—have been thoroughly absorbed. These ideas, forming the true emotional content of the symphony, Fiedler set forth last night with extraordinary tenderness and pathos. It was as if the soul of the unhappy composer, crushed with grief yet humble and penitent in his sorrow and crying for relief with suppliant hands, had been exposed to view.

M. S.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Establish

Die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters hat offiziell angekündigt, daß Herr Dr. Karl Muck, vom nächsten Herbste an, wieder die Leitung des berühmten Orchestrs übernehmen wird und für mehrere Jahre kontraktlich verpflichtet worden ist.

[113]

From EAGLE,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 13 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Programme of Mingled Interest Well Given—Josef Hofmann's Superb Work.

A somewhat singular programme, both in selection and placement, was offered by Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he gave in the opera house of the Academy of Music last evening, before an audience that filled the auditorium, the third in its series of five Philharmonic concerts. As a selection, the Haydn "Symphony in G major," which was the opening number, was largely educational, with its narrow economy of thematic material. The Enesco "Suite for Orchestra," No. 9, by Georges Enesco, withal its promising introduction, became dry with its many repetitions, with its lack of emotional curve, and with its suggestions of Wagner and Debussy, and its slighter suggestions of individuality. The redeeming features were the Chopin "Concerto for piano and orchestra," in F minor, No. 2, opus 21, with Josef Hofmann at the piano, and three Berlioz pieces that closed the concert with a flourish. As to placement, the Chopin "Concerto" might reasonably have followed the "heavier" number, and avoided the monotony of long-drawn-out elementary harmonies.

Josef Hofmann is a master of the piano, has long been established. He showed last night his ability in self-restraint, for this quality was demanded in the Chopin number, with the orchestra. His recitals have demonstrated that he knows well how and when to let loose the dynamics, but never was his entire sanity and good judgment better shown than in his playing the Chopin concerto. In the first movement, "maestoso," Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Hofmann united their forces in a noble delivery. That in itself was notable, for Chopin's music as a rule can scarcely be termed noble. It is more apt to be introspective and subjective. In the "larghetto" movement that followed the "maestoso," Chopin becomes almost objective, although he still maintains a psychological outlook. This soul-expression Mr. Hofmann seized upon with true introspection, tempering the keys to delicacy and giving a picture of a soul tortured, then redeemed and brought to rest in ineffable rapture. Hofmann's pearly runs, his management of chromatics, his lace and embroidery work touched perfection, especially in the last movement, "allegro vivace," where his splendid command of technique of the piano mechanism and power of interpretation were undeniably in evidence.

The Enesco "Suite" started out with great promise, in the vein of a violin concerto, with the grandeur of thirty or more violins in unison in bold, annunciatory and challenging phrases, now rising to reckless abandon and anon subsiding to almost a whisper, when this introductory movement glided into a "menuet lent" movement, of length, and also of Debussylike lack of harmonic curve, though filled with subtle harmonies, cropping out in the various choirs.

It was a roused Debussy that sounded in his weavy way in the "finals," with a message that soon subsided into the hazy atmosphere. As a whole, it seemed as though Georges Enesco, being a fine violinist, had undertaken a larger task in this "Suite" than he knew how to masterfully carry out.

The broad harmonies in the Haydn "Symphony" were restful, at a time when rest was not especially needed, which was at the beginning of the concert. Old ways of color, the passing of themes from one choir to another in the "largo" movement, were admirably brought out by Mr. Fielder. At all times he had absolute command of his men, and they followed him lovingly. In the "menuetto Trio" movement, the quaint mingling of Celtic and Germanic themes, contiguously, gave a singularly beautiful effect, while in the final "allegro con spirito" movement the cropping out of an old English country dance, with its repetition after repetition, made for jollity.

The Berlioz numbers were received by the audience with keen appreciation. There was the dainty "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," the delicious, feathery-light, and all too brief, "Ballet of the Sylphs," and the rousing "Rakoczy March," from "The Damnation of Faust." It was a fine ending to the concert.

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

Hofmann, Pianist, At Boston Symphony Tonight

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will make his first Baltimore appearance this season as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric tonight.

Hofmann's number will be the Second Concerto of Chopin, the F minor, which is less frequently heard than some of the others. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Eroica," and three familiar orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the "Dance of the Sylphs," "The Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" and "Rakoczy March"—will complete the program.

The concert is the third of the Symphony's present season at the Lyric, and will probably be the last occasion but two of hearing the orchestra under Max Fiedler.

From STANDARD UNION,
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date JAN 3 1912

JOSEF HOFMANN PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Josef Hofmann, the most famous of the pianists who now regularly visit this country, received his customary ovation when he made his bow at the Academy of Music last evening, proceeded to play with perhaps more than his usual spirit and dash and with all his quite unusual technical skill, and earned a real triumph. Hofmann's playing of the Chopin concerto in F minor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was superb. It might have been thought that the difficulties of the selection would tax the fingering dexterity of any pianist—not so Hofmann last night. He sailed through the intricacies of the concerto with flying colors, and never were the sweetly melodic beauties, so typically Chopin, of the second, or larghetto number, so apparent.

It was the third concert of the series under the auspices of the Institute and the Philharmanic Society. Every seat was taken and the varied programme as presented by the incomparable orchestra was keenly enjoyed. First there came the Haydn symphony in G major—so simple, with its exquisite largo and its two pretty dance themes. Next followed Chopin, and Hofmann's playing seemed to transport the hearer—to lift him out of his environment—to make him forget the bitter cold night without, and at least try to forget for a while the tied-up B. R. T. cars. The third number was the Orchestral Suite, No. 9, of Georges Enesco, a young man living to-day in Paris, who at times appears to have a real melodic inspiration, and then seems to be trying to outdo Debussy. A fitting close to the evening was the trilogy from the Berlioz "Faust" suite—the "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps," the "Ballet of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March."

A discussion of the orchestral works of the evening will naturally centre about the Enesco suite. This is the composition Gustav Mahler was accused of mutilating in his presentation of it at the Academy last winter. A most uncommon prelude, with all the strings playing in unison, is perhaps the most daring of the composer's flights of imagination. To entrust this to an orchestra less gifted with superior violinists than the Boston would perhaps be calamitous. The movement leads directly into a slow minuet, and there the fireworks begin. In one spot no less than fourteen separate orchestral voices are singing, a startling contrast to the prelude. Enesco's orchestral color scheme at times is more vague and bewildering than any effect of Debussy or Strauss. Some of the discords can be likened to nothing so much as to a factory whistle! But always it resolves itself into a theme, or a progression, or a mere chord, that saves it and that betokens the genius of the creator of the piece. Were it not for the continuous thread that binds the suite into a definite unity, it would be anything but music. As it is, the suite is a theme for discussion rather than a delight to the melody-loving ear.

The more one hears of Enesco, the more one loves Haydn, one old gentleman was heard to remark upon leaving the Opera House. The fact that the event of the greatest importance historically was the first performance here of the suite in full need not detract from the impression left by the finale of the Haydn symphony or the ballet of the sylphs from the "Faust" suite. Both were marvelous pieces of dainty workmanship. Mr. Fiedler's band of musicians keeps improving on acquaintance, and one wonders how many more delights are in store for the Boston Symphony patrons.

From STANDARD UNION,
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Date JAN 14 1912

Harold Bauer is to be in Brooklyn in recital on Tuesday evening next, appearing under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, in music hall, Academy of Music, the occasion to be the first special piano recital of the Institute's season. This pianist has been heard so often in Brooklyn as to need no introduction to its music-loving public, for he has played here on most, if not all, of his previous five tours of this country, the Boston Symphony Orchestra having had the distinction of introducing this eminent artist to the United States in a symphony concert in Boston, on Dec. 1, 1900, when he was the soloist. In a recent press report of a concert the music critic said of Bauer: "One need not be a musician to listen to him. He makes the meaning of the composer so clear that a person with the least conception of harmony could hear and enjoy. His playing is the absolute perfection of interpretation." Mr. Bauer will play five numbers: The "Toccata" in D major, Bach; "Etudes Symphoniques," Schumann; ballade in F and Barcarolle, Chopin; melody, Gluck-Sgambati, and "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt.

From CITIZEN,
Address Brooklyn, N. JAN 13 1912
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT

Deligtful Programe Finely Played.

JOSEF HOFMANN THE SOLOIST

Chopin Concerto, Haydn Symphony, Enesco Suite and Berlioz's Excerpts—Some Readings of Beauty and Inspiration.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music. The programme presented was: Haydn's Symphony in G Major, Chopin's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in F Minor; Georges Enesco, Suite for Orchestra No. 9; Berlioz's Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisp," "Ballet of Sylphs," and Rakoczy's march from "The Damnation of Faust." Josef Hofmann, pianist, was the soloist.

Mr. Fiedler has firmly established his position as a conductor of marked ability, of great authority and one endowed with the rare gifts of imagination and poetic insight. In his repose and authoratative manner he more nearly resembles Theodore Thomas, perhaps, than any other conductor of recent years. His departure at the close of the present season is to be regretted.

Thomas was once asked why he did not present Haydn more often and gave as the reason that it was too expressive, requiring too many rehearsals. A false note, a slip in time or faulty rhythm is as fatal in a Haydn symphony as in a quartet and blurs the unity and perfection of the whole symphonic structure. No such difficulties present themselves to the virtuosi orchestra from Boston. In freshness, vivacity and joyousness, the clarity and balance and unity of the composition were present by Mr. Fiedler and his men in a delightful manner.

Mr. Hofmann's performance of the F minor concerto of Chopin revealed again the mastery, exquisite musical insight and poetry of style which characterize his interpretations. If the emotional materials which Chopin embodies in his compositions are not of the very highest, and his nature was not cast in a sublime food, the whole is redeemed by the exquisite refinement of his diction. This quality was revealed in Mr. Hofmann's perfect phrasing to which are added a singing one and vibrant and rich color effects. Chopin's music embodies that half morbid reverie, which French writers explain as the "bosoin d' aimer," and it may be that many in last night's audience did not feel this particular need, and preferred a more robust utterance.

The keen, delicate sensitiveness of Chopin's thought is sometimes marred by the querulousness of an invalid.

It is more than doubtful whether Chopin wrote the orchestral part of this concerto, for his knowledge of instrumentation was slender. The opening tulli is long, and rather spoils the effect of the solo which follows, robbing the piano part of its incomparable beauty.

The novelty of the evening was the suite for orchestra by Georges Enesco which was played for the first time in this city by the Philharmonic Society in January, 1911. It is ultra modern in form and conception, and its ancestry can be traced to "Tristan," "Till Eulenspiegel" and Debussy.

The sincerity of the writer is manifest, but detailed analysis of impressionistic mood painting of this kind is futile; it is more profitable to allow the mind to sway back and forth with the varying moods of the music. A striking peculiarity in the first movement, a prelude a l'unisson, is the division of the string band into as many as fourteen or fifteen voices. The effect may be likened to the howling of lost souls in torment, or the soughing of the wind over vast desert places—"gray plain all around where the grass grew as scant as hair in leprosy" the "ominous tract, which all agree hides the Dark Tower, the round squat turret, blind as the fool's heart." There is grim humor, too, in the work, especially in the last movement with its bizarre ending, the humor not unmixed with the horror of Childe Roland and Till Eulenspiegel.

The concert closed with a most dainty and perfect rendering of the charming and familiar music of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK CITY
Address JAN 10 1912
Date

— Dr. Karl Muck wird von Beginn der nächsten Saison an wieder das Boston Symphonie Orchester dirigiren, worüber eitel Freude und Seligkeit in der Bohnenstadt herrschen. Dr. Muck war vor sechs Jahren an Gericke's Platz an die Spitze des berühmten Orchesters berufen worden. Ein Contract mit der Berliner Hofoper zwang ihn, zwei Jahre später die liebgewonnene Stellung zu verlassen. Man hat aber immer in Boston auf seine Rückkehr gerechnet.

From PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date

HOFMANN THRILLS CROWD WITH A CHOPIN CONCERTO

Pianist Reads with Penetrative Interpretation and Energetic Skill.

ORCHESTRA GIVES NOVELTY

Boston Players Heard in Suite by Enesco Presented Here First by Mahler.

With Josef Hofmann to dispense his stellar effulgence once more, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, gave its second concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall before an audience that taxed the capacity of the house. The famous pianist, in whose career Americans have taken so deep an interest, had chosen Chopin's concerto No. 2 in F minor as a vehicle for his art, and he succeeded not only in thrilling the crowd with the electric energy and precision of his swift-flying fingers, the vigor and elasticity of his wrists, the muscular prowess of his arms and the crisp delicacy of his touch, but also in making an impression through his penetrating interpretation of the music itself. As he treated it, to be sure, the final Allegro had more brilliancy than poetry. His sympathetic performance of the Larghetto, however, was not without warmth of feeling.

Like Thursday's concert, yesterday's matinee, which opened with Haydn's symphony in G major (Breikopf and Haertel, No. 13) and closed with three excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," had as one of its musical features a work that Gustav Mahler and the Philharmonic Orchestra introduced to Americans last year. That was Georges Enesco's Suite for Orchestra (opus 9), heard for the first time in the United States on January 3, 1910, when it held a place on the same programme with Debussy's "Iberia." Thus Fiedler had drawn enough material from one of Mahler's programmes to provide two concerts of the Boston orchestra with the interest of novelty. For neither Debussy's second orchestral "Image" nor Enesco's suite had been heard in New York since that evening, except at the Philharmonic Society's usual Friday afternoon repetition.

Of Enesco's precocious talents there can be no doubt. Born in Cordaremi, Roumania, the composer is now only 30 years old. Even when a baby of 3, as Philip Hale relates in his interesting programme notes, he asked for a fiddle, and when his father, a farmer, returned from the town where he sold his produce bringing an instrument that had only three strings, this extraordinary infant manifested his disgust by saying he wanted a violin, not a toy. When he was 7, Joseph Hellmesberger, after hearing the boy, permitted him, despite his tender years, to enter the Vienna Conservatory, taking him into his own family. At 11 Georges took first prizes there for violin and harmony. Subsequently he became a pupil of Morsick in Paris and of Gabriel Faure. In 1897 he took a second "accessit" in the Conservatoire for fugue and counterpoint; in 1899 he won first prize for violin playing. Since then he has numbered among his friends and admirers such men as Faure, Massenet and Saint-Saens, not to mention many social luminaries. Besides, Enesco enjoys the distinction of being court violinist to the Queen of Roumania.

One of the most unusual features of Enesco's suite is the prelude in C major played by the strings in unison with occasional rumblings of a kettle-drum, timed in G, as a bass. The melody of that prelude, which gave an excellent opportunity to set forth the euphony and mellow beauty of the Boston Orchestra's violins, is rhapsodic in character. But somehow, despite its homophonous simplicity, that magnified violin piece seems artificial and altitudinized.

By utilizing the woodwind effectively in the following movements, Enesco created a pretty contrast and those instruments in Fieder's orchestra did not fail to exult in their virtuosity. Both the "Menuet lent" in C major and the "Intermede" in A major, which is the best of the four movements, has many Debussyisms.

There are distinct evidences, however, of the composer's nationality—Orientally exotic touches in melodic interval, rhythm and harmonic color. On the whole the work did not make as favorable an impression as at its first production. After all, it is hardly of great musical import. But Fiedler was unable to enter into the spirit of the music as Mahler did. He seemed like a man reading aloud something which he did not quite understand or for which he felt little personal interest. In a word, his interpretation was tame.

In the first movement of the Haydn symphony the orchestra was not at its best. The "Largo," however, was given with noble breadth, the "Menuetto" with great delicacy and the Finale with extraordinary speed and vivacity. The Berlioz music, comprising the "Will-o'-the-Wisps" Minuet, the Ballet of Sylphs and the Rakoczy March, received a brilliant performance.

M. S.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From AMERICA
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 10. The soloist will be Mr. Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest of the younger generation of pianists. Mr. Hofmann, who reached this country just before Christmas, comes by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra whereby that organization has exclusive control of his services during his stay in America this season, and there is no possible chance of his appearing in this city again during this season and probably for several seasons to come.

[114]

From EVENING GLOBE,
New York City.
Address
Date JAN 12 1912

Boston Symphony With Hofmann as Solo Pianist

Large and Enthusiastic Audience Listens to Uncommonly Interesting Concert — "Rigoletto" at the Opera for First Time This Season.

Josef Hofmann and an unusually interesting programme distinguished the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Hofmann is in this country for just a few concerts, mainly with the Boston orchestra, and on this occasion he chose to play Rubinstein's piano concerto in G major (No. 3), which must have been new to almost every member of the great audience, and which is also something of a musical curiosity. Besides this interesting number, Mr. Fiedler elected to bring forward Debussy's "Iberia," which had been heard here previously only at a pair of Philharmonic concerts directed by Gustav Mahler almost exactly a year ago, and César Franck's glorious D minor symphony. Although these three works were quite enough for one evening, Mr. Fiedler needlessly added thereto the "Meistersinger" prelude. Nor was the arrangement of the list happy, beginning with the "Iberia," followed immediately by the symphony. Still, gratitude is due Mr. Fiedler for putting these interesting pieces on his programme, awkwardly though he marshalled them.

Rubinstein wrote one concerto which has become a classic of the pianist's repertory, the fourth, in D minor. The fifth, in E flat, Mr. Lhevinne plays here occasionally from time to time; no one else does, thank heaven! The other three had long been consigned to oblivion when Mr. Hofmann, who doubtless finds the list of available piano concertos distressingly small, though he has written several himself, took this one by his former master down from the shelf, blew the dust from its pages, and exhibited it in Carnegie Hall last night. The G major concerto of Rubinstein was first brought out nearly sixty years ago. The composer had it in his repertory when he visited this country in 1872-3, and here let us without further ado quote the programme notes:

"It is said that Rubinstein when he played the concerto in New York, finding at a rehearsal that the close of the last movement caused the orchestra trouble, gave the following explanation of the concerto: 'In the first movement the piano repeatedly requests admittance into the temple of the orchestra. The orchestra takes the matter into consideration, and decides to test the capabilities of the piano. After frequent consultations and trials the orchestra concludes that the piano is not worthy to enter into its sanctuary. In the second movement the piano bemoans its fate, but soon recovers its equanimity and asserts its dignity. The beginning of the last movement represents the piano as repeating its requests to be admitted. Again consultations are held, during which single instruments express their opinions. The decision of the orchestra is again adverse to the appeals of the piano. Now the piano loses its temper and challenges the orchestra to imitate what the piano can do, and in the tumult of this attempt the concerto closes.'"

Certainly a "programme" with a vengeance! For two movements the concerto hardly lived up to its author's description. Indeed, they might be dismissed in a convenient monosyllable as trash. But there is some music in the finale, which becomes extremely effective in the struggle between piano and orchestra at the very end. Perhaps Mr. Hofmann resurrected the concerto for this one page. At any rate, he and the men from Boston delivered it with overwhelming effectiveness. Not that Mr. Hofmann slighted what went before. On the contrary, he played with a pupil's devotion and all the resources of his own magnificent art. His performance was applauded enthusiastically.

Debussy's fascinating impressions of Spain gain with a rehearing. Moreover, they were played last night more sympathetically than a year ago. Mahler did not shine as a conductor of Debussy; his passion for accentuating detail was at variance with the spirit of impressionistic music. Mr. Fiedler had more success in subordinating detail to the general effect. It was a pleasure to hear the Franck symphony True, and happily, it is no longer a neglected masterpiece—did not the Symphony Society play it here last season and the Philharmonic this?—but the public is not yet familiar enough with its transcendent beauties. The performance last night showed them to advantage. The pleasure of the audience was unmistakable, and at length Mr. Fiedler summoned his men to rise and acknowledge with him the applause.

From STANDARD-UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date JAN 12 1912

TELLS OF "EGOTISM" OF GUSTAV MAHLER

Institute Lecturer Tells How Great Director Used the Blue Pencil.

COMPOSITION "MUTILATED."

Boston Symphony to Play Enesco Suite To-night.

In lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Howard Brockway, the American composer, gave the lecture recital on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the opera house of that building this evening. He played from the Haydn Symphony in G major a few illustrative bits, giving the most of the time to the suite for orchestra, opus 9, by the young Roumanian composer, Georges Enesco, which has had but few performances in the United States.

It was first given in Manhattan by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, on Jan. 3 of last year, in Brooklyn at a Sunday afternoon concert a short time later, and in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on April 1 of this year. Unable to obtain a copy of the score in a music store, Mr. Brockway used that from which the late Gustav Mahler led, finding in it as marked with blue pencil, in rewritten orchestral passages, or in passages put an octave higher, "a mutilation that is a surprising evidence of egotism in a great conductor. But," he continued, "I think to-morrow night you will hear it in its original form, for Mr. Fiedler is too good a conductor—he has too much respect for the work of a composer—to make such alterations of the score."

That there are many repetitions in the composition was confirmed by Mr. Brockway, who ascribed some of this tendency to the youth of the composer. The suite, in four movements, is made up of a prelude and a slow minuet, which are played without intermission, an intermezzo and a finale. The first was called "very daring" and a "tour de force," with the strings and the kettle drum playing entirely in unison throughout. In one place, he said, it is reminiscent of the prelude to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," although having decided individuality.

In pointing out evidences of Enesco's remarkable color sense, Mr. Brockway mentioned the strong influence the youthful composer has evidently felt from the modern French school—Enesco is now studying in Paris—finding in an incident in the wood-wind a place where he shows the influence of Debussy.

"Not even four hands on the piano can give this as it should be," Mr. Brockway said, as he played exquisite passages, showing in their unfolding how the portion allotted to the different choirs in an orchestra is built into the perfect whole. "The close of this is one of the most remarkable orchestral effects that has ever been planned," he said.

In the Intermezzo, which Gustav Mahler omitted entirely, the low tones and the use of the harp are noticeable, and in this movement the influence of Debussy is more than ever evident, while the Finale is decidedly Slavic. When speaking of the music of the French color, Mr. Brockway said that it is as impressionistic as that school of painting in France, and that it is not to be taken apart and studied bit by bit, but, to get the best from it, it must be heard by those who are in sympathy with it. To resolve a certain dreamy progression of notes into a chord—and Mr. Brockway played both progression and chord—produced a sound that he likened to "a distant locomotive or a factory whistle."

Mr. Brockway closed the lecture with a few selections from the "Faust" suite of Berlioz, including the famous "Rakoczy March," which is to end to-night's programme.

From
Address
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Georges Enesco's Suite and Hofmann's Playing Please Large Audience.

The third matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present season in this city took place yesterday at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Haydn's G major symphony, No. 13; Chopin's F minor concerto, Georges Enesco's suite, opus 9, for orchestra, and the minuet, sylph dance and Rakoczy march from the "Damnation of Faust." The solo performer was again Josef Hofmann. The house was sold out and many people were turned away.

The programme was not one to call for much comment. The suite of Enesco was produced here by the Philharmonic Society under Mr. Mahler on January 3 of last year. It is an interesting composition because of the brilliancy of its style and the opulence of its orchestration. The opening measures, written for strings in unison, is a most admirable use of an old effect, while the working out of the first movement shows fancy and fine musicianship. The suite will undoubtedly be heard again, but it may well be doubted whether it will be played with such exquisite tonal beauty and such finely wrought nuances.

Mr. Hofmann pleased by the clear fluency of his performance of the concerto and by his delightful freedom from mannerisms. It is the custom to sentimentalize Chopin to the last degree, but this Mr. Hofmann declined to do. He treated the music with respect and interpreted it with gentleness and dignity, but without exaggeration. His finger technic must have been a lesson to young pianists who had the good fortune to be present. The orchestra played the symphony with beautiful clarity and with dainty style.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

HAYDN, HOFMANN AT THE SYMPHONY

Great Audience at Concert in Carnegie Hall Given by Boston Orchestra.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Just as a change, it was pleasing and refreshing to hear Haydn yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The father of the symphonic form has been cold-shouldered lately. He seems too simple to attract our great conductors. But, though so simple by comparison with Beethoven, Haydn was a master. And he had the unusual quality of being cheerful.

An excellent proof (if proof were needed) of his cheerfulness, his Thirteenth Symphony, in G, was the first number in the programme played by the Bostonians yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The seats were all sold out before Max Fiedler, the conductor, took his place. And the great audience was delighted by the breadth and fine simplicity and charm with which the unquestionably simple work was rendered by the Boston players.

The G major symphony was composed in 1787. But it has not yet lost its freshness. Of the four movements in this lovely composition the most popular and attractive is the final (allegro), which has fancy, grace and lightness of an unusual kind. The orchestra did justice to that movement and to the three others.

Josef Hofmann was, for the second time last week, the soloist yesterday. With the orchestra, he gave a very fine and honest interpretation of Chopin's F minor Concerto, playing the first movement (maestoso) with directness, force and style; putting poetry, without affectation, into the larghetto, and outdoing himself by his delicate and effective performance of the concluding allegro.

The programme of the Bostonians included Georges Enesco's Suite (No. 9) for orchestra, a most interesting work, and three well-known numbers from the "Damnation of Faust," of Berlioz.

From EVENING NEWS,
Baltimore, Md.
Address
Date

JOSEF HOFMANN'S TALENT AT ITS BEST.

Third Concert Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Remarkably Successful.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Lyric last evening, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, was a remarkably successful function, partly because of the wisely-chosen and well-arranged program which was presented, but still more because the performance was highly artistic.

Last evening's concert accentuated the fact that Mr. Higginson has spared no trouble in collecting an orchestra composed exclusively of virtuosi. If one considers the eight contrabassi, or any instrumental detail between them and the piccolo, there are no weak spots, but the wood wind are perhaps more pronouncedly distinguished than any other choir. Some of the artists in this choir have unique command of their instruments and gratifying apprehension of values. They draw surprisingly expressive tone qualities from their instruments and are dependably logical.

One can have such an aggregation of individual adequacy and still fail of a satisfactory ensemble, for the unity of purpose and effort which alone can attain this desideratum must necessarily be the clear expression of the conductor's conceptions, communicated through hand and eye. Mr. Fiedler's adjustments in Beethoven's "Eroica" and in the accompaniment to Mr. Hofmann's solo were exceedingly fine. The symphony was most effectively read, none of its nobility being elided or veiled; indeed, this greatest of the master's orchestral work was so worthily performed that it gave unstinted pleasure to the musical listeners.

Josef Hofmann is certainly a phenomenon. He has almost dazzling control of the keyboard, has a keen sense for beauty of tone and for logical phrasing, and yet he seems to hold himself in leash. He does not often allow music to engage his emotions in its performance. He apparently reserves enthusiasm for home use, giving the public only the fruits of his intellect, taste and fingers, but these fruits are delicious. Mr. Hofmann's performance of the Chopin concerto was masterly, and it aroused great enthusiasm.

The concert closed with three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Will o' the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March," which were much enjoyed.

O. B. B.

From EVENING POST,
New York City.
Address
Date JAN 12 1912

The Boston Orchestra.

A consistently good programme has come to be something of a rarity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night's concert at Carnegie Hall was no exception to this rule. It ended with the "Meistersinger" overture, to be sure, and, as this was excellently played, the audience went home in good humor. But the first two numbers were Debussy's "Iberia" and the César Franck symphony, and the fact speaks for itself. The Debussy work will be remembered from last year, when Gustav Mahler brought it out at a Philharmonic concert. No doubt, it contains moments of picturesque atmosphere and beauty of coloring, but for the most part it is the old story—dulness. Dulness, too, pervades the Franck symphony, though it has its oases. Both works were admirably done by the Bostonians.

The soloist was Josef Hofmann, who made his reappearance for the year, playing Rubinstein's G major concerto. One always feels devoutly thankful to the pianist who does not neglect his Rubinstein, and Mr. Hofmann is one of this number. There is a habit among supercilious musicians to look upon Rubinstein as outmoded, but by exercising a little intelligence and discretion artists can easily separate this composer's grain from his chaff, and convince the public of the gross errors of his detractors. Mr. Hofmann received a veritable ovation after his performance last night. It was a superb one, in truth, which not more than one or two living pianists could have equalled, and none surpassed. The concerto itself does not equal the D minor in melodic breadth and richness of content, though it is somewhat better than the one in which Josef Lhévinne was heard last week, and its slow movement is poetic. Mr. Hofmann conquered its technical obstacles with ease, and played with splendid quality of tone and great brilliancy of effect.

From EVENING GLOBE,
New York City.
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PAY DR. MUCK $28,000 SALARY

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Kaiser's Royal Opera in Berlin, has concluded negotiations with Col. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1913.

Dr. Muck will receive $28,000 for the season's work. It is said that Toscanini is the only conductor who ever received a greater salary. The highest salary the New York Philharmonic Society ever paid was $25,000. Herr Stransky, the present leader of the society, is understood to receive $10,000.

From WORLD
New York City.
Address
Date

MUCK RETURNS TO BOSTON.

BOSTON, Jan. 11.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of three years was announced to-day. Since leaving Boston Dr. Muck had been made general musical director of the Imperial theatres by the German Emperor.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date JAN 14 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Symphony by Haydn, a Suite by Enesco—Josef Hofmann Soloist.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completing the work of the third visit to New York, took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. It played first Haydn's symphony in G, a familiar one variously known as No. 13 in Breitkopf & Härdt's edition, No. 8 in Peters's edition, by other numbers in other editions, "Letter V" in the London Philharmonic Society's catalogue, and No. 58 in the Paris Conservatory's catalogue. Now that a complete and definitive edition of all Haydn's works is in course of publication, may not the numbering of this edition be adopted, to the exclusion of all previous attempts, as the identification of his numerous symphonies and string quartets?

Mr. Fielder and his men delighted in giving a performance of this symphony of the utmost clearness and delicacy, crisp in rhythm, tonal loveliness, and transparency, and full of the spirit and joy of living that its four movements indorse. Georges Enesco's suite for orchestra, Op. 9, was another important number of the programme. It had been heard here before; Mr. Mahler produced it for the first time with the Philharmonic Society a year ago. It scarcely gave so much pleasure on a rehearing as it did at its first performance. The long prelude in unison for strings becomes tiresome before it finally merges into the slow minuet that follows it. The ear craves for harmony long before the end comes, and is not satisfied. And yet the interminable rhapsodizing of these things has a strange exotic charm, as if it belonged to the folk-song of some far-away people; and it seems a pity that the composer has sacrificed this charm to an idea that is so unsuccessful as that of his unison treatment. The slow "intermède" is not without interest and originality; there are fleeting suggestions of Gregorian tones in this, and some unfamiliar orchestral color.

In the finale there is brilliancy and dash, something barbaric in character; and, indeed, all this music has a touch of the Oriental. It suffers, however, from a monotony in the composer's style, which is probably born of inexperience. In his very suggestive little book, recently published, on "Musical Composition," Sir Charles Stanford several times remarks on the usefulness of rests, which are "one of the essentials of composition. A piece of music has to breathe, like a human being; the rests are the breathing places. The absence of them invariably results in stodginess and monotony." Mr. Enesco has kept most of his instruments at work most of the time, after he has emerged from his first movement, and the result goes far to corroborate Sir Charles's observation. There is a quality in the music, however, that marks its composer as not to be counted among the commonplace. The audience did not find much in it, and took a very languid interest. The last number was the group of orchestral pieces from Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust."

Josef Hofmann was again the soloist, and played this time Chopin's F-minor concerto, a work that has not recently appeared often on the programmes of pianists. He played it with exquisite grace, tenderness, and poetry, yet without effeminacy, without a trace of sentimentality. The ravishing beauty of his tone in all its variety of color, the aristocratic phrasing, the delicate clarity of his articulation of the passage work that gave it nothing of dryness and took from it nothing of its shimmering opalescence—these and many other details of Mr. Hofmann's art were a source of unceasing delight.

EVENING TELEGRAPH,
Philadelphia, Pa.

OPERA and CONCERT

"La Boheme" for Only Time—Hofmann and Boston Symphony—Philadelphia Orchestra Resumes Season—Musical Events.

THE program of the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, with the exception of Josef Hofmann's pianoforte number, is made up entirely of French music, the composers represented being Debussy, Franck and Berlioz. Mr. Hofmann, whose only appearance this will be in Philadelphia during the season, will play Rubinstein's seldom heard Concerto in G major, No. 3. The first number will be Debussy's "Iberia." This is the second of three pieces for orchestra, grouped under the general title of "Images." The first, the "Gigue," is not yet published. The last, the "Ronde des Printemps," was the first that was made known to the public. "Iberia" is in three parts: "In the Streets and Waysides," "The Odors of the Night," and "The Morning of a Fete Day." The second movement (slow), is in Debussy's most delicate manner, while the others are vivid with Spanish color. The second number will be Franck's Symphony in D minor, already known here. Though regarded at first as abstruse and difficult to understand, it has, through repeated hearings and on account of better knowledge of modern French music, taken a place among the popular symphonies. The final number will be of the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March."

The Philade[illegible]

From TIMES,
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Estabi 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES CAPITAL AUDIENCE

Old Organization Gives Delightful Program—Hoffman Soloist.

The usual capacity audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert yesterday afternoon. An interesting though conventional program, comprising the "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, the Hadyn Symphony in G minor, and three numbers from the "Damnation of Faust," was warmly applauded.

Washington audiences have come to expect technical perfection from this great orchestra almost as a matter of course. In Dr. Fiedler's able hands, it is as a single solo instrument, responsive to the slightest wish of its conductor.

Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3, the last and greatest of the Leonora overtures, was nobly given throughout, from the first grim chords of the introduction, pregnant with sinister foreboding, to the exultant paean of the finale.

Misguided persons who imagine that such masterpieces are the fruit of a momentary inspiration, will find it interesting to compare this overture with its predecessors of the same name. In no other way can one realize what weeks of agonizing toil were required to produce a Beethoven masterpiece.

Characteristic Work.

The Hadyn Symphony is a characteristic work of the "Addison of music." Exquisite in finish, eloquent with a rhetorician's disdain for all emotion not controlled by reason, it is a delightful contrast to the relatively crude productions of contemporary composers. The Largo with its winning melody, played by the cellos, with pianissimo embellishments by the violins, was especially effective.

The Berlioz numbers are but hints of the beauties of that colossal but much neglected opera which they serve to adorn. Those who have been raised on the sugary plantations of Gounod and Delibes will find it hard to believe that these pieces were written by a Frenchman; for in them are found qualities regrettably rare in French music—the absence of tawdry theatricalism and the profound musical (not literary) erudition.

Josef Hoffman was the assisting artist. His name is not new to concert goers. That rara avis, a youthful prodigy who outlived his knickerbockers, he has ever been recognized as a talented young pianist although until recently, he was not accorded the full measure of appreciation which his poetic and scholarly interpretations deserved. Some concert goers will remember an afternoon not many years ago, when his name, together with those of Kreisler and Gerardy was not enough of a drawing card to fill a local theater.

Tide Turns.

But the tide of public opinion has turned and Mr. Hoffman is the pianistic hero of the day. The F minor Concerto of Chopin, which he played, is one of the composer's earlier works.

Although somewhat eclectic in style, and hardly hinting at what the future Chopin was to bring forth, it is nevertheless, a vehicle admirably adapted to the naive lyricism of Mr. Hoffman's playing. Every moment was made delightful by the crisp technique and the limpid touch of the pianist. His best work was in the larghetto where the silvery notes of the piano against a sombre background of droning violins and pizzicato basses were particularly enchanting. JULIA MURDOCH.

From
Address
Date JAN 14 1912

Estabi

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN.

Plays the Thirteenth Symphony of Haydn Effectively.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. As a sort of counter-active to the Debussyism of Thursday night it played under the direction of Max Fiedler the Thirteenth Symphony of Haydn. The second movement was especially effective, while the last was rendered with remarkable grace and precision.

A suite for orchestra by Georges Enesco, a Roumanian, living in Paris, was more or less new to the audience. It pleases more by its ingenuity of treatment rather than by its fund of musical ideas, and may be characterized as moderately modern.

Three numbers of Berlioz were heartily welcomed by the great gathering of amateurs of good music who attend these concerts. They were the familiar trio from the Berlioz "Damnation de Faust," "The Dance of the Will o' the Wisps," "The Dance of the Sylphs" and the Rakoczy March. The soloist was Josef Hofmann, who played Chopin's Second Concerto amid customary enthusiasm.

From RECORD.
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

JOSEF HOFMANN WITH ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony's Program. Metropolitan Opera Company in Puccini's "La Boheme."

A SCHUBERT SYMPHONY

Murray Davey to Sing at Academy—Fortnightly Club—Leo Ornstein Recital.

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music tomorrow night is in many respects one of the most important that Conductor Max Fiedler has ever designed for this city. Moreover, the concert gains decid[illegible] that it will mark the only appearance here this year of Josef [illegible] is in this country for a limited period under the exclusive control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the possible exception of Paderewski, there is no pianist that draws larger houses or who is received with greater enthusiasm season. This condition is his due, because he is an artist of extraordinary attainment, and with all this is modest and unassuming and entirely devoted to his art.

The orchestral part of the program will be devoted to French music, the composers represented being Debussy, Cesar Franck and Berlioz. The Debussy work is the "Iberia," the latest published production of his genius. It is the second of a series of three works for orchestra which he groups under the title of "Images." The first, a "Gigue," is not yet published, the last, "Ronde des Printemps," was the first given to the public. "Iberia" was first performed at a Colonne concert on February 20, 1910. The first performance in the United States was by the Philharmonic Society, of New York, conducted by Gustav Mahler, on January 3, 1911. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played "Iberia" for the first time last April, repeating it at the tenth concert two weeks ago. It is in three movements, the titles of which are "In the Streets and Waysides," "The Odors of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day." It may be said with the possible exception of the second movement, which is in Debussy's most delicate and "atmospheric" manner, "Iberia" is quite the most obvious work that he has produced. It reeks with color of Spain, and, while differing decidedly from such works as Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice and Chabrier's "Espagne," the impression left of Spain is said to be even more vivid than from either of the other works.

The second number will be Cesar Franck's superb symphony in D minor, a work which has come to take its place among the classics of French music. It is a work most beautiful in melody and is wrought with consummate skill.

The final number will be the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March."

Hofmann will play the seldom-heard concerto of Rubinstein in G major, No. 3.

From NEW YORK HERALD
Address
Date JAN 12 1912

Freakish Music Made Smooth by Men from Boston

Mons. Debussy's "Iberia" Symphony a Feature of Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Music that not so long ago hardly would have been considered sane sounded almost commonplace at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night in comparison with music that even more recently would have been acquitted of criminal intent only on the ground of insanity. For César Franck's D major symphony, a freak in 1889, seemed last night a smoothly flowing classic in comparison with Mons. Debussy's "Iberia."

This was not, as some might have supposed, a heated argument between a Frenchman and a Spaniard on the Moroccan question, with an intermezzo for refreshments, but a series of "Images" painted, not, as usual with Debussy, in pale pastels, but in the warmest colors of the modern orchestra, save in the second movement, "Les Parfums de la Nuit," a tone poem of imaginative and poetic mood.

On the other hand, "Par les Rues et par les Chemins" and "Le Matin d'un Jour de Fête," were insistently Spanish in rhythm and full of strange but interesting dynamic changes. Besides the ordinary instruments of the orchestra, "Iberia" called for xyolophone, celesta and three bells. Mr. Max Fiedler conducted it with precision, but not with the enthusiasm with which he threw himself into the Franck symphony, in which he produced several remarkably fine effects of massive tone. The third orchestral work of the evening was the "Meistersinger" prelude.

Mr. Josef Hofmann played Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in G. When the composer himself gave this concerto in New York he explained it as representing a contest between the orchestra and the piano, the solo instrument seeking admission into the ensemble, being at first refused and not gaining its point until near the close of the work.

There was none of this last night. For if there was any closed door between pianoforte and orchestra the pianist battered it down from the start, playing with a power that, if brutal, was no less suited to the vigorous character of the composition. Indeed, it may be said that, save for the restraint properly exercised in the second movement, Mr. Hofmann's interpretation was remarkable for what may be described as Slavic abandon and rapture.

The large audience recalled him several times and there also was much applause for the orchestral numbers, especially after the Franck symphony.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date

Establis

JOSEF HOFMANN PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Whenever the Boston Symphony Orchestra elects to play here it is assured of a warm welcome, no matter what the programme. Last night not a seat was vacant in Carnegie Hall when this fine body of musicians began its third evening concert of the season. One of the reasons for the interest was the reappearance of Josef Hofmann, the pianist.

It was unfortunate, however, that Hofmann selected so inferior a concerto as Rubinstein's No. 3 in G major. This work is very showy in spots and gives every opportunity for display. But music should rise superior to mere virtuosity. Hofmann played with every variety of tone demanded, splendid musicianship and a technique almost flawless. His efforts were enthusiastically received.

Cesar Franck's D minor symphony was the principal composition of the evening, and Max Fiedler's reading of it one of the best pieces of conducting he has done here. This work is one of eminently commendable construction, in which the musical thought is of lofty beauty.

Precisely why so weird a series of smaller orchestral compositions as Debussy's "Iberia" should be made a part of a programme after having been once heard is puzzling. Two of these three numbers, descriptively Spanish, are nothing but a mass of discords.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, like the remainder of the works, was played as only the Boston Symphony plays it.

[146]

EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR SWAYED WITH MUSIC

Fiedler Criticized For Gyrations As "Eroica" Number Was Given.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the assistance of Josef Hofmann, pianist, as soloist, gave the third concert of the series at the Lyric last night.

Mr. Fiedler, the director, had selected the "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven as the principal number of the evening. This work, which is the third in order of the celebrated nine by Beethoven, was originally entitled by the composer as "Sinfonia Grande Napoleon Bonaparte," in honor of the supposed champion of "liberty, equality and fraternity," but after Napoleon's proclamation as Emperor (May 18, 1804) Beethoven changed the dedication to read as follows: "Heroic symphony, composed to celebrate the memory of a great man." There are many opinions and views given upon the real meaning of the dedication and various explanations of the subject matter have been made by famous musicians and critics. However, not regarding the historical correctness of these sage remarks, but accepting this symphony on its value of absolute music rather than a prescribed program composition, one finds in it great nobility, stalwart expression, grandeur and stirring appeal.

Fiedler Became Picturesque.

Mr. Fiedler, led by heroic intentions and inspired by the interpretation of this great work, became picturesque in his poses, marking the rhythm in large phrases and outlines rather than deliberately giving a decided beat measure for measure. In a work that is not as familiar the orchestra doubtless could not have carried out so successfully the director's ideas of interpretation unless he had adhered more strictly to pulsation. These rhythmical attitudes may have been unintentional, yet they detracted from the main issue. They did not heighten the effectiveness, serving only as an exhibition of graceful gyration. Less fanciful action would have resulted equally in conveying this conception.

The orchestra delivered this symphony in parts with magnificent tone, and after Mr. Fiedler was given generous applause he had the members of the orchestra arise and share with him the continued plaudits.

Josef Hofmann evidently is warmly appreciated locally, judging by the ovation given to him before he seated himself at the piano. He played the Chopin F minor concerto. Grateful as this concerto is from a pianistic point of view, as music, it leads to little satisfaction. The themes are vapid and watery, and their orchestral treatment is not convincing. When the solo part comes from the finger tips of an executant as is Hofmann there is chance for kaleidoscopic coloring and display of the various departments of piano technique. Freshness of tone made phrases attractive, and through a wonderful mastery of touch this solo part became poetically interesting. The artist's personality entered into the playing of this work, and he toyed with its technical intricacies, giving these with ease, clarity and finish. Of course, he was given stormy applause, and had to repeatedly bow his acknowledgments.

Three From "Damnation Of Faust."

The three composition of Berlioz: "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March," which form part of the scenes of "The Damnation of Faust," proved to show that this composer's knowledge of instrumentation was astounding. Fantastical effects and brilliant shades abound in the scores. The minuet is dependent upon the tone-coloring in the high woodwinds for its spicy penetration, while in the ballet a lovely undulating action is produced by simple string writing. The march is bombastic in its noisy instrumentation, but this ceremonial brilliance never fails to bring forth a quickening of the pulse. This tone clamor coming from a less capable body of players is not always as enjoyable as it was yesterday evening. Again in this interpretation Mr. Fiedler felt the pomp and swayed accordingly. When the almost austere manner of Herr Gerricks is recalled, or if we think of the dignified bearing of Herr Muck, the present director of the Boston Symphony begins to weigh in the balance in comparison to the former conductors, yet Mr. Fiedler has many temperamental

Address
Date N. Y. TRIBUNE JAN 14 191

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played an old-fashioned symphony in the old-fashioned manner yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to begin the third of the band's matinees for this year. It was the most familiar and, no doubt, the best loved of Haydn's symphonies—the one in G, No. 13, in the Britkopf & Hartel series. What is meant by the old-fashioned manner in this instance is that Mr. Fiedler did not sophisticate the work in any way. He did not "read" significances into it, did not meddle with its orchestration, nor attempt to fit it to the modern taste for things "hot in the mouth" by experimenting with its tempos or dynamic values. Yet the performance was remarkable in one respect—the orchestra, three times as large as that in Haydn's mind when he wrote the symphony, played it with a precision and lightness which brought up thoughts of the old ideals of chamber music, and also with a beauty of tone such as the composer never was privileged to hear, either at Esterhaz or in London. That much a reviewer may be permitted to say, even though he never sat at dinner with Prince Esterhazy and listened to the musical productions of his house servant Haydn; it is a fact which can be learned from the story of music's development.

After the symphony Mr. Josef Hofmann, who has taken part in all of the concerts given by the Boston Orchestra while en tour last week, played Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F minor with delightful clarity and loveliness of tone and sentiment; then Mr. Fiedler and his men brought forward a quasi novelty—Enesco's Suite, Op. 9, which had previously been heard here only at an afternoon and an evening concert of the Philharmonic Society a year ago. The music by the Rumanian gypsy failed to make a profound impression then, and failed again yesterday, when it received a much clearer and more interesting performance. The overlong first unison movement was particularly tiresome, despite Mr. Fiedler's efforts to give it variety by a nice distribution of nuances. After this, to conclude the concert, came the familiar orchestral numbers from Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust"—the minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, the ballet of Sylphs and the Rakoczy March—light entertainment for an audience of a Saturday afternoon.

H. E. K.

EVENING GLOBE,
From
New York City.
Address
Date

CONCERTS OF TWO DAYS.

Josef Hofmann, who it seems is limited to three appearances here this season, made the second of them as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Hofmann played Chopin's F minor concerto, and his performance was in its way a model. There was no attempt to inflate the music, no attempt to read into it anything that is not there; nor was there, on the other hand, any suggestion of sentimentality. It is not the easiest thing in the world to-day for a great piano virtuoso to play this comparatively modest concerto of Chopin and make it effective within its limits. Just this Mr. Hofmann did on Saturday, and with a full appreciation of its exquisite beauty. It would scarcely be an exaggeration to call it a perfect performance.

Otherwise the programme was pleasing without inviting to lengthy comment. It began with a performance of Haydn's familiar G major symphony (No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Härtel list), which was admirably played, save for the excesive pace demanded in the finale by Mr. Fiedler, who has a penchant for turning an allegro into a presto. The orchestral suite by the Roumanian Enesco followed the concerto. It had been heard here before, but not to so good advantage.

The name of Wolf-Ferrari, which is seen and heard so much just at present, appeared last night on the programme of the last sonata recital in the series Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes have been giving at the Belasco Theatre. The work of his authorship played was a "Recitativo Adagio," from a sonata for violin and piano in A minor. It is modern in style, specifically Tristanish at times. In spite of the playing of Mr. Mannes it made a good impression. The programme included also sonatas by Bach, Beethoven and César Franck.

"Sudden indisposition" visited the opera flock again last night, but not with irreparable results, for Mrs. Rappold consented to sing the "Träume" for which Mme Orridge, the suddenly indisposed, had been announced. Mrs. Rappold was also on the programme for an "Ave Maria" by Max Bruch, and there were solos for Mr. Griswold and Mr. Smirnoff. The instrumental soloist was Harold Bauer, whose numbers were the G minor piano concerto of Saint-Saëns, and pieces by Schubert and Liszt.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PLEASING PROGRAMME

Hofmann in Chopin Concerto Ranks with Greatest of Living Pianists.

A well chosen and ably arranged programme was played in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was of far greater interest than that given two nights before.

Haydn's G major symphony, the first of his second series, was the principal work, and was entirely different in character and tonal structure from the Franck D minor symphony heard at the previous concert. In this composition Haydn's admirable simplicity of form, his free melodic utterance and compact method were clearly shown. The orchestra played with beautiful tone and a spirit fitting the context of the work.

Georges Ernesco's Suite, Op. 9, first performed in America Jan. 3 by the Philharmonic Society, was a quasi-novelty for the enthusiastic audience that completely filled the hall. Though by a modern composer, it has no moments as trying to the ear as many of those supplied by Debussy and others with like tendencies. But Ernesco's work is well written and full of color. The composer was born in 1881 and is court violinist to the Queen of Roumania.

Josef Hofmann, making his second New York appearance this season, chose Chopin's second concerto in F minor, the brilliant and poetic qualities of which could scarcely been in more competent hands. That Hofmann is one of the first two or three living pianists was thoroughly demonstrated yesterday.

"The Will o' the Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" made up the closing orchestral group of an enjoyable afternoon of music exceptionally interpreted.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the W
From
Address
Date JAN 9 - 191

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra and Harold Bauer Here Next Monday Night.

The famous Boston Orchestra will come to Parsons Theater next Monday evening for the second of the season's three concerts. Little need be added to this announcement to fill the theater with admirers of the band and their wonderful performances, but as the soloist for this engagement is one of the great pianists of all times, some information regarding Harold Bauer may be of interest. Mr. Bauer was born in London April 28, 1873. His father was German by birth, his mother English. He began his career as a violinist and played in public when but 9 years of age. In 1892 he decided to be a pianist and as such is almost wholly self-taught. Mr. Bauer makes his home in Paris and has journeyed on his concert tours throughout Russia, Germany, France, Spain, the Netherlands, Australia and South America and has made several tours of the United States. As a piano virtuoso of world-wide fame, no artist takes higher rank and Bauer's playing of the Schumann Concerto with Boston Orchestra will be anticipated by every music lover. Seats are on sale at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Harold Bauer.

Address N. Y. TRIBUNE
Date JAN 12 1912

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler put the admirable musicians from Boston to a dubious use at their concert in Carnegie Hall last night when he had them play that more than amorphous thing, Debussy's "Iberia," but he atoned for it later with so superb a performance of César Franck's symphony in D minor that it was possible to forgive him for giving the New York public music that it had already heard three times in less than as many months. As for "Iberia," with all its ingenuities of orchestral color, it failed of any other mission beyond that of showing the marvellous finish of the orchestra's playing. It was not surprising that the work failed in part. We know that much can be done and has been done in the way of juggling with the senses in music. In the idyllic scene in "Siegfried" Wagner does almost make the eyes hear and the ears see; but Wagner was never foolish enough to think that he could make the ears smell. A remark of the æsthetician Visdur put the awful thought into a critic's mind that if there were pictures which were ill smelling in the eye there might also be music which was a stench in the ear; and the critic made very unjust use of the notion against Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. Debussy's fragments of Spanish rhythm and melody, made to sound even more fragmentary by his harmonic and instrumental treatment, have a fascination for the connoisseur; but how far they fail to create the desired impression upon an audience of real (not affected) music lovers was shown by the failure of last night's almost wonderful performance. Themes written in whole tone scales are no more redolent of sweet perfume than themes frankly conceived in the older diatonic modes, nor can they be made so by ingenious and novel combinations of orchestral voices.

Mr. Hofmann, whom it is always a refreshment of the mind and emotions to hear, played the G major pianoforte concerto by Rubinstein in a style which was as sound and sweet as a nut—strong without boisterousness, sweet without sentimentalism. It might have been wished—no doubt was widely wished—that he had chosen something else to play, but the audience showed abounding gratitude for the happiness enjoyed. Then came the inevitable postlude to our orchestral concerts, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg." No doubt it swept through the hall like a breeze from the north on a suffocating day. It could not fail of its effect after the Rubinstein platitudes, which are only one remove better than those of the concerto which Mr. Lhévinne played a week ago.

H. E. K.

EVENING WORLD,
From
New York City.
Address
Date JAN 12 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS DUBUSSY'S "IBERIA."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening gave the first of its third pair of concerts for the season before, as usual, a crowded house. The programme was more or less modern in character, beginning with Debussy's "Iberia," which consists of three picturesque movements, Spanish in intent. But (with the exception of occasional interspersions of tambourine and castanet motives) the effect is largely that of the Far East. The ever changing pictures suggest the crowded bazaar rather than the languor of Spain. Of melodic design there is nothing. The whole beauty of the work lies in the tonal color which pervades the first two movements. The third makes one wonder if Debussy were trying to find out just how much chaos an audience would tolerate.

The second number was Cesar Frank's ideally beautiful symphony in D minor, which had a most notable rendition. The audience expressed its gratification again and again, and Mr. Fiedler generously insisted that the orchestra should share the applause.

The soloist was Josef Hofmann, who played in Rubinstein's third piano concerto with splendid vigor. It is a rather unsympathetic work, but he gave a most original and delightful interpretation of it, and it is to be regretted that the orchestra was not always quite in touch with him.

The final number was the vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ITEM, PA.
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date

Beethoven's recently discovered symphony, the "Jena," was given its first performance in America by the Boston Orchestra last week, before an audience in which the musical fraternity was largely represented. The "Jena" Symphony was found at the University Library at Jena about a year ago. It is a work of Beethoven's early career, and, while interesting on this account, cannot be classed with his immortal nine.

From STAATSZEITUNG.

Address New York City.

Date JAN 12 1912

Estab

Im Reiche der Töne.

Im Opernsaale der Academy of Music findet heute Abend unter den Auspizien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften ein Konzert des rühmlichst bekannten Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter der Leitung des Dirigenten Max Fiedler statt. In dem interessanten Programm, das Piecen von Hayden, Chopin, Enesco und Berlioz enthält, wirkt der hervorragende Pianist Josef Hofmann mit.

From [illegible]

Address

Date JAN 12 1912

Est

Muck wieder in Boston.

Boston, 12. Januar. Es wurde heute bekannt gegeben, daß Dr. Karl Muck, der berühmte deutsche Kapellmeister, die Leitung des Boston Symphonie Orchesters wieder übernehmen wird, nachdem er drei Jahre lang abwesend gewesen ist. Seit er Boston verließ, ist Dr. Muck vom Deutschen Kaiser zum General-Musik-Direktor ernannt worden. Dr. Muck ist der zweite Dirigent des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, der auf diesen Posten zurückkehrt. Wilhelm Gericke, sein unmittelbarer Vorgänger, machte es ebenso.

From [illegible]

Address

Date JAN 12 1912

—Im Opernsaal der Academy of Music findet heute Abend unter den Auspizien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften ein Konzert des rühmlichst bekannten Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter der Leitung des Dirigenten Max Fiedler statt. In dem interessanten Programm, das Piecen von Hayden, Chopin, Enesco und Berlioz enthält, wirkt der hervorragende Pianist Josef Hofmann mit.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

Est

An enthusiastic audience attended the third Boston Symphony concert, which was given in the Academy of Music last Friday evening, with Josef Hofmann as soloist. This was Hofmann's only appearance in Brooklyn during the present season. He is to play twice with the Symphony orchestra in New York and take part later in the year in a memorial concert, which will be his only appearances with orchestra in Manhattan. He has been brought over here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for this year has exclusive command of his services. He played an excellent programme, including Chopin's Concerto in F minor for pianoforte and Orchestra No. 2, Haydn's sparkling and gay symphony in G major No. 13, which was followed by the concerto. The second part of the programme comprised Enesco's Suite, Opus 9, and three familiar compositions from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs and the Rakoczy March. The name Enesco is new on Boston Symphony programmes here. Enesco is a Roumanian, thirty years old. He was a boy prodigy, having taken first prizes for violin and harmony in the Vienna Conservatory when he was eleven years, he then being a pupil of Joseph Hellmesberger, the elder. From Vienna he went to Paris, where he studied with Massenet, Faure and Marsick. There in 1899 he won first prize for violin playing. The Suite which the Boston Symphony played here was in four movements, the first two being played without a break. The first is called a prelude in unison, followed immediately by a slow minuet. Then came an intermezzo, and the finale was a wild Roumanian dance.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From COURANT

Address HARTFORD, CONN.

Date JAN 12 1912

Establis

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Harold Bauer, the famous pianist as soloist, will come to the Parsons Theater next Monday evening for the second concert in the series. With the added attraction of an artist of Bauer's rank, the orchestra will play to a crowded house. Max Fiedler will select a program from the best of the season's repertory and altogether the event should prove highly enjoyable. The demand for seats makes necessary a rule to hold tickets for no one later than tomorrow morning. Seats may be obtained of John M. Gallup & Co., No. 201 Asylum street.

Burton to [illegible] this After-

From EVENING WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date JAN 15 1912

Estab

JOSEF HOFMANN PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday played before a crowded house, with many persons asking in vain for admission. The programme was something of a popular one and, under Mr. Fiedler's direction, the performance was admirable. There was the beautiful, old-fashioned symphony of Haydn's in G major at the beginning, and some captivating excerpts from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust" at the end. Between these came Georges Enesco's suite No. 9, a modern work heard here only once or twice before, and Chopin's piano concerto in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, in which Josef Hofmann was the soloist. Mr. Hofmann, who has been playing in a series of concerts with the Boston Orchestra, was at his best. The beauties of the composition were disclosed by him with sane and wholesome musicianship as well as with poetic insight and sentiment.

From

Address

Date JAN 12 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Austerely Modern Programme Is Heard at Carnegie Hall.

Est

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme was an austerely modern one and comprised Debussy's extraordinary "Iberia." This was played just a year ago at the Philharmonic Society and was found to be difficult of enjoyment or comprehension. Mr. Fiedler gave an excellent rendering of it last night, but did not exactly develop any unsuspected beauties. Cesar Franck's C Minor Symphony was exquisitely played. Mr. Josef Hofmann, an artist whom we are almost tired of praising, was heard in the G Minor Concerto of Rubinstein. The concert concluded with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The orchestra will be heard to-morrow in a humaner programme.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Est

Boston Symphony Concert

The third of the Boston Symphony's series of concerts will take place at the Academy of Music next Monday evening the program, with the exception of the piano concerto to be played by Josef Hofmann, being made up entirely of French music. The first number will be Debussy 'Iberia," the second of three pieces for orchestra which are grouped under the general number of "Images." The symphony is to be Franck's D-minor, while the concert will be closed with three familiar selections from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," "Minuet of Will o'-the-Wisp," "Ballet of Sylphs," and "Ra' zy March." Mr. Hofmann, who is to be the soloist, will, it is announced, make his only appearance in Philadelphia this season. He will play Rubenstein's Concerto in G-major, No. 2.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date N. Y. [illegible]

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters werden in Carnegie Hall kommenden Donnerstag Abend resp. Samstag Nachmittag unter Mitwirkung des berühmten Pianisten Herrn Josef Hofmann abgehalten, der am Donnerstag Rubinstein's G-dur-Konzert und am Samstag Chopin's F-moll-Konzert No. 2 spielt. Herr Fiedler dirigirt Donnerstag Debussy's „Iberia", Cesar Frank's Symphonie in D-moll und das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel. In der Matinee dirigirt er Haydn's C-dur-Symphonie No. 13, Enesco's Suite op. 9 und drei Excerpte aus Berlioz' „Faust Verdammnis".

From

Address

Date

MUCK RETURNS TO BOSTON

Takes the Symphony Orchestra Directorship After Three Years' Absence.

Boston, Jan. 11.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after an absence of three years, was announced to-day. After leaving Boston Dr. Muck was made general musical director of the imperial theatres by the German Emperor.

Dr. Muck is the second director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to return to that post, his immediate predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, [illegible]

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date JAN 15 1912

Establisl

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its matinee concert on Saturday before "standing room only." The presence of Josef Hofmann and the Chopin concerto in F minor added materially to the original charm of the orchestra. The chief interest in the orchestral offerings lay in the suite by Enesco, which has been heard here under the direction of the late Gustav Mahler. It is in the modern idiom of France, although it brings to mind more the treatment of Dukas than that of Debussy. Even the mastery of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Fiedler did not remove entirely some monotony and the impression that it is music to which one has to listen very intently. Not so the charming Haydn symphony, which Mr. Fiedler must have included as a tonic before making the modern plunge. "The Damnation of Faust" excerpts were also full of charm at the close of the programme.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date JAN 12 1912

Establi

DR. KARL MUCK COMING BACK

Will Again Direct Boston Symphony, Beginning Next Fall

Boston, Mass., Jan. 12.—Official announcement was made yesterday by the management of the Symphony Orchestra of the return of Dr. Karl Muck to be again its conductor, beginning with the concerts of next autumn. The announcement says:

"C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that at last it has been definitely settled that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for a terms of years.

"Rumors of Dr. Muck's return have been published more or less of late, but all reports that the matter had been settled were decidedly premature. When he left Boston in the spring of 1908 it was generally understood that as soon as his engagement with the Royal Opera Company of Berlin was ended he would return to Boston to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Unexpected obstacles, however, have prevented his coming up to this time, and only now have the great efforts to keep him in Germany ceased to be made."

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Est

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the present season at the New National Theater was Josef Hofman, who renewed the esteem that has always been entertained for him in this city by his performance of Chopin's concerto No. 2 in F minor. The orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Max Fiedler, rendered a program of the highest artistic interest with characteristic efficiency.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address HARTFORD, CONN.

Date JAN 11 1912

Boston Symphony Concert.

The ochestra, solo artist and program for the concert at Parsons's theater, Monday evening, cannot be excelled. Mr. Fiedler has chosen from the best numbers on Boston programs and will present music to satisfy the demand for something new and for the patron who enjoys more familia. compositions. "Iberia," for orchestra No. 2, by Claude Debussy, was performed by the Boston players in April of last year for the first time, and again in December, 1910. The first performance of the work anywhere was by the Colonne orchestra in Paris early in 1910.

Like all new compositions it has been received enthusiastically by all admirers of Debussy's strange idiom and only less warmly by the critic who accepts the old masters as his ideal. At any rate, music lovers of the city can enjoy the privilege accorded patrons of these concerts in Boston and elsewhere, of hearing the tonal creations of one of the world's most-talked-about composers at coming concert. Reserved seats on sale at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 9 1912

Mrs. Taft attended the Boston Symphony concert this afternoon, having in her box with her Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cummings and Mr. and Mrs. William Herron.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 18[illegible]

From POST,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 10 1912

HOFMANN AT THE NATIONAL.

Noted Pianist Appears as Soloist at Boston Symphony's Third Concert.

The name of Josef Hofmann on any program insures a capacity audience in Washington, where the famous young pianist is an especial favorite. Yesterday afternoon, as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the National Theater, he won a firmer hold upon the affections of his public by the brilliancy and feeling with which he interpreted Chopin's Concerto No. 2 (F minor), in three movements. It was in the third part—allegro vivace—that Hofmann won heartiest recognition, but the adagio movement was especially appealing in the broad and searching sympathy of its interpretation. The orchestral accompaniment was most satisfying.

The symphony for the afternoon was Haydn's work in G major, which appeals more readily to popular tastes than the rigidly classical symphonies which this organization usually offers. The simple minuet form of the third movement evoked much greater applause than the more impressive first and second movements, while the spirited finale, with its romping dance measures, was a genuine delight.

The concert opened with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3, and closed with "The Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs," and "Rakoczy March," all taken from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust." The ballet was a particularly happy selection, as it afforded Conductor Max Fiedler an opportunity to give a reading of the most delicate and persuasive character, a quality which is not often to be noted in his interpretations.

Newspaper Clipping Bure[illegible]

From

Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT SCORES TRIUMPH

Josef Hofmann, Pianist, Repeatedly Encored at Lyric.

With Josef Hofmann, pianist, as soloist the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its third appearance here this season at the Lyric last evening. Conducted by Max Fiedler, a musician and director of great ability, the orchestra gave the following program:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Chopin—Concerto No. 2, F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 21.
I. Maestoso.
II. Larghetto.
III. Allegro vivace.

Berlioz—Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisp, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from the Damnation of Faust.

Beethoven's symphonies stand out among the works of the old masters as possessed of marked individuality and the the third, or as it is better known, Eroica, gives a vivid portrait of the admiration of the composer for Napoleon, the general, the ebb of his admiration when the general turns ruler and the forecast of his untimely end, in the Marcia funebre, adagio assai. The Eroica is indeed a monument to the genius of the great composer and its rendition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was splendid. With the exception of a slight tendency on the part of the conductor to drag the music unnecessarily during the first part, the concert was excellently presented.

Hofmann maintained easily his artistic reputation. A Chopin concerto seemed hardly sufficient to develop in the artist the interest necessary for his best work; but he painted Chopin with such a wealth of tone color that his most critical auditors were delighted. His conception of Chopin is refined, even delicate, but the artist puts into the music a strength and virility that is remarkable. Hofmann's popularity with Baltimore music lovers was evinced in the applause that drew him to the front of the stage seven times after the concert.

In the third part of the concert Berlioz's Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March from the Damnation of Faust, the misleading spirit which was quite apparent in the beginning of the symphony seemed to return to the musicians, and the confusion was excellently played. The Ballet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, an unique Berlioz composition, attracted much attention and was well played.

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Josef Hofmann, whose only appearance in Baltimore during the course of the present season will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Wednesday evening, January 10, has elected to play Chopin's Concerto in F minor No. 2. Mr. Hofmann, a Pole himself, is one of the most notable interpreters of Chopin.

[b] [118]

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

The Conductor's Pay.

In the salary of another foreign conductor who is to come to this country to take charge of a symphony orchestra the limit of high pay is said to be reached. The amount that he will receive is reported to be more than any other organization ever paid under similar circumstances.

It has not been found in New York that the mere payment to a conductor has insured success of any kind to an orchestra. The Philharmonic Society paid $20,000 to a Russian conductor who did more to reduce the musical importance of the organization than any of his predecessors, whatever might have been paid to them. When a still larger sum was paid to the late GUSTAV MAHLER various influences combined to prevent him from accomplishing all that had been expected of the arrangement. So the society adopted the policy of paying to its conductor a price within reason. The result has encouraged the organization to carry out the same plan during the second year. Until it was announced that CARL MUCK was to receive the largest salary ever paid to any of its conductors by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that organization had always controlled the services of the best available conductors, but it never treated them as if they were prima donnas of the baton or yielded to all their demands.

It was all but impossible to persuade MAURICE GRAU, the foremost American impresario of his time, that there was any public interest in the head of an orchestra. He framed this indifference in words that have become a proverb in amusements. He said the public would never pay merely to look at any man's back. How little heed is paid to this belief to-day is proved by the ease with which ARTURO TOSCANINI has succeeded in advancing his compensation at the Metropolitan Opera House year by year, until he now receives more than half again what was paid to the most expensive of its conductors under the preceding régime. This is indeed almost four times the amount ever paid to SEIDL or MANCINELLI.

With such a conservative body as the Boston Symphony Orchestra advancing its compensation to a sensational amount and the Metropolitan Opera House paying for its conductor such salaries as are customary to-day, the cost of the conductor is daily becoming more and more important in the production of music. So the fallacy of Mr. GRAU'S old theory seems demonstrated.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 7 - 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The only opportunity the Washington musical public will have to hear Josef Hofmann this season, and probably for several seasons to come, will be at the third Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the National on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, at 4:30 o'clock. Mr. Hofmann has come to America this winter by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereby that organization has exclusive control of his time.

In many respects the most brilliant episode of last year's soloists of the Boston Symphony concerts in Washington was the appearance here of this extraordinary artist. Those who remember him as a little boy seated on a high chair at the piano remember the glowing prophecies made of his future. Every promise of his success has been fulfilled, and today he is by all odds the greatest of the younger generation of pianists. At this concert he will play the Concerto in F minor by Chopin.

Mr. Fiedler has given much modern music in Washington, and his coming program reverts to the classics. The first number will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3. The second number will be Haydn's gayest, most sparkling symphony, that in G major, No. 13. This work was written just before Haydn left Vienna to live in London, and it belongs to the same group as the so-called, "Oxford" symphony. The final number will be the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust"—Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, "Ballet of Sylphs," and "Racoczy March."

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date JAN 1 ...

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

French Music by Debussy and Franck Played—Josef Hofmann the Soloist.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given yesterday, was more than half devoted to modern French music as represented by César Franck's symphony and Debussy's "Iberia," from his set orchestral pieces called "Images." Debussy's music was heard here last season when Mr. Mahler played it with the Philharmonic Society. It has not improved in the months that have passed and on another hearing. It is one of his latest compositions and it has missed much of the freshness and originality of his earlier pieces. It seems, indeed, to be constructed on a Debussy formula, from which the delicate and subtle essence has escaped. The elusive charm of Debussy's music that appears in "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," but eluded even the composer in this. He has again imagined himself in Spain. For the suggestion of Spanish atmosphere he has shown a predilection in several of his earlier compositions, and has conveyed it with more success in them. The tonal color, to which alone, as we are informed by the programme notes, he attaches importance, is cruder and has strangely little of the finesse and poesy that give pleasure in other music of Debussy's. The pieces were played with great care and finish—perhaps a less obvious care and a less precise fininsh would more nearly have conveyed Debussy's purpose.

After this amorphous music Franck's symphony had a stately unity and symmetry and a noble seriousness. It is in the way of becoming well known to the New York lovers of music, since this was the fourth performance it has had here this season, and excellent as it is, there seems to be a lack of proportion here. The performance, which was superbly sonorous, rich and finished, gave great pleasure nevertheless. There was a burst of applause after each movement and so much at the end that Mr. Fiedler made his men all rise and take it for thmeselves.

There was a very warm welcome for Mr. Josef Hofmann, who was the soloist, and who after making a concert tour in America last season has returned for a series of performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pianists are hard put to it to find concertos with orchestra suitable to play. Many of the older ones have sunk beneath the horizon and there are few or none of substantial worth supplied by modern composers. It was perhaps partly this consideration and partly a feeling of laudable piety for his master that led Mr. Hofmann to revive Rubinstein's G major concerto in his repertory. It is at least more interesting, more musically valuable, than the one in E flat that Mr. Lhévinne exhumed the other day. But it is tedious, frail in substance and mostly of a tinsel glitter, that even Mr. Hofmann's kindling warmth, brilliancy and subtlety of performance could not make seem worth while. It was piano playing of the finest kind, but it was woefully misdirected.

The programme was brought to an end with the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date ...

JOSEF HOFMANN TO PLAY AT CONCERT

Great Pianist Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, January 10. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, by all odds the greatest of the younger generation of pianists. Mr. Hofmann, who reached this country just before Christmas, comes by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereby that organization has exclusive control of his services during his stay in America this season, and there is no chance of his appearing in this city again during this season and probably for several seasons to come, for it is not likely that he will return to America for two or three years. He has elected to play Chopin's second certo, in F minor, a work that he has made particularly his own.

Mr. Fiedler's programs in Baltimore this year have been devoted largely to modern and ultra modern music. It is the duty of an institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep alive the best the past has given to the world in music, as well as to show what the composers of today are doing. Following out this aim, Mr. Fiedler gives as the principal work at the coming concert Beethoven's "Eroica." It is significant that when the Orchestra last October had its thirtieth anniversary concert the two principal works presented were this "Eroica" of Beethoven and the "Unfinished" of Shubert. Although the symphony is itself more than 100 yeads old, it is regarded today as when it was written, one of the stupendous achievements in music.

The final number on the program, which contains in all three, are the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March.

From INQUIRER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date JAN 7 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard at the Academy of Music Last Night in Fine Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third local concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night when, despite the unpleasant weather, it was heard with much enjoyment by a large audience in a varied and valuable program. Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor was the central feature of an arrangement which included a suite by Debussy entitled "Iberia," which had not been done here before, and three of Berlioz's most beautiful and characteristic compositions, the Dance of the Sylphs, the Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps and the Rakoczy March from the "Damnation of Faust."

It so happens, for these things are always coincidences, they must be, that the Franck symphony was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra earlier in the season, but as it is an extremely beautiful and poetic work, singularly full of spiritual fervor and imaginative power, it may be supposed that those who heard it on the previous occasion were not sorry to hear it again, especially as its performance by the Boston organization was one of great emotional eloquence and tonal charm and was distinguished by a penetrative analysis which exhibited the full significance of a somewhat abstruse and complicated score.

The Debussy series of tone pictures, which bear the titles of "In the Streets and Waysides," "The Odors of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day," were also admirably done. They are supposed to be descriptive of scenes in Spain, and the attentive listener who is in symphony with the scheme and who is endowed with a reasonably active fancy will be able from time to time to recognize the pictorial purpose. Indeed, it may be said of the first and third movements that they may be followed fairly well without the use of a chart, diagram or key; but as concerns the second, the one that undertakes to communicate a sense of the "Odors of the Night," it can only be appreciated by the connoisseur in tone color and abnormal modulations.

Mr. Josef Hofmann was the assisting artist of the occasion, and with his immense technique he made easy work of the showy difficulties which Rubinstein has multiplied in his G major concerto for the pianoforte. It is not music which has any considerable intellectual or emotional value, but it is decidedly effective for its intended purpose, and young Hofmann played it in brilliant fashion, with a clear apprehension of its significance and a perfect mastery of its contents. He has developed into one of the most finished and satisfying of contemporary artists, and it is an added merit that he is so completely free from any kind of affectation. The next of these concerts is announced for February 19.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Josef Hofmann Plays a Rubinstein Piano Concerto Seldom Heard.

The music performed at the third evening concert of the twenty-sixth New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was as follows: Debussy's "Iberia," which consists of three movements depicting Spain in one of her attacks of national indigestion; César Franck's symphony in D minor, Rubinstein's piano concerto in G major and Richard Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The pianist was Josef Hofmann, who has come to this country especially to play with the Boston orchestra and incidentally to give a very few recitals.

Mr. Hofmann may or may not cherish in his secret soul a passionate love for his famous teacher's G major concerto, but even his skill as a pianist will hardly achieve the feat of making it generally popular. If anything could do it this would, for Mr. Hofmann's performance of the composition was something worth travelling many miles to hear.

The thematic material of the concerto is not remarkable in itself, nor does it develop anything remarkable in the working out. But it does offer opportunities to a great pianist to display some of the best traits of his technic and to disclose the treasures of his tone and touch. It is no news to music lovers now that Mr. Hofmann is become one of the greatest living masters of the pianoforte. He plays with authority, with brilliancy, with exquisite musical insight and with poetry of style. All of these qualities he displayed last evening, and in doing so he glorified the music which he had set himself to interpret. The audience received his playing with enthusiasm.

As for the Debussy sketches already mentioned they show all the idiosyncrasies of their composer and also his brilliant command of orchestral effects. Doubtless it is the latter which endears the music to conductors, and the performance of the work last evening by the Boston men under Mr. Fiedler was admirable.

Neither César Franck's symphony nor Wagner's prelude is in need of description at this time. The symphony has never had a better reading here than that which Max Fiedler gave it, with so much warmth and undertsanding. The orchestra acquitted itself splendidly and the applause proved that the audience thoroughly understood the value of the performance. The Boston organization will give its third matinée to-morrow and Mr. Hofmann will again be the solo performer.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

BROCKWAY CRITICISES MAHLER FOR EGOTISM

In Lecture Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Howard Brockway, the American composer, gave the lecture-recital on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present in the Opera House of that building this evening. He played first the Haydn Symphony in G major, of which he played illustrative bits, but gave the most of the time to the suite for orchestra, opus 9, by the young Roumanian composer, Georges Enesco, which has had but few performances in the United States. It was first given in Manhattan by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, on Jan. 3 of last year, and in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on April 1 last. Unable to obtain a copy of the score in a music store, Mr. Brockway used that from which the late Gustav Mahler led, finding in it as marked with blue pencil, in re-written orchestral passages, or in passages put an octave higher, etc., "a mutilation that is a surprising evidence of egotism in a great conductor. But," he continued, "I think to-morrow night you will hear it in its original form, for Mr. Fiedler is too good a conductor—he has too much respect for the work of a composer, to make such alterations of the score."

That there are, however, too many repetitions in the composition, was confirmed by Mr. Brockway, who ascribed some of this tendency to the youth of the composer. The Suite, in four movements, is made up of a prelude and a menuet lent which are played without intermission, an intermezzo and a finale. The first was called "very daring" and a "tour deforce," with harmonics suggested in the progression of tones, in one place being reminiscent of the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," although having decided individuality. The extraordinary handling of the base was noted and its quality of support for the rest of the orchestra. In pointing out evidences of Enesco's remarkable color sense, Mr. Brockway mentioned also the strong influence that he has evidently felt from the modern French school—he studied in Paris—finding in an incident in the woodwind a place where he shows the influence of D'Indy and Debussy. "Not even four hands on the piano can give this as it should be," Mr. Brockway said, as he played exquisite passages, showing in their unfolding how the portions allotted to the different choirs in the orchestra are built into the perfect whole, and calling attention especially to the strong feeling which appears in the minor, and the resolution in the major. "The close of this is one of the most remarkable orchestral effects that has ever been planned," he said.

In the intermezzo the low tones and the use of the harp are noticeable and in this movement the influence of Debussy is more than ever evident, while the finale is decidedly Slavic. When speaking of the music of the French school, Mr. Brockway said that it is as impressionistic as that school of painting in France, and that it is not to be taken apart and studied bit by bit, but to get the best from it, it must be heard by those who are in sympathy with it. To resolve a certain dreamy progression of notes into a chord—and Mr. Brockway played both progression and chord—produced a sound that was likened to "a distant locomotive or a factory whistle."

From RECORD,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann Heard in Rubenstein's G Major Concerto.

The Academy of Music held one of the largest audiences of the season last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, appeared. The program was opened with Debussy's Iberia "Images," a composition in three movements, overburdened with an elaborate and illogical program calling for a musical setting first of "The Streets and Waysides;" second, "The Odors of the Night," and lastly, "The Morning of a Fete Day." As there is little or no variance in the manner in which these widely-diversified events are treated, the absurdity of the attempt to translate them into a musical idiom is at once exposed. There is much of Debussy's music that gives pleasure. The Iberia "Images," however, is below the general standard of his work and does not merit any serious attention. As a contrast, the magnificent D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck was overwhelming in its grandeur and simplicity. It does not seem possible that two musicians dealing in an art so scientifically exact as the art of music, living practically in the same age, subjected to the same general environment, and almost countrymen, Franck, born a Belgian, but of France for the greater part of his life, could have produced music so different in every particular. The genius and sanity of Franck would seem sufficient to steady this generation of French composers, but the craze for individuality has apparently run away with the better judgment of the majority.

Fiedler gave a wonderful interpretation of the symphony, bringing out in a scholarly manner the many beautiful themes, and giving to the whole work an artistic proportion and development that left nothing to be desired. The work of the orchestra was superb, and drew from the audience enthusiastic applause.

Josef Hofmann was given a rousing reception. His playing of the difficult, if rather superficial, Rubenstein "Concerto" in G major revealed the phenomenal technical facility of which he is master. The work furnished him an opportunity to display his absolute command of the keyboard. Tremendous octaves, runs of dazzling brilliancy, sparkling arpeggios and a tone so loud that it could be heard continually above the orchestral ensemble formed the striking parts of his performance. If his tone was harsh rather than resonant, one overlooked it in the stupendous impression made. The andante was played with a beautiful tonal quality and an expressiveness quite new in Hofmann's work. He was brought out repeatedly in the hope, no doubt, of an eventual encore; Hofmann's dignified manner and self-contained style of playing are commendable in an artist subjected to such continual

Newspaper Clipping Bu... PUBLIC LEDGER

From PUBLIC

Address PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann the Soloist in Rubinstein Concerto.

PROGRAMME.

"Iberia," Images for Orchestra...Debussy
D Minor Symphony.....Cesar Franck
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, G Minor No. 3, Rubinstein.....Josef Hofmann
Minuet, Ballet and March from "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz

The Academy was filled last night to hear the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler conducting and Josef Hofmann as the soloist. The least-liked number on the programme opened it. Tribute must be paid to the extraordinary skill of the interpreters—the men from Boston revel in such a chance to display their virtuosity—and that the music came short of any lasting or profound appeal was no fault of the players or of the conductor, w spared no pains to throw light on ev the smallest devious intricacy of score. But what is it all about? Wh is one left at the expiration of the la twisted tuba of tone-color? The mot tion of the work, its harmonic thes is supposed to be the commingled noise of city streets awake and asleep. B is not the real noise enough? Do "ci people" want any more of it than they already hear through the thoughtfu providence of the motorman, the milk man and the family next door? It wa thought that Strauss had said the las word in the domestic symphony; but her is one word more.

After these extraneous quiddlings an quirkings of tortured instruments an music put to perverted uses, how one comes back with relief to the basic re ities and firm, heroic outlines of suc symphony as this of Cesar Franck s man has much to say, he clearl oks it out and th mulates hi ught f ch t to migh were he a musician. Bu the music is not classically austere—warm human pulse throbs through it—ou of the heart it comes and to the heart goes. The Berlioz excerpts were playe in brilliant fashion, with the broad a full diapason when required, and th graceful felicities of the lighter vein i their own place.

But the feature of the evening was th truly magnificent performance of Mr Hofmann. He played with commandin, vigor and assurance—as though with a inexhaustible reservoir of power to call upon at will. There seemed to be nothing that he could not do with the musical notation; the playing had not merely the cold virtue of faultlessness, but the sweet and singing fluency of the perfection of art in combination with entire sincerity of workman-like purpose. At the close of the first movement the house awoke to a tumult of enthusiasm, repeated and outdone at the end, when the rule against encores acted as a just barrier to a further prolongation of the delight of the hearers. Mr. Hofmann has never played better in Philadelphia.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Es... k, 1...

Joseph Hofmann, Celebrated Pianist, Heard; Programme of a Mixed Variety.

Max Fiedler, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the celebrated pianist, Josef Hofmann, gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last evening, at which the programme was of a mixed variety.

There was no new work to elucidate, the inclusion of which has been a customary feature of Mr. Fiedler's programme. Instead, the orchestra played, for the first time in this city, a portion of Debussy's "Images pour Orchestra," individually entitled "Iberia."

The work was introduced to New York concert patrons a little more than a year ago by the late Gustav Mahler. In this composition Debussy almost reaches the limit in dissonances; it has even been called "discordant music." As a tone picture of Spain it possibly is meant to suggest that country during a revolution—it certainly suggested something of the sort among the musicians last evening.

Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor was peaceful by contrast, and yet that composer was in reality the father of the Debussy style of composition. Mr. Fiedler's conducting was marked by a splendid command, excellent judgment in emphasis and superb tone color. The orchestra responded to a man and gave a reading worthy of both the composition and the society's reputation for artistic presentation.

Although the splendid performance of the French symphony was received with the usual discreet applause of the Boston symphony patrons, Josef Hofmann's stupendous playing of the Rubinstein concerto in G major roused these sedate music lovers to the wildest enthusiasm. This is perhaps the most thankful of Rubinstein's great works, and when interpreted with such poetry and power, such feeling and sympathy as it received last evening, it is undoubtedly one of his most interesting.

The concert ended with the Prelude to Wagner's "The Maesteringers of Nuremberg," performed by the or... with characteristic skill and

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Josef Hofmann, as Soloist, Again Proved Himself Past Master in All That Is Best in Piano Playing—Applause Greeted Tetrazzini in "Rigoletto" at the Metropolitan.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra for its third pair of concerts, the first of which was given last night, present Josef Hofmann as soloist, and it is certain that there is no more welcome pianist before the public than he who has been watched through all phases of his development. When during a season there are five or six pianists of such proportions as those now in the concert field of America, it naturally becomes difficult to find enough piano concertos to go around, and for this reason a great many are unearthed which were originally intended for oblivion.

It was one of these that Hofmann brought forward last night, the third of Rubinstein, which, with all the superb qualities he brought to it, did not rise to the requirements of a really inspired work of value or of distinction. The artist was so infinitely superior to his medium that there might have been a question of taste involved, even though Hofmann took this means of paying tribute to his teacher. In all that is included in the greatest and the best of piano playing, again, Hofmann proved himself a past master, and the orchestra gave him the usual Boston Symphony support, which is all encompassing.

DEBUSSY'S "IBERIA."

Fiedler made his programme to include the Debussy "Iberia," from the orchestral pieces; "Images," played here for the first time at one of the last concerts given by the late Gustav Mahler, and the Cesar Franck symphony. In the latter the orchestra did some of the most brilliant and effective playing of its career, and Fiedler gave the noble work a masterly and impressive reading, which offset in a measure the rather ineffective playing of the Debussy music, ineffective because it was too strongly set forth in themes, development and musical line.

If Debussy represents anything in the musical scheme, his music must be taken in the way of atmosphere, filmy, indefinable, therefore undefined, and it is difficult for a routine master like Fiedler and others to relinquish the strong element of rhythm in a work teeming with complexities which must melt into a cloud of sound rather than be meted out in measures of certain lengths and clarity.

The programme was brought to a close by a spirited performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Tetrazzini sang Gilda in "Rigoletto," would make it seem as though there were a la...er public for music of this nature than interpreters of the same. The ...soprano was in excellent voice and s...g the role with all of her old-time bri...ncy. Her "Caro Nome" will always b...one of the great achievements of th...ater day stage of this school, and t...re was much applause for it last nig... Dinh Gilly was heard in the title ro... an important part for the young sing... young at least in roles of this descri...on, and he acquitted himself credit...y. Smirnoff, the Russian tenor, sa... the part of the Duke with a voice ...hich showed agreeable qualities from ...e to time. Mme. Maubourg's Madd...na was one worthy of the best stage ...l lent much to the performance. Th... same may be said of De Segurola's ...arafucile.

Indisposition ...ems to follow the shining marks at t... opera house, the latest one to succum... being Scotti, who was announced to ...ng Scarpia to-night. Amato, who h... been out of the casts for more than ...eek, will sing the role instead. Miss ...rrar will sing the titular part.

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date JA... 12 1912

Dr. Muck wieder in Boston.

Er wird nach dreijähriger Abwesenheit die Leitung des dortigen Symphonie-Orchesters wieder übernehmen.

Boston, Mass., 11. Januar. Heute wurde hier bekannt gegeben, daß Dr. Karl Muck nach dreijähriger Abwesenheit in Deutschland hierher zurückgekehrt ist, um die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters zu übernehmen. Seitdem Dr. Muck von hier abwesend war, ist er bekanntlich durch Kaiser Wilhelm zum Generalmusikdirektor ernannt worden. Er ist der zweite Dirigent des Symphonie-Orchesters, welcher auf den Posten als Dirigent zurückkehrt. Sein unmittelbarer Vorgänger war Wilhelm Gericke, der zwei Saisons lang Dirigent des Symphonie-Orchesters gewesen ist.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address

Date JAN 13 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, and Harold Bauer, pianist, will give a concert at Parsons's theater on Monday evening at 8:15. The program follows:

Franck—Symphony in D minor.
I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.
Schumann—Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54.
I. Allegro affettuoso.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
III. Allegro vivace.
Debussy—Iberia: "Images" pour Orchestre, No. 2.
I. Par les rues et par les chemins.
II. Les parfums de la nuit.
III. Le matin d'un jour de fete.
Berlioz—Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust."

Reserved seats and tickets of admission to the gallery can be obtained at John M. Gallup & Co.'s store.

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 31

From

Address

Date JAN 14 1912

Mastery of the Piano Shown by Mr. Hofmann

Chopin's F Minor Concerto His Big Task at Boston Orchestra Concert.

Turning away real money from the box office for lack of room was one of the unusual features of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall. The soloist again was Mr. Josef Hofmann, the pianist. He played Chopin's F minor concerto with absolute composure, technical mastery and beauty of tone. So evenly did he balance all these qualities that it might have been a momentary relief to his playing had he imposed sentiment more in the larghetto. He was applauded enthusiastically and recalled many times.

There were no actual novelties in the orchestral part of the programme, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, but the Suite Opus 9, by Mr. George Enesco, is practically unknown here. The composer is court violinist to the Queen of Roumania and is still a young man, but this music proves that he has found his mode of expression. It is exceedingly interesting, despite the bizarre effects of the third movement, which suggest a Debussy on an excursion to Roumania. It was wonderfully played, particularly the first movement, where all the strings are heard in unison.

Haydn's Symphony No. 13, with which the concert began, was played with reverence and beauty of tone, and the three excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," at the end of the concert, showed the virtuosity of the orchestra displayed to its fullest degree. The "Ballet of Sylphs" waltz was exquisitely done, and the final "Rakoczy March" was thundered forth with heroic effect that aroused great enthusiasm.

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date DEC 31

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 9, will be of particular interest because Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come.

Josef Hofmann is conceded the greatest of the younger pianists. He comes to America for the sole purpose of playing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for the time being has entire and exclusive command of his time. It has consented to one recital in New York and one in Boston. Mr. Hofmann arrived in America shortly before Christmas and has been spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C.

He was one of the soloists with the [120]

From EVENING SUN, New York City.
Address
Date JAN 12 1912

FIEDLER HAS HIS RIOT CALL, HOFMANN PLAYS RUBINSTEIN

Boston Symphony Visitors Let the Sunshine In on Eve of Blizzard—"Rigoletto" with Richard Strauss Variations—A "Tosca" Shakeup.

There is balm in Gilead. The reserved and critical audience of New Yorkers who pack Carnegie Hall to the doors ten times each winter, a thing that occurs only at the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits here, chose the psychological moment last evening to show Max Fiedler what the city of Seidl and Theodore Thomas thinks of him. It bided its time through the vague Debussy "Images." These trifles, light as soap bubbles blown in green moonshine, depict an "Iberia" where no Spanish dances resound.

The composer of "Pelleas and Melisande" and tone poet of "The Sea" found little common feeling with English Borrow and his book, nor with such fellow-countrymen as rhapsodic Chabrier and Bizet, whose gypsies drank deeper of the "Romany Rye." Debussy's point of departure is that of Offenbach. "In the Streets and Waysides," who hears strange, cacophonous cries like the Paris gamins in Charpentier's "Louise." His final "Morning of a Fête Day" is a "Marche Lointaine," remote indeed from mirth. But this clever Debussy placed between the two his most characteristic airs, gentle as the breath of a sleeping child, in the "Perfumes of the Night." It should be performed to a burning of incense on the stage.

Boston's hundred players "let the blessed sunshine in" with the finest performance that this town has heard of the great, grim symphony in D minor of Cesar Franck. A programme note recalled how French doctors disagreed with Franck, or his music with their epicurean digestions, a short twenty years back. "That a symphony?" exclaimed a professor of the Conservatoire. "But whoever heard of writing for the cor Anglais?" And Charles Gounod, "escorted by a train of adulators, male and female," at another door, had fulminated a kind of papal decree that this work was nought but incompetence pushed to dogmatic lengths.

Franck's family asked him on his return from the première, "Well, were you satisfied with the effect on the public?" To which "Papa" Franck replied with beaming countenance, "Oh, it sounded well, just as I thought it would." Last night it "sounded" superlatively well. The sombre, sluggish, masculine vigor of its stained-glass attitudes became transparent and illuminating. And at the pause in the programme, Carnegie Hall rang with shouts for Conductor Fiedler, who will yield his place, as officially told from Boston yesterday, to the brilliant Carl Muck returning next year. Fiedler bowed till he blushed to the roots of his iron gray hair, and at last he motioned for the band to stand up and cover his confusion.

For Josef Hofmann, once the "wonder-child," who will be a man of five and thirty this coming Jan. 20, there was the expected ovation. Master of the despised piano to-day as is no other artist in the world save one, Hofmann came to America for his seventh tour only to make the round of cities with the Bostbn Symphony. There will be some recitals thrown in. He played last night, not his own Fourth Concerto, but the equally unfamiliar Third of his master, Rubinstein. Again a personal programme note was worth quoting. It is said that Rubinstein, when he played the concerto in New York, in 1872, finding at a rehearsal that the close of the last movement caused the orchestra trouble, gave the following explanation of the concerto;

"In the first movement, the piano repeatedly requests admittance into the temple of the orchestra. The orchestra takes the matter into consideration, and decides to test the capabilities of the piano. After frequent consultations and trials, the orchestra concludes that the piano is not worthy to enter into its sanctuary. In the second movement, the piano bemoans its fate, but soon recovers its equanimity and asserts its dignity. The beginning of the last movement represents the piano as repeating its requests to be admitted. Again consultations are held, single instruments express their opinions. The decison is again adverse. Now the pinao loses its temper and challenges the orchestra to imitate what the piano can do, and in the tumult of this attempt, the concerto closes."

Such a performance as Hofmann gave of the middle part is rarely to be heard. The hush over all the house was amazing. The concerto is not "popular," but so once was not the "Meistersinger" overture that closed the evening to a full house which waited for Wagner's weaving of a song of songs.

Tell it not in Gath, but the city that this week had faced a Bonci without his mustache must also prepare to know a Hofmann whose crown of hair, longer than last year, seemed to show through the opera glass its first touch of Alpine snow. The mature Hofmann carries his medium years with the lightness of our own Joseffy.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From HARTFORD, CONN.
Address
Date JAN 6 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Parsons Theater Monday evening, January 15. On this occasion Harold Pauer, one of the world's greatest piano virtuosos, already a prime favorite with the musical public, will appear as soloist, playing the Schumann "Concerto in A Minor," for piano and orchestra. The work is considered by many musicians the most delightful of all piano concertos and, as Mr. Bauer excels in the interpretation of Schumann, the selection is excellent. The program of orchestral numbers duplicates that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in New York on Thursday evening of the coming week. Subscribers have taken many season tickets and as the demand for seats for the coming concert will be great, the management cannot hold reservations later than Saturday morning, January 13. The sale opens tomorrow morning at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store, No. 201 Asylum street.

From SUN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric next Wednesday evening. The soloist will be Mr. Josef Hofmann, acclaimed the greatest of the younger generation of pianists. Mr. Hofmann, who reached this country just before Christmas, comes by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereby that organization has exclusive control of his services during his stay in America this season, and there is no chance of his appearing in this city again this season and probably for several seasons to come. He has elected to play Chopin's second concerto in F minor, a work that he has made particularly his own.

Director Fiedler's programs in Baltimore this year have been devoted largely to modern and ultra-modern music. It is the duty of an institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep alive the best the past has given to the world in music, as well as to show what the composers of today are doing. Following out this aim, Mr. Fiedler gives as the principal work at the coming concert Beethoven's "Eroica," which, although more than 100 years old, is regarded today, as when it was written, one of the stupendous achievements in music.

The final number on the program, which contains in all three, are the three familiar pieces from Berloiz's "The Damnation of Faust," "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From HARTFORD, CONN.
Address
Date JAN 10 1912

Boston Symphony Concert.

Of Harold Bauer, who will appear as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert at Parsons's theater Monday evening, the critic of the New York Times has this to say: "His performance was a revelation of beauties that are rarely brought to the knowledge of the musical public in a pianist's recital; and this was due in part to the nature of the program he had selected, but also to the marvelous eloquence of his interpretation of the music. Never has he risen to so high an artistic stature, never has his playing been so charged with poetic rapture, and never has it so irresistibly appealed to the hearts of his listeners. And what a sound, manly art it is, tender with the tenderness of strength, thrilling with the emotions of a whole man." On Monday evening Mr. Bauer will perform the solo portion of Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra. The entire program is exceedingly attractive and the concert will undoubtedly be numbered among the best ever presented by the famous organization in our city. Reserved seats obtainable at John M.

[12]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date JAN 12

DR. KARL MUCK COMING BACK.

Will Again Direct Boston Symphony, Beginning Next Fall.

BOSTON, Jan. 11.—Official announcement was made to-day by the management of the Symphony Orchestra of the return of Dr. Karl Muck to be again its conductor, beginning with the concerts of next autumn. The announcement says:

"C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that at last it has been definitely settled that Dr. Kark Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for a term of years.

"Rumors of Dr. Muck's return have been published more or less of late, but all reports that the matter had been settled were decidedly premature. When he left Boston in the spring of 19[illegible] generally understood that as soon as engagement withthe Royal Opera pany of Berlin was ended he would turn to Boston to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Ultimate obstacles, however, have prevented coming up to this time, and only have the great efforts to keep him here many ceased to be made."

From AMERICAN
Address
Date

Pianist Hofmann to Play Here.

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will make his only appearance here of the season at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given under Fiedler's baton in the Academy of Music to-morrow night.

The orchestral part of the program will be devoted entirely to French music, the composers represented being Debussy, Cesar Franck and Berlioz. The Debussy work is the "Iberia," the latest published production of his genius. It is the second of a series of three works for orchestra which he groups under the title of "Images." The first, "Gigue," is not yet published; the last, "Ronde des Printemps," was the first given to the public.

"Iberia" was first performed at a Colonne concert on February 20, 1910. The first performance in the United States was by the Philharmonic Society of New York, conducted by Gustav Mahler, on January 3, 1911. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played it for the first time last April, repeating it at its tenth concert two weeks ago.

It is in three movements, the titles of which are "In the Streets and Wayssides," "The Odors of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day."

The second number will be Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor. The final number will be the three pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March."

Mr. Hofmann will play the concerto of Rubinstein in G major, No. 3.

From EVENING SUN,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

THIRD BOSTON CONCERT

Orchestra Will Be At Lyric Next Wednesday Evening.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He has elected to play Chopin's second certo in F minor, a work that he has made particularly his own.

Conductor Fiedler gives as the principal work at the coming concert Beethoven's "Eroica." The final number on the program are the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy march.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington, which will be given in the National on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, will gain particular interest through the fact that Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, and this will be his only appearance here this season, and probably for several seasons to come. Hofmann comes to America for the sole purpose of playing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for the time being has exclusive command of his time. It has consented to one recital in New York and one in Boston. Mr. Hofmann arrived in America shortly before Christmas and has been spending the holidays on his American estate in Aiken, S. C.

Hofmann was one of the soloists with the Boston Symphony last season, and he made an extraordinary impression on those who heard him. All the promise of his precocious youth has been fulfilled, and today he stands with Paderewski as one of the greatest pianists the world has ever known.

Address
Date JAN 12 1912

DR. KARL MUCK COMING BACK

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Have Onetime Director Again.

Boston, Jan. 11.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of three years was announced to-day.

Since leaving Boston Dr. Muck has been made general musical director of the Imperial Theatres by the German Emperor. Dr. Muck is the second director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to return to that post, his immediate predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, serving two terms.

From EVENING GLOBE,
Address New York City.
Date

DR. MUCK BACK TO BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Jan. 11.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of three years was announced to-day.

Since leaving Boston Dr. Muck has been made general musical director of the imperial theatres by the German emperor.

Dr. Muck is the second director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to return to that post, his immediate predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, serving two terms.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date JAN 12 1912

TO PAY DR. MUCK $28,000.

Boston Symphony Will Give German Conductor a Record Salary.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Jan. 12.—It is announced that Dr. Karl Muck, the celebrated conductor of the Kaiser's Royal Opera in Berlin, has finally concluded the long-pending negotiations with Col. Higginson on behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct that organization in 1913.

Dr. Muck will receive the almost unprecedented salary of $28,000 for one season's work. It is said that Signor Toscanini is the only conductor who ever received a greater salary. The highest salary which the New York Philharmonic Society ever paid was $25,000. Herr Stransky, the present leader of the society, is understood to have accepted the position for $10,000.

From PRESS
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music to-morrow night, is in many respects one of the most important that Conductor Max Fiedler has ever designed for this city. Moreover the concert gains decided interest in that it will mark the only appearance here this year of Mr. Josef Hofmann. Mr. Hofmann, who is in this country for a limited period, under the exclusive control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has grown widely in the last few years in favor with the American public. With the possible exception of Paderewski there is no pianist that draws larger houses and is received with greater enthusiasm.

The orchestral part of the program will be devoted entirely to French music, the composers represented being Debussy, Cesar Franck and Berlioz. The Debussy work is the "Iberia," the latest published production of his genius. It is the second of a series of three works for orchestra, which he groups under the title of "Images." The first, a "Gigue," is not yet published, the last "Ronde des Printemps," was the first given to the public. It is in three movements, the titles of which are "In the streets and waysides," "The odors of the night" and "The morning of a fete day." It may be said that with the possible exception of the second movement, which is in Debussy's most delicate and "atmospheric" manner, "Iberia" is quite the most obvious work that he has produced.

The second number will be Cesar Franck's superb Symphony in D Minor, a work which has come to take its place among the classics of French music. It is a work most beautiful in melody and is wrought with consummate skill. The final number will be the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Ballet of Sylphs" and "Rakoczy March." Mr. Hofmann will play the seldom heard Concerto of Rubinstein, in G Minor, No. 3.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

Dr. Muck wieder Leiter des Bostoner Orchesters.

Boston, 11. Januar. Es wurde heute bekannt gegeben, daß Dr. Karl Muck, der berühmte deutsche Kapellmeister, die Leitung des Boston Symphonie Orchesters wieder übernehmen wird, nachdem er drei Jahre lang abwesend gewesen ist. Seit er Boston verließ, ist

Dr. Muck vom Deutschen Kaiser zum General-Musik-Direktor ernannt worden. Dr. Muck ist der zweite Dirigent des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, der auf diesen Posten zurückkehrt. Wilhelm Gericke, sein unmittelbarer Vorgänger, machte es ebenso.

Gerichtsgebäude an Centre Str.

Der Bau soll zehn Millionen Dollars kosten.

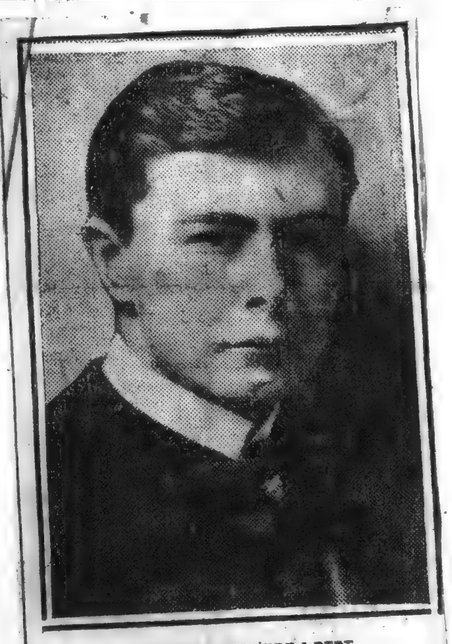
Ein Ausschuß des Vertheilungsraths hat empfohlen, das neue Countygericht auf einem 4 Blocks umfassenden Grundstück aufzuführen, das begrenzt ist wie folgt: Leonard, Lafayette, Baxter, Park und der Platz zwischen Chambers und der Verbindung von Lafayette und Park Str. Auch soll noch, um das Gebäude möglichst freizulegen, ein Stück Land an der Ostseite von Centre Str. dazu genommen werden. Das in Betracht kommende Land mißt 77 „City Lots" und kostet $4,426,000. Der Bau des neuen Gerichtsgebäudes wird zehn Millionen Dollars verschlingen.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address _____

Date _____



JOSEF HOFMANN

With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music tomorrow night is in many respects one of the most important that Conductor Max Fiedler has ever designed for this city. Moreover, the concert gains decided interst in that it will mark the only apparance here this year of Josef Hofmann. Mr. Hofmann, who is in this country for a limited period under the exclusive control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has grown widely in the last few years in favor of the American public. With the possible exception of Paderewski there is no pianist who draws larger houses and is received with greater enthusiasm. This condition is his just due, because he is an artist of extraordinary attainment and with all this is modest, unassuming and a young man entirely devoted to his art.

The orchestral part of the programme will be devoted entirely to French music, the composers represented being Debussy, Cesar Franck and Berlioz. The Debussy work is the "Iberia," the latest published production of his genius. It is the second of a series of three works for orchestra, which he groups under the title of "Images." The first, a "Gigue," is not yet published; the last, "Ronde des Printemps," was the first given to the public. "Iberia" was first performed at a Cologne concert on February 20, 1910. The first performance in the United States was by the Philharmonic Society of New York, conducted by Gustav Mahler, on January 1, 1911. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played it for the first time last April, repeating it at its tenth concert two weeks ago.

It is in three movements, the titles of which are "In the Streets and Waysides," "The Odors of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day." It may be said that with the possible exception of the second movement, which is in Debussy's most delicate and "atmospheric" manner, "Iberia" is quite the most obvious work that he has produced. It reeks with color of Spain, and while differing decidedly from such works as Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" and Chabrier's "Espagna" rhapsody, the impression left of Spain is even more vivid than that of either of these works.

The second number will be Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, a work which has taken its place among the classics of French music. With ears more accustomed to the methods and manners of French composers than they were when this symphony came out 20 years ago, what critics then considered the abstruse qualities of the symphony have disappeared entirely. It is a work most beautiful in melody and is wrought with consummate skill.

The final number will be the three familiar pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," the "Ballet of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March."

Mr. Hofmann will play the seldom-heard Concerto of Rubinstein in G major.

Elgar perhaps, that in the first movement it amounts to an almost Dionysian climax, and at the last shouts out in the brass. In this last movement are reminiscences of themes heard before. The second movement is more thoughtful, with a dramatic interlude, and a rather sentimental opening theme. The Scherzo is well flavored with some dissonances, and some Straussian effects in the orchestra. The fault of the work is its short breath. The short and symphonic nature of the ideas, and the lack of real construction in their development. Phrases and figures are repeated or shifted about in a way that is pleasant-sounding enough, but without getting anywhere, and all the interesting harmony and all the pretty ideas in the world will not suffice if there is no real germination and evolution of the original thought. The glory of this symphony is its exquisite sound, sound for which the ears thirst, and which might well obsess even such an accomplished composer as Mr. Strube, and turn his mind from more substantial things. The performance of the symphony was brilliant, and in response to much applause Mr. Strube rose from his seat in the orchestra and bowed his acknowledgements.

Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture completed the programme.

POST,

JANUARY 20, 191

ANTON WITEK THE SOLOIST

Plays Brahms' Concerto at Symphony Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received public distinction yesterday when Anton Witek, the concert meister of the orchestra, played the Brahm violin concerto, and Gustav Strube's second symphony in E minor was performed for the second time in this city. Mr. Witek, a sterling musician and a great virtuoso, has seldom, if ever, been heard to more advantage in this city. The concerto that he undertook, like Brahms' other concertos for solo instruments, is much more of a symphony with an obligato part than a piece for personal display on the part of the soloist. Mr. Witek interpreted the work with most exemplary fidelity to the ideas of the composer, with an authority and enthusiasm that made the music interesting even to anti-Brahmsites who were present. The concerto itself grows greater with every hearing. In its performance, Mr. Witek made the music, which is often quite complicated in its structure, absolutely transparent to the hearer. He played with such mastery and such well-defined purpose that the performance was of almost unprecedented unity and coherence.

For once there was not the sensation of a puny violin striving its life out against an invincible army of great instruments. The orchestra and the solo instrument were as one voice, and the instrumentation in this symphony certainly ranks with the most beautiful pages of orchestral music in all Brahms. So far as technical requirements were concerned, Mr. Witek quickly showed that he was not only equal to the greatest demands upon his skill, but that he could play all around anything that existed in that particular work. Such reserve power is essential in any artistic undertaking. Mr. Witek could forget the ways and means of his performance, and absorb himself in the interpretation of great music. Seldom, indeed, had that music been more convincing. It is needless to say that the soloist was repeatedly recalled.

Heard for the second time, the virtues and the shortcomings of Mr. Strube's symphony were the more clearly evident. Mr. Strube's instrumentation is a wonder of beauty and euphony and exquisite coloring. Few composers have such an intimate knowledge of every orchestral instrument, and few who write music have had in an equal degree the opportunities of Mr. Strube to become thoroughly conversant with the best orchestral achievements of the day. From the modern Frenchmen he has caught many a color and many a ravishing harmonic progression, and from Strauss as well as others Mr. Strube has learned how to make striking effects.

He has sedulously avoided any of the heavinesses or the bewildering complexities that are found in the more formidable pages of the German master, but there are pages in this second symphony which are by no means without parallel in the score, say, of "Till Eulenspiegel." And then Mr. Strube himself is a composer of genuine and considerable talent.

In this symphony there is an abundance of small and beautiful [illegible]

ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 20, 1912

ACADEMIC PROGRAMME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRUBE'S SYMPHONY IS ONCE MORE HEARD

Anton Witek, Soloist, Flawlessly Performed Difficult Cadenza in Brahms' Violin Concerto.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Strube—Symphony in B minor.
Brahms—Violin Concerto.
Soloist—Mr. Anton Witek.
Beethoven—"Fidelio" Overture.

Academic all through, and sometimes dull, was the above programme. Just why Mr. Strube's symphony should have been repeated is something of a mystery. It had a hearing less than three years ago, and there are many native composers of worth who have to be contented with one hearing of their work, and under less perfect auspices than at a Boston Symphony concert. Happy the composer whose work receives such an interpretation as Mr. Strube's did on this occasion.

Let us by no means be understood as belittling the work. It is the creation of a thorough musician, and a composer who has won his high position without those social aids which have sometimes given a fictitious glamour to the works of lesser men.

The symphony begins well and the figure treatment of the first movement is ingenious enough. There was a pensive dreaminess given to the second movement that was not present at the former performance of the work. But there seemed to be an excess of melancholy in the first two movements. We liked the two last movements best. The third movement was Oriental in a large degree although it is not playful, as one might expect of a scherzo, but the muted horns and the trumpets suggest still further forebodings of evil. There is, however, a sense of triumph in the finale, and there are some fine climaxes. It is altogether a worthy work and might even have deserved this repetition were not other works clamoring for a hearing. We were glad to find the audience very appreciative, and Mr. Strube was called for twice with every demonstration of spontaneous enthusiasm.

We shall never thrill to Brahms' violin concerto. It is to us the academic exhibition of the composer's great skill in sonata-writing, and it also exhibits a great many technical difficulties in the solo violin part. But it has not the genial sweep of Mendelssohn's concerto with its Ossianic finale, nor the mighty power of the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto, nor the appealing and sympathetic sweetness of the slow movement of Bruch's G minor concerto. It is a skilful and long-winded musical disquisition, which is perfectly grammatical and defies you to pick out any slips, but one cannot detect any poetry either.

And like unto this was Herr Anton Witek. Calm and imperturbable, he surmounted every difficulty of the part without turning a hair. He could not put poetry where there was none, or make passages sympathetic which were simply ingenious. But he gave a gloriously broad tone, an intonation that was perfect (except for a slight aberration in the last movement) and he made the finale exciting and powerful. His surety in the highest positions was remarkable, and his double-stopping was very artistic. The extremely difficult cadenza was flawlessly performed. The public fully appreciated the merits of the performance and Mr. Witek was recalled again and again.

After this came the weakest of the four overtures to Beethoven's single opera. The "Fidelio" overture received a virile reading and everybody, from first violinist to kettledrummer united in giving a very spirited reading. But, on the whole, we found the concert less inspiring than many that we have had in Symphony hall this season.

Herald January 20 1912

SYMPHONY BY STRUBE GIVEN

Work in B Minor Is Heard Again, at 13th Public Rehearsal.

MR. FIEDLER CONDUCTS

Mr. Witek Gives an Admirable Performance of Brahms's Concerto.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Witek, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B minor.....Strube
Concerto for violin and orchestra.....Brahms
Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven

Mr. Strube is a fortunate man. He writes an orchestral work or chamber music and it is played before he is old, tottering, like unto Barzillai, the Gileadite, who, refuging to go with King David to Jerusalem, said: "Can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?"

There is a stately row of Mr. Strube's compositions, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra and other organizations. He wrote violin concertos and Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Adamowski played them. He composed for viola and orchestra and Mr. Ferir was soloist for him; he wrote a 'cello concerto and Mr. Warnke chose it for his solo with the Symphony orchestra. A composer, unlike the traditional prophet, is sometimes honored in his own town.

This symphony in B minor has been played here before. It was produced at a concert in April, 1909. The first movement is the best of the four in conception and workmanship. The opening is singularly beautiful, and there are fine thoughts finely expressed in the pages that follow. The second movement, an Adagio, is interesting and expressive. The other movements are entertaining, but there is not sufficient contrast between them. The finale has too much of a scherzo character until the coda-apotheosis is reached. The last two will surely compel applause; the scherzo by its trickey themes, almost insolent use of trumpets, unexpected twists and turnings; the finale by its liveliness and pompous close. Nevertheless, the first movement is the best, and Mr. Strube may well be proud of it.

Nearly 17 years ago his "Maid of Orleans" overture was performed at a Symphony concert. The overture and his Symphony in C minor were of honest German manufacture. Nothing in them hinted at the Strube of later years. The composer was not incorrigibly German. Receptive, he became acquainted with the works of Cesar Franck, Vincent d'Indy, Debussy; nor did he shudder in his conservatism at the reckless Richard Strauss. The character of his own music began to change. His harmonic scheme became more and more varied; his instrumentation grew more bold and brilliant. Not that he assimilated merely for the purpose of aping the composers who interested him. They taught him to shape his own style. In this symphony in B minor there are Debussy-like effects; there are momentary moods like those in "Tristan and Isolde"; there is a motive that is eminently Tschaikowskian; but these are as ornaments on Mr. Strube's own rich costume. The dress itself is of his design and cut. There was a time of experiments; a time when Mr. Strube seemed fascinated chiefly by the bizarre; that was the time of his "Fantastic Overture." This passed and his later works, however fanciful they may be in development and adornment, rest on a firm foundation. He richly deserved the hearty applause of yesterday. The orchestra, led with care and sympathy by Mr. Fiedler, gave an eloquent performance.

The wonder is that the man who wrote the "Fidelio" overture was also the composer of the nobly dramatic and profoundly emotional "Leonora No. 111" for one and the same opera.

Mr. Witek gave an impressive reading of Brahms's concerto. In the first place, it was a noteworthy exhibition of the higher form of violin playing. The music was vitalized by the intelligence of the player. The conception was lofty; the performance was masterly. We all have heard "intellectual" violinists saw through this long concerto without thought of grace or beauty of expression, and the result was the abomination of desolation. Mr. Witek, in his seriousness, did not forget the admirable qualities of a commanding virtuoso. There are violinists in whose hands the concerto has thickness as well as length and breadth. Mr. Witek gave a memorable performance of a work that undoubtedly strongly appealed to him. To some the orator was greater than the subject he treated.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Schumann, symphony in C-major No. 2; Tschaikowsky, concerto in B-flat minor No. 1, for piano (Miss Katharine Goodson); Dvorak, overture, "Husitska."

[122]

JANUARY 20, 1912

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Witek's Admirable Playing of Brahms Concerto.

Mr Strube's Symphony Is Repeated and Generously Applauded.

The 13th Symphony concert yesterday afternoon laid stress upon the orchestra itself. For the symphony Mr Fiedler chose that in B minor by Mr Strube. Mr Witek was the soloist. He played the Brahms concerto, cadenza by Joachim. Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" closed the program.

Mr Strube's symphony was introduced at these concerts three years ago. It was well received yesterday, the audience twice insisting that the composer come down from his place among the first violins and acknowledge the applause.

As a whole it denotes vitality, progressive and individual musical thought, invention and a technical command of the orchestra. In it Mr Strube has not slavishly followed certain models. He has something to say for himself. In the first movement there are passing allusions, particularly in the horns, to the scale of the modern Frenchmen, but they have their own voice. The composer does not set out as though for the mere purpose of an effect.

In flow of ideas the first section of the first movement, in which he exposes his musical material, is more coherent and vital than the development of it. Mr Strube is fond of sequence. Sometimes he deliberately repeats a phrase or clause verbatim without variation in contour of melody or in color of treatment. At times he enforces the effect; at others he weakens it.

There are themes in these opening and closing movements broken up into many notes of a rapidly rhythmical pattern that do not lend themselves as well to impassioned climax as those of more sustained or songful character.

Partly upon this account the slow movement invites and holds the attention of the hearer. The themal germs out of which it grows are melodious, well defined in outline, sufficiently contrasted in nature, and are worked up into a highly effective piece of orchestral writing. There are colorful effects. Individual voices of the different choirs are heard, and there are climaxes of power. The movement was warmly applauded.

The scherzo is the most engaging movement of the four. It abounds with the arch and capricious humor which makes the composer's "Puck" overture a piece of graceful spontaneity and imagination. There were measures yesterday which, when read with a light and flexible hand, with a sense of the spirit of play, of its lights and its shadows, will emerge in a guise more appropriate to their true spirit.

Mr Witek played with the technical sovereignty, the thoughtfulness in interpretation, the breadth and refinement of style of an artist. His tone was flawless in its sweetness and purity. His treatment of sustained passages in the slow movement, particularly in the extreme upper register, was as exquisite singing as the belcanto of Mme Sembrich or of Mr Bonci, an art now cultivated by few.

The last movement, given over by some bizarre bowing and forced tone, retained its true rhythmic integrity and incisiveness, and its tonal beauty. Mr Witek played with that reposse which allows the music to speak through the performer, while the performer without obtrusion enhances and embellishes the beauty of the music, imparting a beauty where it sometimes does not inherently reside. He was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge applause.

The program next week will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony in C major, No. 2; Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte in B minor, No. 1, soloist, Mme Katherine Goodson; Dvorak, overture, "Husitska."

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 19, 1912

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge

LAST evening, for the first time this season, the programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge contained no piece that it has not played recently in Boston, Usually when a "soloist" appears at the concerts in both Boston and Cambridge, he plays a different concerto in each place. Mr. Hofmann, however, chose to repeat in Sanders Theatre Chopin's concerto in F minor which he had already played in Symphony Hall. If performance can make the concerto interesting nowadays, Mr. Hofmann's does so and last evening he excelled himself in the soft and bright tone with which he clothed the music, in the variation of its narrow range of color and expression, in the fluidity of his ornament and in the continence with which he kept the music to its unforced and a little archaic voice. The rest of the concert made one of Mr. Fiedler's agreeable miscellanies: A symphony of Haydn, played at a racing pace but with surprising lightness of tone and accent in a concert-room in which every figure was clearly audible; the overture from Mozart's "Figaro" a little epitome of eighteenth-century brilliance and elegance, formalism and sparkle; the dances and the march from "The Damnation of Faust," for orchestral elasticity and orchestral power; and the glowingly pictorial "Iberia" of Debussy. Nowhere in the stouter music of his later manner has the Parisian been so scintillant of rhythm, fertile of songful melody, and dazzling of instrumental color. And every flash told in the sensitive Sanders Theatre. Its acoustics are like sunlight.

From _____ COURANT

Address _____ HARTFORD, CONN

Date _____ JAN 16 1912

Established

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S BRILLIANT WORK

CROWDED HOUSE HEARS THE SECOND CONCERT.

Harold Bauer is Heard to Great Advantage.

FIEDLER AND MEN GIVE VARIED PROGRAM.

The Parsons Theater was crowded last evening. The occasion was the second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Max Fiedler conducted with even more than usual brilliance and Harold Bauer was heard to great advantage as assisting artist. The program was made up of novelties and old friends and there was plenty of applause for everything played.

The symphony was Cesar Franck's "D-minor" and it was given a brilliant and satisfying reading and rendition. It is a work of great dignity, finely proportioned and melodically beautiful. It was played last evening in the manner absolutely essential to it; great breadth of tone and expression was in the rendition, every phrase of melody was given in full value, every possible beauty of light and shadow was brought out. Mr. Fiedler played the symphony as an organist might play it, for every resource of his great orchestra was as much at his fingers' ends as if he actually had the command of that wonderful tone through a keyboard. The brilliance of answering and repeated phrases was particularly noticeable; the tremendous chord at the close of the first movement was a splendid revelation of the power of the orchestra; the exquisite shading in the Allegretto showed the closeness and sympathy of understanding between the artists of the orchestra and their leader. The symphony was fully appreciated by the vast audience, if applause is any measure of appreciation; Mr. Fiedler had to bow his acknowledgments many times after each movement.

Mr. Bauer was heard with the orchestra in the brilliant Schumann Concerto in A-minor. He played, in the nature of the work, as much as a member of the orchestra as a soloist and the playing was masterly in technique and brilliantly effective. The tonal beauties of the work was made most apparent and the melodic glories all shone most radiantly. The orchestra was heard at its very best in its part of the concerto and the whole work was interpreted in rare beauty. Mr. Bauer was recalled to the stage several times.

Debussy's "Images," with the titles "In the streets and waysides," "The odors of the night" and "The morning of a fete day," were very beautifully played. There probably will always be very violent differences of opinion regarding much of Debussy's work and there certainly were differences expressed in the audience last evening. The "images" are kaleidoscopic tone pictures; impressions are suggested, not really made—and then a quick turn of the glass and something new and strange is seen in the picture for a moment, perhaps reflected from many angles, only to give place to something else differing in form, in combination of colors, in harmony; there is nothing definite, there is nothing said that has a solid base of truth to rest on, the imagination is led on and on—there is no end save the dying away of the tone, no rest in the land of ever-floating phrases.

One irreverent person described the first of the pictures as representing a joyous scene, in which each member of a village band played the tune he knew best, without any regard for the tunes his fellow-players knew; that view is probably slightly exaggerated and the confirmed follower of the great French modernist will turn from it with much scorn. The work sounds, in its oddity and indefiniteness as if it might be played as well by a bad orchestra as by a good one, but all the value of the pictures would have been lost had not the reading last evening been of brilliant power and coherence. The "perfumes" are strangely distilled in peculiar measures and there are wonderfully peculiar and alarming dissonances in the pictures of the night and the dawning of the fete-day; and there are entrancing and alluring melodies as well. Strange music and weird is Debussy's and though it was enjoyed by many in the audience last evening there were probably very few who would have cared to have the numbers repeated.

In most striking contrast to its immediate predecessor on the program came the final number. It was the Berlioz "Rakoczy March" from 'The Damnation of Faust"—stirring, warlike, fierce, absolute in rhythm and sure in meaning. It was played with a tremendous swing and power and the conductor whose whole being had, but a moment before, seemed wrapped in the gauzy clouds of floating French fantasies was now the commander of brilliant battalions of tone, every nerve keyed to the task of making each throbbing note of the well known old march come with a greater force than ever before to the listener. As a mere exhibition of versatility on the part of an orchestra leader the playing of Debussy and Berlioz on the same program is remarkable. And

From _____ TIMES

Address _____ HARTFORD, CONN

Date _____ JAN 16 1912

Established

[illegible] PLEASES IN CONCERT.

Large Audience at Parsons's to Hear Bostonians—Selections Given With Much Feeling.

Welcome as ever, and eagerly waited for, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Conductor Fiedler appeared at Parsons's theater Monday night before an audience only limited by the compass of the place. It was a brilliant audience, and one representing the intelligence and fashion of the city. Perhaps, the fact that Mr. Fiedler conducts only this winter, and is to be succeeded next year by Dr. Muck, has something to do with it. The one represents broader color, richer, more poetic expression; the other a loftier line of classic rendition and purer musical meaning.

The Bostonians have played the principal numbers of last night's program in New York before a most enthusiastic audience. Even the critics applauded the performance, though they caviled at the program. The first number was Cesar Frank's Symphony in D minor. It was entirely new to our audience. It begins with a heavy and slow introduction that unfolds the first theme, which, after some protracted development, leads into the main movement of the part. This is full of a questioning, uncertain expression and full of melodic beauties. It leads to a soft, singing passage for strings, and then broadens into a sounding and energetic statement that recurs again and again. The opening comes back with impressive force and thus we arrive at the end of the part.

The Allegretto opens with light chords for string orchestra and harp. This was deliciously played. It is of soft and romantic character, and the English horn, which carries the melody, had a far and entrancing sound. Then the strings announce a theme, which is interrupted and shared by the woodwinds and by the horn, but in a different key. And now a lively part succeeds, pianissimo by the first violins, which was very effectively played, then taken up by clarinets and modulated against the restless figuration of the strings. The English horn and violins lead to a brilliant finale. The Allegro opens energetically, and broadens to a singing measure, carried by 'cellos and bassoons. The brasses announce a theme and are answered by the strings. Now the main theme of the allegretto, by the English horn, is heard. And again ne motifs develop, and are delivered wit great power and stateliness. Finall after a climax, the opening air recu with breadth and power. A melod of the first part reappears and leads t a very brilliant closing, an ending rare splendor, power and effect.

The orchestra played this with muc feeling. It is not altogether sympa thetic music, and yet some parts ar rarely winsome and harmonious. Othe parts are gorgeous. The horn wa played with great perfection, and th violins assumed dramatic sound, and force new to them. One cannot qui judge such a composition at first hea ing. But the audience can recognize the beauty and the power. And one can, above all, sense the exquisite playing, and the broad, beautiful col- the delicacy of movement, and the or, clear contrasts. The symphony pecu applauded, every movement, and was Fiedler bowed his thanks repeat- edly. The orchestra proved splendid, especially in the half veiled, oddly assorted strains.

And now came the piano concerto in A minor by Schumann. The composer has not written many concertos and they differ from the usual in a greater scope and breadth. The famous pianist, Harold Bauer, a fine young figure whom we have had occasion to admire profoundly on former occasions, played the solo instrument. The concerto is a beautiful work. As usual, the first part, Allegro affecttuso, contains the gist of the music. It is strong and varied, and full of decided expression. The second part, a graceful Andante, in F major, is a romance of exceeding beauty and remarkable melodiousness. Changeful and rich, it nevertheless preserves its tender character of melodiousness and sentiment. It merges into the third part, a lively Andante in A major, which has a triumphant ring, and is full of brilliant passage work. Beautiful modulations vary the score. A new theme is developed in florid fashion. The ending proves long and very effective and some of the early parts are repeated in gorgeous variety and insistent fashion.

Mr. Bauer played marvelously. Above all, the clarity and insistence of his play was remarkable, and then the pointed yet serene expression, which impaired not the smooth brilliancy of his rendition. Above all, each melodic figure stood out distinct and fair, clear of itself and of the orchestra, and the whole concerto built up with a homogeneity and an insistence that proved captivating. Bauer's touch is involuntarily responsive to his musical feeling, and one understands before the ear can note the expression. Above all, his interpretation leads with the composer from fancy to fancy, from strain to strain, and by his guiding hand, calmly and serenely, one comprehends and grasps. Unsuspected beauties are revealed, and you travel over occasional barren places with content and anticipation. And, throughout, this concerto is a work of remarkable dignity, of power, and of great beauty.

Especially in the last part, when the piano answers the orchestra, and the theme is tossed about between the two, is the instrument very effective. Mr. Bauer's tone was beautifully round, smooth, forceful, even, and his production very harmonious and eloquent. Above all it addressed the audience in a direct manner and without noise or effort, remained abreast of the orchestra. The pianist was long and heartily applauded.

There followed the peculiar and quaint Debussy numbers "Spain," which are modern to the finger tips in their conception, and not only novel in execution, but strange and peculiar. The effects won from the instruments are startling, the ideas of the most romantic color. As the program states, the first describes "The streets and waysides," the second "The perfumes of the night," the third, which connects directly with the second, "The morning of a festival." These numbers are charmingly descriptive, full of quaint novelties, full of peculiar harmonic effects that "remind you," not of other music, but of incidents and conditions. The second is charming, the long drawn veiled sounds, the slumberous air, the peculiar changes are of deep effect. It merges into the last, which is very brilliant, and at times, seems flooded with melody. The orchestra played this with richest coloring, and daintiest shades. It was sentiment, and at the same time it was sharply descriptive.

The Rakoczy march is an air that has long electrified Hungarians, and that occasionally has appeared on the Thomas programs. It is a national air, as it were. Of large but close knit design, pompous, with elements of rude force and wild pungent exuberance, with compelling measures full of tinkling reverberation, it suggests the bold riders that swept the plains by the Danube. It is of electric effect, and recalls fast, stormy action, broad display, spirited movement, and fairly glows with broad color. The orchestra played it as it should be, with strength and glitter, with forceful harmony and tinkling reverberations, and with sharp rhythm. Force and splendor and rhythmic beauty are expressed in its measures, and its progress is that of a cavalry march. It roused the audience. And no wonder. It roused the leader and orchestra. And this last number formed a splendid finale to a rich, many-colored concert. The applause was long and very hearty. The Rakoczy march is always one to stir and glitter, and though the orchestra kept it well in hand and at a moderate pace, the measures got away from them. This concert was a remarkably fine one, and yet, when we hear modern symphonies, we long for those of the archmaster. Or, at least, for one of Liszt's sympohnic poems. Or Brahms, or, at least, a Schumann or a Mendelssohn. Our taste is hardly up yet to the ultra moderns—to Cesar Frank.

From _____ COURANT

Address _____ HARTFORD, CONN

Date _____ JAN 15 1912

Established 1824

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Concert at Parsons, the Second of the Series.

The concert at the Parsons Theater tonight will be the second of the season by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fielder as conductor. Harold Bauer, one of the two or three pianists of world-wide reputation, will appear as soloist. Mr. Bauer has visited nearly every European city on his concert tours during the past two years and, in the opinion of foremost critics of New York and Boston, some of his performances of this season excel any in recent years.

A capacity house is already certain for tonight's event. Patrons should, therefore, make every effort to be seated before 8:15 o'clock. The length of the program necessitates opening promptly at this hour and late comers will be obliged to forego the first movement of the symphony. Admission to the gallery is gained through the Prospect street entrance of the theater, where tickets may be obtained.

A few reserved seats will be sold during the day at John M. Gallup & Co.'s store.

[123]

HOLE IN PAGE

JOURNAL
JANUARY 20, 1912.

WORK OF BOSTON COMPOSER HEARD

Strube's Symphony and Witek as Soloist Delight Large Audience.

This is a sort of home talent week at the Symphony concerts. Tre rare spectacle was seen of a composer playing in an orchestra playing his own symphony. Two years ago, when his second symphony in B miner was first performed, Gustav Strube stepped down from his modest place in the rear row of the first violins and conducted the work himself. Yesterday found him sitting well back in the orchestra, though not in his usual place, for there was a rearrangement owing to the custom which kept Concert Master Witek behind the stage until it was time for him to come forth as soloist.

Discovered by Audience

However, the audience, guided by Conductor Fiedler, discovered Mr. Strube in time to make him stand up and bow long before the end of the performance. When the end of this first number came the audience insisted upon having the player-composer come down front and make his bow where everyone could see him.

It was indeed a flattering reception that this German-American musician and his symphony got—and another proof, incidentally, of the local liking for the new music. For Mr. Strube is responsive to the drift of the day and dabbles merrily in the strange harmonies that to some are heavenly and to others an utter abomination. There was especially warm applause for the scherzo, which suggests Richard Strauss indulging in one of his rococo larks; and the impression was left, after the whole thing was over, that a good many persons in the very large audience had been thrilled and delighted, as they would be by one of the old-fashioned works by Beethoven or even Berlioz. Fashions come and go, in symphonies as in skirts; and there is no telling what will next be all the rage.

Was Genuine Triumph

It was easier to understand the applause that punctuated the performance of the Brahms concerto, with Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, as soloist. The melodious romanza which constitutes the second movement makes the concerto welcome even to those who do not appreciate all the little features of the violinist's art. Mr. Witek's technique met the most exacting demands. His elegant rather than solid style was best displayed in the beautiful second movement. The performance was a genuine triumph for the player, who usually sits at the conductor's left hand.

The concert closed with a spirited performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, will be next week's soloist. She will take part in the performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto in B minor, No. 1. Schumann's second symphony and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture will complete the program.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
ITEM
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date JAN 17 1912

Carl Muck has handed in his resignation to Intendent Huelsen, of the Berlin Royal Opera, in order to return to this country next season and resume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fiedler, who succeeded Dr. Muck three years ago, when the latter's German contracts made it impossible for him to continue in Boston, will return to ... at the end of this season.

... of one composer as the ... ws him to be the thor- ...sided musician whose ... as his tasks ...

When ... in the rea... ather it s... oughly ma... ability is as...

...petitor ...e as sensi... concerto; ... it he ...(as ag... ...e an... ...Dep...

From Journal
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date JAN 15 1912

THE MUSICIANS' MECCA.

(From the Evening Bulletin.)

It is announced, and apparently with the weight of official authority, that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra "for a term of years." This is agreeable news to hear. The orchestra has long since ceased to be a matter of interest solely to Bostonians and has become something very much like a national institution. It is cause for congratulation to know that the present conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, under whose four years control the best traditions of the orchestra have been most successfully maintained, will be succeeded by a leader who is recognized generally as one of the two or three greatest conductors of the present day.

The return of Dr. Muck indicates that during his previous incumbency of the post he found his position so agreeable that the lure of the present call is irresistible. For in accepting if he is leaving behind the highest honors at home and resisting the efforts of powerful influences to retain him in Berlin. And the announcement of his reengagement for Boston implies in its wording that he comes here for a long stay if not permanently. More and more this country is becoming the Mecca for European musicians. It has long been recognized as the place above all others where the financial rewards for the artist were far the most attractive. Yet something beyond this, and more to our credit, is required to draw across the sea a man of Dr. Muck's calibre, situated as he is at home.

TRAVELER,
JANUARY 20, 1912.

Charming Program By the Symphony.

The 13th rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon provided one of the best concerts of the season. The Strube symphony needs no introduction to Boston. It has already established its place in the heart of local music lovers as well as many another composition of this sterling musician. It was one of the pleasures of yesterday's concert to note the way the audience insisted upon Mr. Strube's coming forward and receiving its demonstration of approval. Belief still maintains that the better part of the symphony lies in the first two movements, more particularly the first. The second two are hardly worthy the high standard of the beginning, being more of what might be called "tricks" rather than substantial.

Mr. Witek's playing of the Brahms concerto in D major for violin and orchestra was a wonderful revelation of the beauties of this composition and the possibilities of the violin when in a master's hands. It was the treat of the concert.

The Beethoven "Fidelio" overture provides a sprightly but, nevertheless, tame closing to an otherwise fine concert.

From ... Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
Address New York City
Date JAN 17 1912

JARRING NOTES BY FIRST VIOLIN

Swornsbourne Alleged by His Wife to Have Hurled an Entire Breakfast at Her.

SHE IS SUING FOR DIVORCE

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 16.

The story of a first violin whose heart strings brought forth discordant tones was told in the Divorce Court to-day. The first violin was Walter W. Swornsbourne, for many years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and now of the Boston Opera House Orchestra, and as a sample of the jarring notes in their married life his wife told of being made the target one morning of an entire breakfast, which she said the musician threw at her piece by piece.

Mrs. Swornsbourne, a strikingly attractive woman of 35 years, gave the court a number of reasons why she thought she ought to have a divorce. Her husband, she said, had been cruel and abusive. For the sake of their children she had tried to continue to live with him, but last June things got to such a state that she felt obliged to leave, she testified.

Regarding the incident of the breakfast table, she said:

"He threw every article that was on the table at me. One of the articles struck one of the children. Then I decided to leave him."

Another case of bad aim on the part of her husband by which she believed she escaped injury was related by Mrs. Swornsbourne. "He hurled a chair at me," said the witness, "but it went wide of his aim and smashed a window."

Established ...

From ... Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
Address PARIS EDITION.
Date JAN 9 1912

AMERICA TO CLAIM ANOTHER LEADING GERMAN CONDUCTOR.

Dr. Muck Signs Contract with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[FROM THE HERALD'S CORRESPONDENT.]

BERLIN, Saturday.—America is to claim another of Germany's most distinguished conductors next season, a contract having just been closed between Dr. Karl Muck, the musical director of the Berlin Royal Opera, and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1906 Dr. Muck, through the magnanimity of his Royal patron, the German Emperor, was allowed two years of absence, which he passed in Boston, and when the time came for him to return to his European post it was generally understood that Colonel Higginson had secured from him a pledge to identify himself permanently with the Boston orchestra at the expiration of his Berlin contract, of which he is now absolving his last season.

Had Dr. Muck remained one year longer at his Berlin post he would have been able to have looked back upon two decades of activity, and would therefore have been eligible for the pension list. This loss will be made good to him by a group of Boston symphony subscribers, who have taken out a large life insurance policy in his name, far exceeding the sum he would eventually have drawn from the pension fund here.

By the terms of his Boston contract, made public to-day, Dr. Muck will receive $28,000 a season, which is the largest sum ever received by any orchestral conductor, with the possible exception of Signor Toscanini. The late Herr Gustav Mahler was paid only $25,000 for his strenuous work with the New York Philharmonic.

Since Dr. Richard Strauss secured his release from the Berlin Opera, and is now only connected with this institution in the capacity of conductor at the big symphonic events, the chief burden of the ten months' opera season has fallen upon Dr. Muck, and the question of his successor will be extremely difficult of solution. Notwithstanding the fact that the musical ranks are overflowing in all directions, conductors of distinction are still lamentably scarce, as was proved when it became necessary to find a successor for Herr Felix Weingartner in Vienna, and more recently to fill the Munich post left vacant by the death of Herr Felix ...l.

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date JAN 14 1912

Established ...

Turned Away From Balls.

During the week society turned away from balls and parties to attend the Boston Symphony concert. So much are these musical events recognized as important social functions that invitations are seldom, if ever, issued for the evenings upon which these concerts fall, and this, as much as anything else, shows how the love and appreciation for music are growing in our midst. These concerts appeal more to the women than to the men, for most husbands or brothers of cavaliers take the women only as far as the door, and are found waiting there for them when the concert is over. That people do not entertain on Symphony concert nights shows how largely society and its functions depend upon what the women think on the subject.

The Klots' dinner at the Belvedere in honor of Mrs. Satterlee, Mr. Pierpont Morgan's daughter, was a brilliant affair, and had a fitting sequence at the Monday German, where all the guests went afterward. Mr. Klots, the host, has made a reputation for himself, not only as a fine and popular portrait painter of society people, but as a charming addition to our social life, and Mrs. Klots is an able partner for him in attaining popularity.

The Swan Fricks again opened their delightful home in a small way during the early part of the week, when they entertained Mme. de Weerth, who has received every attention from her old friends in Baltimore, who are delighted to welcome her and who at the same time regret the shortness of her stay among them.

From ... JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date ...

...ecedent.

DR. MUCK TO RETURN TO SYMPHONY

Former Leader to Take Up Directorate of Boston Orchestra Next Season.

Boston, Jan. 11.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck to the directorate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season after an absence of three years was announced to-day.

Since Dr. Muck left Boston Emperor William has made him musical director of the Imperial theatres of Germany.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ITEM
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date JAN 12 1912

...ning.

The Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will play the second concert of the season at Parsons's theater Monday evening. Harold Bauer, the soloist for the occasion, will perform the piano part of Schumann's concerto in A minor. The balance of the program is identical with that performed at Carnegie hall Thursday night. The critic of the Sun says: "The Symphony (Sesar Franck's No. 2 in D minor), has never had a better reading here than that which Mr. Fiedler gave it, with so much warmth and understanding. The orchestra acquitted itself splendidly and the applause proved that the audience thoroughly understood the value of the performance." It is expected that an audience of large proportions will attend the concert Monday night. Seats at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From COURANT
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date JAN 11 1912

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the series of three by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Monday evening at the Parsons Theater. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, recognized as one of the great pianists of the day.

The Schumann Concerto, which Mr. Bauer will play, is one of the gems of romantic music. It is played frequently in New York and Boston and much admired by music lovers everywhere. It has appeared but seldom on a Hartford program. The work bubbles over with delightful melodies effectively tossed from solo instrument to each voice in the orchestra, and will afford opportunity for proper display of the musicianship for which Bauer is celebrated. The entire program is exceptional, and affords something for every taste.

Seats are now on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s store, No. 201 Asylum street.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World ITEM
From ... HARTFORD, CONN.
Address ...
Date JAN 13 1912

Boston Orchestra To-night.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Harold Bauer, pianist, appear at Parsons's this evening for the second concert of the series. The program is extremely interesting, and its length necessitates opening promptly at 8:15 o'clock. It is therefore important that the audience be seated at that hour. Following the usual custom at these concerts the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number. A limited number of reserved seats and gallery admission tickets may be procured at the box-office this evening.

MUCK COMES BACK

By MORTON BIRGE

SING a song of Symphony, Muck is coming back,
Herr Direktor Muck of genius rare.
We get Muck and, also note, get the royal Deutsches goat,
For they tried to keep him over there.

Look at all the classy jobs offered Dr. Muck,
Anything he wanted over home.
Any post he could command in the blessed Vaterland,
If the Herr Direktor wouldn't roam.

Berliner and Viennese, Munich also ran,
All implored the Doctor not to go;
And the Emperor himself offered post and prize and pelf,
All the Deutsche love the Doctor so.

Sing a song of Symphony, Boston turns the trick,
Muck will boss our orchestra once more.
Spite of Emperor and all, Muck hears only Boston's call,
Back to Boston where he was before.

[124]

HOLE IN PAGE

JOURNAL—
JANUARY 20, 1912.

WORK OF BOSTON COMPOSER HEARD

Strube's Symphony and Witek as Soloist Delight Large Audience.

This is a sort of home talent week at the Symphony concerts. Tre rare spectacle was seen of a composer playing in an orchestra playing his own symphony. Two years ago, when his second symphony in B minor was first performed, Gustav Strube stepped down from his modest place in the rear row of the first violins and conducted the work himself. Yesterday found him sitting well back in the orchestra, though not in his usual place, for there was a rearrangement owing to the custom which kept Concert Master Witek behind the stage until it was time for him to come forth as soloist.

Discovered by Audience

However, the audience, guided by Conductor Fiedler, discovered Mr. Strube in time to make him stand up and bow long before the end of the performance. When the end of this first number came the audience insisted upon having the player-composer come down front and make his bow where everyone could see him.

It was indeed a flattering reception that this German-American musician and his symphony got—and another proof, incidentally, of the local liking for the new music. For Mr. Strube is responsive to the drift of the day and dabbles merrily in the strange harmonies that to some are heavenly and to others an utter abomination. There was especially warm applause for the scherzo, which suggests Richard Strauss indulging in one of his rococo larks; and the impression was left, after the whole thing was over, that a good many persons in the very large audience had been thrilled and delighted, as they would be by one of the old-fashioned works by Beethoven or even Berlioz. Fashions come and go, in symphonies as in skirts; and there is no telling what will next be all the rage.

Was Genuine Triumph

It was easier to understand the applause that punctuated the performance of the Brahms concerto, with Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, as soloist. The melodious romanza which constitutes the second movement makes the concerto welcome even to those who do not appreciate all the little features of the violinist's art. Mr. Witek's technique met the most exacting demands. His elegant rather than solid style was best displayed in the beautiful second movement. The performance was a genuine triumph for the player, who usually sits at the conductor's left hand.

The concert closed with a spirited performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, will be next week's soloist. She will take part in the performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto in B minor, No. 1. Schumann's second symphony and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture will complete the program.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date JAN

Carl Muck has handed in his resignation to Intendent Huelsen, of the Berlin Royal Opera, in order to return to this country next season and resume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fiedler, who succeeded Dr. Muck three years ago, when the latter's German contracts made it impossible for him to continue in Boston, will return to ... at the end of this season.

Establ 1.

...ductor succeeds ... of one composer as the ...ws him to be the thor... ...sided musician whose ... as his tasks ...

...when the ... in the real ...ether it sh... ...oughly man... ...ability is as ...

...pet.hlot ...e as sensi... ...concerto; ... it he ... (as age ...e an ... pet

From Evening Mail, New York City

Address

Date JAN 17 1912

JARRING NOTES BY FIRST VIOLIN

Swornsbourne Alleged by His Wife to Have Hurled an Entire Breakfast at Her.

SHE IS SUING FOR DIVORCE

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 16.

The story of a first violin whose heart strings brought forth discordant tones was told in the Divorce Court to-day. The first violin was Walter W. Swornsbourne, for many years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and now of the Boston Opera House Orchestra, and as a sample of the jarring notes in their married life his wife told of being made the target one morning of an entire breakfast, which she said the musician threw at her piece by piece.

Mrs. Swornsbourne, a strikingly attractive woman of 35 years, gave the court a number of reasons why she thought she ought to have a divorce. Her husband, she said, had been cruel and abusive. For the sake of their children she had tried to continue to live with him, but last June things got to such a state that she felt obliged to leave, she testified.

Regarding the incident of the breakfast table, she said:

"He threw every article that was on the table at me. One of the articles struck one of the children. Then I decided to leave him."

Another case of bad aim on the part of her husband by which she believed she escaped injury was related by Mrs. Swornsbourne. "He hurled a chair at me," said the witness, "but it went wide of his aim and smashed a window."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From Journal

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date JAN 15 1912

Establisl

THE MUSICIANS' MECCA.

(From the Evening Bulletin.)

It is announced, and apparently with the weight of official authority, that Dr. Karl Muck will return to Boston next fall to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra "for a term of years." This is agreeable news to hear. The orchestra has long since ceased to be a matter of interest solely to Bostonians and has become something very much like a national institution. It is cause for congratulation to know that the present conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, under whose four years control the best traditions of the orchestra have been most successfully maintained, will be succeeded by a leader who is recognized generally as one of the two or three greatest conductors of the present day.

The return of Dr. Muck indicates that during his previous incumbency of the post he found his position so agreeable that the lure of the present call is irresistible. For in accepting it he is leaving behind the highest honors at home and resisting the efforts of powerful influences to retain him in Berlin. And the announcement of his reëngagement for Boston implies in its wording that he comes here for a long stay if not permanently. More and more this country is becoming the Mecca for European musicians. It has long been recognized as the place above all others where the financial rewards for the artist were far the most attractive. Yet something beyond this, and more to our credit, is required to draw across the sea a man of Dr. Muck's calibre, situated as he is at home.

TRAVELER,
JANUARY 20, 1912.

Charming Program By the Symphony.

The 13th rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon provided one of the best concerts of the season. The Strube symphony needs no introduction to Boston. It has already established its place in the heart of local music lovers as well as many another composition of this sterling musician. It was one of the pleasures of yesterday's concert to note the way the audience insisted upon Mr. Strube's coming forward and receiving its demonstration of approval. Belief still maintains that the better part of the symphony lies in the first two movements, more particularly the first. The second two are hardly worthy the high standard of the beginning, being more of what might be called "tricks" rather than substantial.

Mr. Witek's playing of the Brahms concerto in D major for violin and orchestra was a wonderful revelation of the beauties of this composition and the possibilities of the violin when in a master's hands. It was the treat of the concert.

The Beethoven "Fidelio" overture provides a sprightly but, nevertheless, tame closing to an otherwise fine concert.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK HERALD

Address PARIS EDITION.

Date JAN 9 1912

AMERICA TO CLAIM ANOTHER LEADING GERMAN CONDUCTOR.

Dr. Muck Signs Contract with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[FROM THE HERALD'S CORRESPONDENT.]

BERLIN, Saturday.—America is to claim another of Germany's most distinguished conductors next season, a contract having just been closed between Dr. Karl Muck, the musical director of the Berlin Royal Opera, and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1906 Dr. Muck, through the magnanimity of his Royal patron, the German Emperor, was allowed two years of absence, which he passed in Boston, and when the time came for him to return to his European post it was generally understood that Colonel Higginson had secured from him a pledge to identify himself permanently with the Boston orchestra at the expiration of his Berlin contract, of which he is now absolving his last season.

Had Dr. Muck remained one year longer at his Berlin post he would have been able to have looked back upon two decades of activity, and would therefore have been eligible for the pension list. This loss will be made good to him by a group of Boston symphony subscribers, who have taken out a large life insurance policy in his name, far exceeding the sum he would eventually have drawn from the pension fund here.

By the terms of his Boston contract, made public to-day, Dr. Muck will receive $28,000 a season, which is the largest sum ever received by any orchestral conductor, with the possible exception of Signor Toscanini. The late Herr Gustav Mahler was paid only $25,000 for his strenuous work with the New York Philharmonic.

Since Dr. Richard Strauss secured his release from the Berlin Opera, and is now only connected with this institution in the capacity of conductor at the big symphonic events, the chief burden of the ten months' opera season has fallen upon Dr. Muck, and the question of his successor will be extremely difficult of solution. Notwithstanding the fact that the musical ranks are overflowing in all directions, conductors of distinction are still lamentably scarce, as was proved when it became necessary to find a successor for Herr Felix Weingartner in Vienna, and more recently to fill the Munich post left vacant by the death of Herr Felix ...

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Establis

Turned Away From Balls.

During the week society turned away from balls and parties to attend the Boston Symphony concert. So much are these musical events recognized as important social functions that invitations are seldom, if ever, issued for the evenings upon which these concerts fall, and this, as much as anything else, shows how the love and appreciation for music are growing in our midst. These concerts appeal more to the women than to the men, for most husbands or brothers of cavaliers take the women only as far as the door, and are found waiting there for them when the concert is over. That people do not entertain on Symphony concert nights shows how largely society and its functions depend upon what the women think on the subject.

The Klots' dinner at the Belvedere in honor of Mrs. Satterlee, Mr. Pierpont Morgan's daughter, was a brilliant affair, and had a fitting sequence at the Monday German, where all the guests went afterward. Mr. Klots, the host, has made a reputation for himself, not only as a fine and popular portrait painter of society people, but as a charming addition to our social life, and Mrs. Klots is an able partner for him in attaining popularity.

The Swan Fricks again opened their delightful home in a small way during the early part of the week, when they entertained Mme. de Weerth, who has received every attention from her old friends in Baltimore, who are delighted to welcome her and who at the same time regret the shortness of her stay among them.

From PROVIDENCE, R. I. JOURNAL

Address

...cidental.

DR. MUCK TO RETURN TO SYMPHONY

Former Leader to Take Up Directorate of Boston Orchestra Next Season.

Boston, Jan. 11.—The return of Dr. Karl Muck to the directorate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season after an absence of three years was announced to-day.

Since Dr. Muck left Boston Emperor William has made him musical director of the Imperial theatres of Germany.

, 188

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address HARTFORD, CONN.

Date JAN 12 1912

...ning.

The Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will play the second concert of the season at Parsons's theater Monday evening. Harold Bauer, the soloist for the occasion, will perform the piano part of Schumann's concerto in A minor. The balance of the program is identical with that performed at Carnegie hall Thursday night. The critic of the Sun says: "The Symphony (Sesar Franck's No. 2 in D minor), has never had a better reading here than that which Mr. Fiedler gave it, with so much warmth and understanding. The orchestra acquitted itself splendidly and the applause proved that the audience thoroughly understood the value of the performance." It is expected that an audience of large proportions will attend the concert Monday night. Seats at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From COURANT

Address

Date JAN 11 1912

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the series of three by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Monday evening at the Parsons Theater. The soloist will be Harold Bauer, recognized as one of the great pianists of the day.

The Schumann Concerto, which Mr. Bauer will play, is one of the gems of romantic music. It is played frequently in New York and Boston and much admired by music lovers everywhere. It has appeared but seldom on a Hartford program. The work bubbles over with delightful melodies effectively tossed from solo instrument to each voice in the orchestra, and will afford opportunity for proper display of the musicianship for which Bauer is celebrated. The entire program is exceptional, and affords something for every taste.

Seats are now on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s store, No. 201 Asylum street.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World TIMES

From

Address JAN 15 1912

Date

Boston Orchestra To-night.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Harold Bauer, pianist, appear at Parsons's this evening for the second concert of the series. The program is extremely interesting, and its length necessitates opening promptly at 8:15 o'clock. It is therefore important that the audience be seated at that hour. Following the usual custom at these concerts the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number. A limited number of reserved seats and gallery admission tickets may be procured at the box-office this evening.

MUCK COMES BACK

By MORTON BIRGE

SING a song of Symphony, Muck is coming back,
Herr Direktor Muck of genius rare.
We get Muck and, also note, get the royal Deutsches goat,
For they tried to keep him over there.

Look at all the classy jobs offered Dr. Muck,
Anything he wanted over home.
Any post he could command in the blessed Vaterland,
If the Herr Direktor wouldn't roam.

Berliner and Viennese, Munich also ran,
All implored the Doctor not to go;
And the Emperor himself offered post and prize and pelf,
All the Deutsche love the Doctor so.

Sing a song of Symphony, Boston turns the trick,
Muck will boss our orchestra once more.
Spite of Emperor and all, Muck hears only Boston's call,
Back to Boston where he was before.

[12]

From TIMES,

Address Washington, D. C. JAN 13 1912

DR. MUCK'S RETURN TO SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra holds a warm place in the affections of the people of Washington. It is something more than an assembly of talented artists; it is an institution, with venerable traditions and high ideals clustered about it, Its interpretation of the master composers, at once sympathetic and intelligent, carries with it a convincing quality which seems to approach nearer to the soul of music than anything with which the people of this country are familiar.

It will come as a delightful assurance, therefore, that Dr. Muck, who did so much in the past to bring it to its present high state of efficiency will return to the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra next fall. When he succeeded Mr. Gericke in his capacity he found a great organization of master musicians ready to hand, but he did something more than maintain the prestige which had been handed down to him, invested with the special charm of Mr. Gericke's personality. He infused into the orchestra his own earnest and devoted spirit.

It was a matter of great regret when at "the command" of the German Emperor he went to the Royal Opera in Berlin. In returning for two seasons, on leave of absence, to conduct the Symphony he merely stimulated anew the old desire on his part and on the part of the orchestra's faithful friends that he would one day return and resume his post permanently. The moment that he was free to do so, he took that course, and the series of concerts next fall will be awaited with impatient interest and a warm welcome will be extended to Dr. Muck.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 20, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. STRUBE AND MR. WITEK HAVE THEIR DAY

A Concert That Belied Anticipation of Dulness—The Interesting and Distinctive Qualities of Mr. Strube's Symphony—Its Orchestral and Harmonic Imagination and Its Themes of Mood—Mr. Witek Plays Brahms's Concerto with a Surprising Eloquence—The Violinist in New Aspects

THE superfluously prophetic, as the outcome proved, foretold a dull Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—the first, they added apologetically, in the whole course, thus far, of a long season. Unusually with Mr. Fiedler, the programme followed the austere classic model—a symphony, a concerto, an overture. The symphony was Mr. Strube's, and though it had proved uncommonly interesting when it was first played here, an audience will not anticipate unfamiliar music by a resident composer, though he speak with the tongues of men and of angels, as it anticipates an unfamiliar piece signed with the illustrious names of Berlin and Paris. The concerto was Brahms's forbidding concerto for violin, while the violinist was Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra. As it happens, Mr. Witek has a very pretty international reputation as a violinist of high rank and it stretches from The Hague and Brussels to Berlin and Vienna, but to the average hearer he was, again, only a resident musician. The overture was that which Beethoven finally made for his opera of "Fidelio," and, as the concert actually ran, it was the only dull piece on the programme. Very seldom do we hear "Fidelio" in Boston; and nowhere but in the opera house is this overture often played. Even there, the audience barely listens to it, wisely waiting for the real overture to "Fidelio," the masterpiece, perhaps, of all overtures, the "Leonore No. 3," which wise conductors now play between the second and the third acts of the opera. The actual overture to "Fidelio" is merely a joyful noise before the opera begins, duly written according to the academic forms. It does not in the least suggest the substance or the spirit of "Fidelio;" it hardly suggests Beethoven, except in a horn passage or two and in the chords that interrupt a commonplace and sentimentalized cantilena. The cynics said, as they waded through the slush of Massachusetts avenue after the concert, that Mr. Fiedler must have played the overture as a curiosity.

Mr. Strube's symphony, however, was not dull. The orchestra played it as though they would make every shading in the instrumental coloring and every stroke in the harmonic background tell. Mr. Fiedler found the melodic line and the true pace in most of the music, though he took the Adagio so slowly that it seemed like color squeezed from a tube; and with the men he kept to the elasticity of modulation and the quality of tone that give the piece its freedom of form and voice and its recurring suggestion of mystery. Finally, the audience, almost in spite of itself, was interested and pleased and twice and thrice called Mr. Strube from his place among the violins to receive its plaudits. Usually composers, when they are at hand, conduct in their own unfamiliar symphonies. In the past Mr. Strube has done so often in his new music. Yesterday he was content, in his ordinary duties, to play a violin part in his symphony and in one of the most interesting and individual symphonies that has yet come from American hands.

It is easy to say that a symphony is primarily a symphony for connoisseurs in harmonics and orchestration and that for this reason his comrades, conductors and specialists generally admire it. Now, it is quite true that Mr. Strube has not sat these twenty years in the Symphony Orchestra with closed ears. Strauss, in his earlier days, when he happened to be conducting a "repertory" performance of "Lohengrin" told a friend who pitied him in this routine job, that throughout the evening he had been studying the possibilities of the wood-winds. Similarly, Mr. Strube has heard, studied, meditated and imagined in his turn. Wherefore his symphony teems with telling strokes of instrumental contrast and combinations, with very sensitive feeling for different instruments, groups of instruments and their relations, with subtle and significant shadings of their voices. In a word, Mr. Strube has orchestral imagination. His Scherzo in the symphony is clear and particular proof of this quality. They say that in his "Fetes," Debussy saw and heard in imagination a dance of particles of light and air. In similar fashion, the hearer might say that in the Scherzo, Mr. Strube saw, heard and accomplished a fantastic dance of instruments, now parting and flashing through flickering rhythms, and now coalescing in a progress that momentarily seems rhythmically precise. Again, Mr. Strube has listened to the harmonic experiments that are the dear delight of ultra-modern composers. He has studied them, meditated upon them and gained the courage and the imaginative quickening to invent some of his own. Out of this harmonic imagination springs the veiled beauty of the beginning of the symphony, the voice of mystery and remoteness that recurs and summons so often through it, even when for a while the composer is open and exuberant. It has its instrumental fascination; it has also its harmonic individuality and distinction. Properly Mr. Strube takes suggestions; he does not pilfer.

Of course, Mr. Strube in his symphony is the child of his time. He is a man, not a recluse; he lives in this good musical world of ours, and he writes in its idiom. He has caught, for example, the contemporary shrillness of tone in emphatic passages, as though composer and band could not be too insistent, though he carries this shrillness to no such excesses as does Reger. He merely sets a penetrating edge to his music. Again, he courts the sequence, the reiterated sequence, though he does not push his love for it to the amorous folly of Elgar, and he never uses it with heavy British assertion of the commonplace. Admittedly, Mr. Strube's symphonic voice is restless—otherwise it would not be a symphonic voice of our time. Yet thereby his music is always in motion and sometimes with the fine, swift energy of the Finale. Anyhow, it never stagnates. Mr. Strube likes abrupt transition, sharp contrast, large climaxes—which are none the worse because they now and then recall the penetrating voice and the swelling motion of Mr. d'Indy's. Mr. Strube is not a composer in the symphony who meditates long over his musical ideas and cunningly and calculatingly develops them. He can and does sustain them in the slow movement and in the opening allegro—and to beauty of impression. Moreover, these ideas are less melodies to be "dealt with" than, the English say, in academic fashion, plan suggestions of mood to be varied and developed imaginatively through the symphonic movement that springs from them. They are themes of mood that do carry their suggestion; Mr. Strube even dares to make some of the moods light. In this moody quality is the thematic distinction and individuality of his symphony. It does not lack substance, but the substance is a departure from academic pretension—sometimes miscalled solidity.

A year and more ago for Mr. Witek's first appearance as a "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, the violinist played Beethoven's concerto. He played it with an exceeding perfection of technical skill, with an exquisite feeling for the quality and the variations of his tone, for the leading of melodies, for adroitness of transition, with an unroughened elegance of style. There were beauty, charm, violinistic felicity in all that he did. Some objected, however, that he divitalized the music; that he made the concerto a sublimated virtuoso piece. As it happens, there is plentiful evidence, internal and external, that Beethoven so designed and wrote the concerto; but in these days when he is a classic of classics, it is not "respectable," it is "irresponsible," to harbor such an idea and, much more, to put it into print. None the less the concerto itself proclaims it and Mr. Witek had studied the music so acutely and diligently that he made his playing accord with its true voice and style and let the pedants wag their stupid heads. Yesterday, when he passed to Brahms's concerto, he showed equal discernment of the characteristic quality of the music and equal discrimination of style in his playing of it. The concerto is not elegant; it does not invite charm, or the more exquisite violinistic perfections. It exacts a large voice, a vigorous eloquence, mingled sureness and elasticity of style, revealing thought, touched by kindling fire. Brahms's music, though the devout like not to believe it, needs performance much more than does that of many a composer. It is not quite alive, not quite articulate on the engraved page. The conductor, the singer must set the vitalizing, characterizing spark to it and then blow the flame.

All this Mr. Witek accomplished for the concerto. He might have played it pedagogically. The pessimistic lobbies even predicted that he played it pedagogically. But he, from the very first entrance of the violin, struck fire. The entering phrase disclosed the breadth and the quality of voice and style with which Mr. played the whole concerto. The passage-work" confirmed his mastery and intensifying tone and energizing and variation. He "felt" his tone relatively as he had in Beethoven's when the music required fineness and its familiar delicacy; but oftener (the music demanded) it was large and rich, with the sober beauty, the penetrating gravity that is of the very spirit Brahms.

Often, the violinist seemed to recreate the music, to give it life and voice, not only by this tone, but by the eloquence with which he led it from modulation to modulation, from quiet through incisiveness to vigorous climax. Sometimes his violin spoke above and to the orchestra; again it was like a fine thread shining through the thick web of orchestral tone. Mr. Witek made the slow movement pungent of its bitter-sweet melody. He did not dry it; he did not sentimentalize. His tone and his feeling kept it of Brahms's soberly characteristic beauty. In the finale Mr. Witek's tone was at once bright and large; there was rhythmic fire in his play with the three melodies of the rondo; he kept the incessant ornament running freely, lightly, and yet how often have lesser violinists made it seem excessive and awkward. The finale measures rose to rhapsodic voice, as though a Brahms who can seem pedagogic, and a violinist who also can seem so, had forgotten themselves and were writing and playing in hot blood. Since Dr. Muck played Brahms's first symphony and Mr. Fiedler his second, the composer and his music have not been so vitalized at our concerts.

H. T. P.

POST,

JANUARY 27, 1912

MISS GOODSON THE SOLOIST

Symphony Wins More Laurels by Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the 14th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Katherine Goodson was the soloist, playing Tschaikowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor. The orchestral pieces were Schumann's Second Symphony and Dvorak's overture, "Husitka." The performance of the Schumann symphony was an admirable one, and in this connection it may be said that there are few conductors themselves so sincere and so in love with the music of Schumann that they can communicate his very personal appeal as can Mr. Fiedler. And there is, perhaps, no composer of orchestral music who speaks so directly and personally to the hearer. This becomes the more evident with every season that passes. The symphonies of Schumann become more popular, and more understood, rather than less so, with advancing years, and these are the symphonies that have been rather contemptuously described as in the style of piano duets, as quite unsymphonic in thought and style, as lamentably lacking in brilliance, clearness, individuality in instrumentation. But nothing heard yesterday was so touching as this symphony, with its short-breathed themes, its variety of little mannerisms so characteristic of Schumann, and considered so unethical in a composer when confronted by a symphony. And how one wishes for some more wood and brass in the final movement.

Superbly Played

Still Schumann speaks in a way that has not been imitated successfully, or very nearly approached since his day, and that turns an army of instruments into a single organ for the expression of the most delicate and intimate or strongly subjective moods. For all its stringy tone, the finale strides forward as surely and as proudly as the Winged Victory. Mr. Fiedler interpreted this symphony with the most admirable attention to all its charming details, in a most romantic manner, and with a conviction that affected equally the players under him and the audience which applauded so warmly afterwards. The men rose to acknowledge the applause with the conductor.

Miss Goodson gave a virile and exciting performance of Tschaikowsky's gorgeous work. She took the piece in a symphonic spirit, and she played with the greatest authority and enthusiasm. She was abundantly equal to the large demands upon the muscle and the brains of the performer. This was good, straightforward, almost masculine playing, and it was more, for the final movement hung together as it seldom does and for once its first theme was taken with appropriate dash and savagery, and the grand final appearance of the singing theme with sufficient breadth. The pianist who handles this concerto must have two good hands, or fists would be a better word, and in addition to qualities of a thorough musician, at least a sufficiency of animal spirit to do justice to its furious vitality.

Miss Goodson Excels

Miss Goodson displayed all these qualities in a plentiful measure, and she played the slow movement without undue nicety or sentimentalizing. On the whole, while there are pages in this work which permit of more subtlety of treatment and more distinction of coloring than were given it, this was one of the best performances of the B-flat minor concerto that has been heard here in a number of years. It is seldom that a woman pianist appreciates so genuinely a work built on great lines and composed without gloves.

The "Husitka" overture was a completion of this mood. Today many of us find Dvorak a gifted lyricist, but a composer conspicuously lacking in modern intensity of feeling; but this overture, as Hanslick put it in 1892, "is of fanatical spirit, as though passages were orchestrated with hatchets, scythes and battle maces." The orchestra is a tumult of battle, and no finer backbone for the shouting, clanging music could be provided than by the themes of the old hymns employed by the composer with such skill and effect. This overture was played with due energy, and it was a pleasant, stirring sensation.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date JAN 14 1912

Those to whom all music means only opera would undoubtedly be astonished if they should occasionally travel up to Carnegie Hall when one of the really important concerts is about to take place. At the last matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the writer was amused at noting the limitless amazement expressed by the countenance of a young man who learned that he could not walk in at 2 p. m. and buy a seat. When he was told that the house had been sold out for five days, he departed quite speechless in search of a speculator. And the speculators had all gone away, because they too were sold out.

Establi

And speaking (en passant) of speculators it may as well be noted that they are doing business openly before the opera house, the concert resorts, and some of the theatres. They make no hesitation about crying their wares loudly even when policemen are not ten feet away. Neither do they hesitate to plant themselves in front of peaceable citizens and block their progress while they thrust their clamor into the faces of the passer by.

But to return. The growth of interest in the best musical entertainments in New York is most striking. The Boston Symphony concerts are almost invariably sold out, whether there is a distinguished soloist or not. The recitals of such pianists as Josef Hofmann and Bauer are attended by large audiences. The Kneisel Quartet audiences are larger than they ever could have been in the lamented Mendelssohn Hall and that, too, in spite of the now established fact that the music does not sound well in the new auditorium.

Mr. Barrere and his wind instrument players are increasing their patronage. The connubial sonata recitals of the Mannes family continue to interest pious Sunday night concert goers. And so it goes down through the list. Now it is most significant that in another very large and important American city the case for music is directly the opposite.

Josef Hofmann has recently declared that he will never play in that city again. It is unlikely that the Kneisel Quartet will continue its ministrations there. Other important contributors to the musical culture of the country have hinted that they may fine it necessary to cut that city out of their itineraries.

None of them have issued proclamations. They have not imitated the only Oscar and told the people that they must subscribe or go without—which is, of course, just what the people are doing when they refuse to subscribe. They have merely shrugged their shoulders and said that they cannot afford to give concerts in that city.

One of the keenest citizens of that same city lately expressed the opinion that his brethren preferred the simple joys of the 10, 20 and 30 cent "show" to all the grandeurs of Beethoven and the fireworks of Richard Strauss. And yet that city is not nearly so public in its devotion to the world, the turkey trot and the cabaret as New York is.

This is a very large town. It is a world in itself, and it contains more than one public. It is a narrow view that sees only "the public." That public which supports the Metropolitan Opera House supplies only a very small percentage of the other public which throngs the Boston Symphony concerts. Very few of the subscribers to orchestra stalls at the Metropolitan care for the symphonies of Brahms or for César Franck and his speculative thoughts. They prefer the frank theatricalism of Puccini.

It is a good thing for the progress of musical taste in New York that the place is so large, and that it contains all sorts and conditions of men. The opera and the concert can both live, and we are not threatened with the loss of such interpreters as Josef Hofmann and the Kneisels.

Doubtless some may raise the objection that many concerts are given here at a loss. That is true. The same thing can be said of Berlin, which is the greatest concert city in the world. But the explanation would be the same in each case. The concerts have to be given because the rest of the country has great faith in any musical enterprise which does not challenge the opinion of the metropolis. Even Chicago lends us its orchestra once every few years just to see what we think about it. And when we praise it, Chicago is filled with pride.

Speaking of that, why does not the Philadelphia Orchestra come to New York oftener?

W. J. HENDERSON.

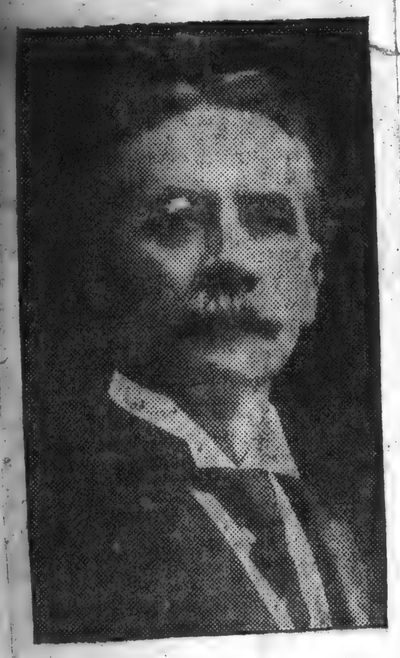
[125]

HERALD,

JANUARY 25, 1912.

MEES TO LEAD CECILIA TONIGHT

Makes His First Appearance as Conductor of Society at Symphony Hall Concert.



Arthur Mees.

Arthur Mees, who will make his first appearance as the conductor of the Cecilia Society tonight at Symphony Hall, was born in Columbus, O., Feb. 13, 1850. He studied in Berlin from 1873 to 1876 with Theodore Kullak, Weitzmann and Heinrich Dorn. For six years he conducted the Cincinnati May Festival Chorus. He was assistant conductor of the American opera and has conducted singing societies in New York and Albany. In 1896 he became chorus conductor and assistant conductor of the Thomas orchestra in Chicago. He has published piano studies and a valuable work on choral singing, and edited analytical program books for the Philharmonic Society of New York and the Chicago orchestra.

Unusual preparation has been made for the performance of "The Damnation of Faust" tonight. The chief singers, Miss Alice Nielsen, and Messrs. George Hamlin and Herbert Witherspoon are well known here. The chorus will be enlarged by the addition of the Schubert Club of Malden (50 male voices).

The work of Berlioz, first performed about 65 years ago, is still one of the most remarkable in musical literature. The first performance in Boston was led by B. J. Lang on May 14, 1880. The chief singers were Mrs. Humphrey-Allen (now Mrs. George F. Babbitt), William J. Winch, Clarence Hay and "an amateur," who was Sebastian B. Schlesinger.

ADVERTISE

JANUARY 27, 1912

MME. KATHARINE GOODSON AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

HEARD IN DIFFICULT TSCHAIKOWSKY CONCERTO

Her Performance Revealed Sympathetic Appreciation of Beauties of the Composition.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann—Symphony in C major. No. 2.
Tschaikowsky—Piano Concerto in B flat, minor.
Soloist—Mme. Katharine Goodson.
Dvorak—"Husitzka Overture."

A programme of convenient length and reasonable breadth. We do not think the second symphony the greatest of Schumann's works, but it remains much greater than many of the modern symphonies to which the concert auditor bows in reverence. Schumann had more contrapuntal skill when he wrote the C major symphony than when he composed the ones in B flat and in D minor, but the glow of inspiration was greater in the two earlier works. Yet the excellent contrasts of major and minor in this symphony are always striking. The foreshadowing of the thoughts of the subsequent movements in the slow introduction is a noble touch which one finds in other Schumann symphonies. He is thoroughly homogeneous in his symphonies, only Beethoven and Brahms being his equals in this respect.

The relationship of the later parts of the symphony to the introduction was made excellently clear in the interpretation. It was logical evolution in its best sense. The trumpet and horn calls of the first part were shaded exactly right, being rather a premonition than a full-fledged fanfare. The promise soon reaches its fulfilment, however, and the premonition ends in triumph, such triumph as only Schumann could write. There never was a more exultant composer than this man when he was so miserable.

It is a pity, however, that the work should be so overshadowed by the greatness of modern tone-coloring. In the neutral-colored and sometimes muddy orchestration one is apt to lose sight of the loftiness of the ideas themselves. Weingartner has said that Schumann's symphonies sound better as four-hand piano-pieces than in the concert-room, and there is some truth in the remark. It might be well for one of our modern orchestral masters to rescore Schumann.

The first movement was finely read. The second was taken too fast. Our great violinists were able to keep the figures clear in spite of the speed, but we fear that many auditors could not grasp their beauty in such rapid tempo.

The Adagio was magnificently interpreted. It may not be as great as the slow movement of the B flat or the D minor symphonies, but it is of long breath and the final diminuendo was exquisitely shaded.

The finale was also perfectly given—virile, resolute and with the atmosphere of exhilaration in every measure. Now the trumpet and horn calls rang out lustily and triumphantly and our excellent kettle-drummer took his short "obbligato" at the end as if he enjoyed it.

And then Mr. Fiedler was called out twice, and the orchestra obliged to rise,—a good proof that Schumann's beauties have not faded even though Debussy decries them.

The Tschaikowsky concerto was erroneously announced, in last week's list, as in B minor. It is in B-flat minor. The error undoubtedly came about through the senseless German custom of calling B-flat "B", while the note B is called "H". It is a clerical error dating back nearly 1000 years and it is about time that it was corrected. We of Boston have an especial interest in this concerto, which was first launched in this city. We have not so many "first performances" of musical works in this city that we can afford to slight any of them.

Mme. Katharine Goodson evidently loves this concerto. Her performance showed something more than great technique and careful study; it revealed a sympathetic appreciation of the beauties of the composition, a comprehension of its poetic meaning. That this comprehension is not given to every musician is abundantly proved by the savage criticism of it by the composer's friend and admirer, Nicolas Rubinstein, a more unbiased critic than the great Anton, his brother.

There are several aberrations from strict form in the work, but there is passion and emotion galore, and there is melody. There is tune enough in this concerto to set up Reger and Elgar for life. But the tunes are not mere tunes "a la Schubert," in contrast with each other, but they are developed and evoluted with sea-changes into "something rich and strange."

Such a concerto demands of the soloist (besides tremendous technique) absolute abandon, temperament, freedom. We cannot imagine a straight-laced classicist making anything out of it. We can imagine a hide-bound Hanslick frothing about it (not so insanely as he did about the violin concerto, however), and all the martinets finding fault. In short, whether one is a fault-finder or a beauty-finder, one will find something to say on his side, in descanting on this symphony.

Mme. Goodson made a success with this work which can be compared with the triumph which she won at these concerts some years ago in Grieg's concerto. A possible technical equipment was in evidence, but this was only a means to an end. The sharp contrasts of the first movement, the clear-cut style of the themes (one of them a tune sung by blind beggars at a Russian fair) the odd juxtaposition of the Andante Semplice and the little dance-tune in the second movement, the masculine vigor of the Finale (again dance-like) were all brought out in an excellent manner. To combine the technique required for the first movement, the force demanded for the finale, and the poetic insight and freedom exacted by each movement of the concerto, is something to be proud of, and we can only use adjectives in describing Mme. Goodson's performance of this titanic and kaleidoscopic work. Possibly at the end of the first movement matters were spasmodic and vehement rather than really broad, but the very beginning of this movement was so virile that it at once caused the audience to sit up.

Under the circumstances the work was very brilliant and at the end the pianist was recalled over and over again.

But "Husitzka" was of quite another order. Dvorak gives alternate slices of chorale and battle music, and the work about as inspired as the multiplication table. It is all "sound and fury signifying nothing." Compared with that other festival overture,—"1812"—this shrivels up. Every measure of it seems "made to order." Out of respect for Dvorak's memory let it be put back upon the shelf.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 25, 191

About Concerts

There will be no Symphony Co next week as the orchestra depa Sunday night for its first series o certs this season in Rochester, N and cities of the Middle West.

At the final concert of the Long for the season, announced for M evening, Feb. 12, at Jordan Ha Noack of the Symphony Orchest Mr. de Voto, the pianist of the clu play a sonata for violin and piat by Enesco, the Parisian composer orchestral suite made lively imp here last spring and again a few ago. If the announced sonata same that Mr. and Mrs. Mannes in Boston last winter, it is an un interesting one.

HERALD, JANUARY 26, 191

'Paderewski in Petticoats' Has Thrilling Tale of Escape at Sea

Miss Katharine Goodson.

Porthole Blew in and Nearly Cancelled Miss Goodson's Boston Date.

OTHER WOES TO RELATE

"No, no, thank you. I won't sit down. I don't feel like sitting down. I'm much too restless. I have one and a half degrees of fever!" exclaimed Miss Katharine Goodson wildly to a reporter of The Boston Herald yesterday, as she dashed frantically off the stage at Symphony Hall, after a rehearsal.

The pianist, once referred to by a Brussels critic as "a Paderewski in petticoats," and who will be heard in Boston this afternoon, had a narrow escape with her life during an unusually stormy ocean voyage a few weeks ago. Lying in her berth she was unpleasantly surprised by the blowing in of the porthole which fell, striking her with full force.

"It's really a wonder I'm here at all," she explained, when she had grown calm enough to narrate the thrilling experience; and her husband, Arthur Hinton, who stood by, added: "We have kept the piece of glass as a souvenir."

"To add to my troubles the boat was 40 hours late in arriving and after worrying about the possibility of missing my first engagement entirely, I was eventually obliged to play without a rehearsal," continued the pianist.

The surprising thing about this young English matron is her spontaneity. There is nothing of the British indifference, apathy or superciliousness about her. Neither is she aggressively patriotic nor is she even an ardent Elgarite. She explained her emotionally responsive exterior in a recent interview as due to the fact that she is "a freak." As for her musical tastes they are distinctly catholic.

"Elgar's 'Gerontius' is to me the most beautiful thing he has ever written. Just now there is a craze for him in England, but he was not always so popular. Two of the most interesting young English composers are Cyril Scott and Joseph Holbrook, and then—here is another one," she added, smiling and laying her hand affectionately on Mr. Hinton's shoulder who assumed an attitude of becoming modesty. Later she spoke of a new quintet written by him which had already been given two successful performances in London, and "it was to be hoped would live."

"I think four hours' practice every day is quite enough for any one. Intelligent mental concentration is the main thing to be striven for, of course. It's no use sitting for eight hours or so with the notes before you, mentally asleep and just pounding away," Miss Goodson said in connection with ideas of her own about piano study.

"Memorizing is quite easy for me. My method is this: I begin by playing the composition through to get a general conception of it. Then I play the main themes slowly in single notes, and afterward I often repeat this in octaves, which I find helps to make a deeper impression. Then come the details of phrasing and execution. In the summer I do a good deal of coaching and enjoy it thoroughly. Of course, I take only very advanced players, which makes the work more interesting. But if I didn't like it I wouldn't do it, you may be sure," she concluded, with a defiant toss of her head.

As to the concertos, Miss Goodson is unwilling to state a positive preference, but she has apparently a decided fondness for Brahms's D minor.

Unconventionally minded, and of a roving disposition, the pianist is reported to have once shocked the sage and much-married Leschetizky by smoking cigarettes, while her pianistic wanderings, which have taken her through Germany, Austria, Holland, Belgium, France, America, Italy, England, Scotland, Ireland and Australia, have been wholly in accordance with her personal tastes.

The pianist has played under many distinguished conductors, notably Richter, Nikisch and Henry J. Wood, while among the artists with whom she has appeared in concerted music are Ysaye and Kubelik.

At a concert in Queens Hall not long ago, a frantic admirer of her playing sought relief for his feelings by sending her a large bust of Julius Caesar with the accompanying card: "This bust of a great man is sent to a great woman as a token of fervent admiration from an enthusiastic lover of her perfect art."

MONITOR,

JANUARY 26, 1912

FAUST AS CONCERT CHARACTER

The Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees, conductor, gave the first concert of its thirty-sixth season in Symphony Hall Thursday evening, presenting "The Damnation of Faust," dramatic legend by Hector Berlioz. Dr. Mees made his first appearance directing the Cecilia singers. The soprano soloist was Miss Caroline Hudson, who responded to the call of the managers at a late moment to sing in the place of Miss Alice Nielsen; the tenor was George Hamlin, the basses Herbert Witherspoon and L. B. Merrill. The men's section of the chorus was augmented by 40 members of the Schubert Club of Malden. The accompanying music was played by men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert proved beyond question that the Cecilia Society has an artistic function in Boston which no other organization can perform. Choral music of the type of the Berlioz work is best interpreted by singers of the Cecilian ideal. That ideal is different from what any other body of musicians has ever developed in the city, and is something altogether too good to lose. It was costly to work to in the first place, and should not lightly be let go. A considerable part of the community will have its emotional life constantly enriched if it sustains the Cecilian ideal. Perhaps that part is only a tenth of the whole musical public; but the one-tenth should stand by what it likes, regardless of the behavior of the nine-tenths. Something new is welling up every little while in the artistic life of the city and trying to submerge the old. What has had 35 years' testing ought to be bouyant enough to keep on top.

There are a half dozen or so ways for us to familiarize themselves with the plot which the genius of Goethe made one of the significant expressions of modern civilization. We may read the original poem. We may see an adaptation of it enacted in the theater. We may hear Gounod's or Boito's opera, or we may hear the Berlioz choral piece. Each will have its emphasis. The library reading is likely to leave an overpowering Mephistophelian impression. The theatrical interpretation is likely to present the three figures concerned in the action in satisfactory balance. The French opera will throw the whole weight on the tragedy of Gretchen. The Italian opera will take us into the subtle realm of the superadded episode of Helen. The choral legend will rehabilitate the story on which Goethe founded his poem.

A performance of "The Damnation of Faust" is dominated by the two men in the characters of Faust and Mephistopheles. On Thursday night the audience necessarily gave its chief attention to Messrs. Hamlin and Witherspoon. The Cecilians and Schubertians themselves, banked high and deep on the platform, made a sort of auxiliary audience. When they were not playing the peasant or soldier, the nymph or gnome or villager, they were as attentive to the drama that unfolded itself between the learned doctor and his companion as were listeners on floor or in balcony. Marguerite in the Berlioz work is only a foil to the character of Faust. As a dramatic figure she is somber and gray. Mephistopheles is a buffoon three fourths of the time and a symbolic figure of not very high color the remaining fourth. In contrast with the dull-tinted soprano role and the flippant bass role, stands the impassioned vocal line of the tenor. In this part and in the orchestral background lies the chief potency of the Berlioz expression.

The vitality of the performance, then, depended on the singing of Mr. Hamlin and the orchestral reading of Dr. Mees. So far as Mr. Hamlin was concerned, the evening went brilliantly in the passages where the demand was the highest. The music as a whole should have been more thoroughly under his command that it was. The tenor's praise stands on his reading of the arias in Marguerite's chamber and in the forest and that was admirable. Dr. Mees could not complain of the readiness of the Symphony men to respond to his directing. In the first part of the evening he ruled them to some brilliant delivery of the Berlioz orchestral declamation. His baton became less masterful as the performance advanced. His choral leading was smooth and scholarly in the old-fashioned way. Dr. Mees has not much of the modern man of music about him, but he is a sincere interpreter and he knows how to make a concert interesting. A year ago the Cecilians gave the impression of lagging far behind their director in interpretive energy; they seem under Dr. Mees to be competent to do more than is asked of them. Soprano tone, round and beautiful, was spent in generous measure on the arias of Marguerite. Bass tone of excellent quality went into the reading by Mr. Merrill of the [illegible]

[126]

TRANSCRIPT, JANUARY 26, 1912

THE FRESHENED CECILIA

OLD PLEASURES REVIVED AND NEW PROMISE

A Concert That Recalls Its Former Ways and Standards—The New Conductor, Mr. Mees, and His Work with the Choir in "The Damnation of Faust"—Able Solo Singers and an Interested Audience—Berlioz and His Romantic Music

NOT in years has the Cecilia come so nearly into its own as it did last evening at Symphony Hall in its first concert of the musical year. The chosen piece, Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust"; the chorus reënforced on its masculine side by the Schubert Club of Malden; the solo singers—Mme. Hudson and Messrs. Hamlin, Witherspoon and Merrill; the new conductor, Mr. Mees, and the audience by its numbers and temper—all contributed to this happy end. The audience was numerous in every part of the hall, and in it what remains of the old following of the Cecilia and of what should be its new public promisingly mingled. The listeners were plainly interested, as they have not always been at some of the society's concerts, and applausive as piece and performance deserved. Each of the solo singers was well chosen for the music to be sung and characterized. Mme. Hudson had actually left New York at noon to sing in Symphony Hall in the evening in lieu of the disabled Miss Nielsen, and necessarily she appeared with no more than the hastiest of rehearsals with Mr. Mees. Yet, as she sang Marguerite's music, she might have been long practised for the concert. She was mistress of its vocal exactions; the soft, rich quality of her soprano tones accorded with it; and she gave it the accents of wistfulness and of low-voiced ecstasy and sadness which impart its mood and put the singer and the insistent violas of the orchestra at one. For it is not the least of Berlioz's felicitous tonal imaginings in this "Faust" that he should make the yearning and poignant viola the voice of Marguerite's dreamily ecstatic love and sorrowful longing.

Mr. Hamlin, in turn, was in similar vocal ease, with the exactions of the music of Faust, wherein Berlioz wrote as though he were some Strauss of the forties who found in a tenor voice another instrument to add to his orchestral choir. Mr. Hamlin might have been more declamatory in the orotund fashion of lofty French operatic declamation, but had he been so, he might have sung with less sensuous beauty and adroit shadings of tone. As for Mr. Witherspoon, not for nothing has he been singing at the Metropolitan Opera House under the stimulus of the artistic standards that Mr. Toscanini has set and practises there. With his tones, as he should in a choral piece, Mr. Witherspoon characterized the Mephistopheles of Berlioz's music, and through them it was easy to feel him playfully deceptive with Faust, patient and contemptuous in the cellar with the students, the cynical master of his sylphs and sprites, and at the end, the fiend seizing and bearing away his prey. There may be such a thing as impersonation in choral concert by delineative tones. If there is, Mr. Witherspoon attained it.

Best of all, there was no questioning Mr. Mees's ability as a choral conductor, no mistaking the change that he has already wrought in the singing of the Cecilia; and to ignoring of the new disposition he has infused into the members of the choir. Conductor and choristers have worked together only two months, and they are still comparative strangers to each other, beside the choirs that these many years have sat—or rather stood—under Mr. Mees's leading. Already, however, he and the singers have accomplished much to their credit and in the accomplishment is promise of much future opening. Wisely, Mr. Mees has not flouted the fine traditions of the Cecilia. He is as sedulous for a rounded and transparent quality of tone as Mr. Lang was in his day, and time and again in the course of the evening the choristers proved their musical ear and their conductor's too. Long experience with choirs has made Mr. Mees solicitous of pure intonation, of musical quality of tone, and the singers of the Cecilia were faithful to his exacting standard. He is expert to polish the technique of choral singing—precision of attack, balance of voices, the leading of the parts and all the rest—and on these scores and under diligent training the Cecilia has returned to its old standards. By the impressionistic of the concert last evening, the Cecilia has begun to renew its diligence and rekindle its ambition. It still needs, however, much more stimulation, much more release from its polished reticence.

Mr. Mees's present task with the choir is indeed not unlike that of Dr. Muck when he first came to the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke then handed him a perfect instrument. Mr. Mees received one that had become imperfect; but he is already on the way to the restoration of its old technical and tonal virtues and standards. Dr. Muck, receiving his perfect instrument, proceeded to transform it into a very expressive and eloquent voice. He made it speak out with no loss of its euphony and finesse; he gave it ardor, passion, a various eloquence, brilliance, richness, the qualities that made its playing poetic, rhapsodic, delineative, dramatic—whatever the composer exacted. It is precisely this work that Mr. Mees has now to do with the Cecilia. The choristers must be taught to forget self-consciousness and reticence, to "sing out" eloquently and valiantly, to spare not in the imparting of the particular emotional mood, of the particular dramatizing or delineative purpose of the music. The singing of the Cecilia should become as expressive and eloquent as it is now exact and polished. A new spirit of work has entered into it; to that diligence and its results it has now to add the freedom and the fire that will stir its hearers.

Much music—perhaps all music that deserves the name—is written to impart and to kindle emotions. Most of us go to concerts for the pleasure of them. Now some of the choruses, like that of the soldiers and the students, went somewhat tamely last evening, lacked the freedom, for example, that the men's voices gave to the mock fugue to Brander's song. They missed the emotional or the pictorial accent that Berlioz's music surely gives them. They were sung without the dramatizing, the vivifying sense. Yet that sense is in the Cecilia and Mr. Mees has discovered and is developing it. In the choruses of Hell, there was the power, the weight, the grimness of expression that Berlioz, big with his fantastic imaginings, would write into them; while in the final chorus of the heavenly hosts the ardor of feeling matched the beauty of tone. If Mr. Mees and the choir are capable of these things once and twice, they ought soon to be capable of them many times. Outspoken emotion ought to become the musical manner of the Cecilia. Singers, nowadays, must strike fire.

Berlioz's music and Berlioz's design and purpose in "The Damnation of Faust" need such ardent and expressive eloquence; need also a much larger body of orchestral tone than the forty-odd men from the Symphony Orchestra could give to it, energetically as Mr. Mees led them. It is hard nowadays to thrust ourselves back into the romantic mood, the romantic scheme of this "dramatic legend." It is part and parcel of its own great romantic day as much as are Hugo's plays, or Byron's poetry, or the pictures of Géricault and Delacroix. It endures, as plays, poems and pictures endure, because the years cannot fade this fiery romantic glow, this high romantic reach, this tireless bigness of imagination. Berlioz stretched a canvas as for a huge tonal fresco. On it he would paint in tones whatever episodes in the "Faust" legend happened to kindle him, whatever episodes his teeming imagination and hot desires could add to it. He wished to write a Hungarian march and straightway he whisked Faust to the plains of Hungary. He would prove ironically his musical scholarship, and he writes the fugue of the rat who died of love. He kindled to the cynically grotesque and he writes the music of the scene in the cellar. He kindled to the horrifically grotesque, as most of the "romantics" of his time did, and he writes the Ride to Hell and the other phantasmagoria of the end. The romantics when they were not ploughing the depths were wringing the upper air, and Berlioz writes the music of the Sylphs. Marguerite touched Berlioz's sensibilities—not as the Gretchen of her cottage, but as a pathetic figure of wistful, amorous ecstasy, and of sore-hearted and haunting longing, and he wrote for her the most piteous music, whether of desire or sadness, that composer has yet written for Marguerite. He flung into Faust all the insistent bigness of romantic passion and imagination, made him almost orotund. He clothed Mephistopheles with the patient weariness, the cynical ironies, the flashes of fiendish power that satisfied his romantic imagination. And so on until he had crowded his canvas with these diverse panels. No wonder "The Damnation" is episodic.

Of course, Berlioz did not always accomplish his design as he accomplished it with the music of Marguerite. Often through the course of his "dramatic legend," the listener can hear his strivings and hear them also fall short of his purpose, daring and fertile as he was to gain it. Before his time, he knew the ways of orchestral delineation. Anticipating Liszt and Strauss and all our contemporary brood, he had the orchestral imagination by which we now set such store. Our delineative and dramatic music indeed "derives" from him. But—and therein is the hapless fate of Berlioz, the composer—his imagination would suddenly flag; his melodic and instrumental invention would dry; and in spite of himself, he would fall into big commonplaces. The romantic glow that he throws about so much of "The Damnation of Faust" is fitful after all. Here and there a little of it has faded; here and there some of the romantic substance behind, as in the declamatory soliloquies of Faust, and the phantasmagoria of hell, has begun to ring hollow. Berlioz believed "The Damnation of Faust" dramatic. It is, in the sense in which poetry or music, choral or symphonic, is dramatic. Theatrical it is not, as the results of the transfer of the legend to the spectacular stage quickly proved. Berlioz made his tonal frescoes for the eye of the imagination. The appeal of his tonal characterization and emotion is all to its ear. He knew where and how romance lasts and how willing answering imagination is to help it. And so yesterday his music was alive again.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

Carl Muck has handed in his resignation to Intendent Huelsen, of the Berlin Royal Opera, in order to return to this country next season and resume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fiedler, who succeeded Dr. Muck three years ago, when the latter's German contracts made it impossible for him to continue in Boston, will return to Germany at the end of this season.

TRANSCRIPT, JANUARY 27, 191

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. FIEDLER'S GOOD SERVICE TO SCHUMANN

Eloquent and Releasing Performance of the Symphony in C—The Conductor and the Composer—A Resurrection from Dvorak in the Outmoded "Husitzska" Overture—Miss Goodson Misses Tschaikowsky's Eloquent and Rhapsodic Concerto

MR. Fiedler has done Schumann some service in his time in Boston, and it was good to find the composer's symphony in C—the symphony of the "motto theme," the two trios and the melancholy and songful Adagio—leading the programme of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. Mr. Gericke put Schumann's music at dutiful intervals on his programmes and played it dutifully and well—sometimes indeed as in the symphony of the spring, with a rich and ardent eloquence. Dr. Muck was less minded to Schumann's pieces and not especially sympathetic in his versions of them. He was intelligent and able with them, but there he stopped. He put them as seldom as he put Schubert's into his concerts, and the two lyric and romantic composers went into momentary eclipse at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler promptly brought Schumann forth again, and he has restored the composer to his just place in our orchestral routine. He has played nearly all of Schumann's symphonies and repeated the best-liked of them. He has recalled his overtures; he has even revived the concerto for violoncello, under the excuse of a centenary concert.

Such romantic music as Schumann wrote stimulates the conductor's best abilities. He does not over-labor it as he over-labors some of the classics, while he brings to it in his choice of pace, in his adjustment of phrases, in his balance of instrumental tone, precisely the clarifying and releasing process that much of the music exacts. The youngest of composers knows that Schumann lacked instrumental divination and even instrumental skill. He writes for orchestra thickly, clumsily, distributes his music ineptly, sometimes makes it seem less articulate than it really is. Schumann's music needs a conductor who can divine his instrumental purpose and find the skilful means to set it free from untoward circumstance. Mr. Weingartner has his particular aptitude with Schumann's music, and Mr. Fiedler shares it with him. His Schumann has not only been well, but also illuminatingly played.

These are the days of retrospects—perhaps of somewhat premature retrospects—over Mr. Fiedler's work here, but with his repetition of Schumann's symphony in C yesterday, and under his illuminating reading of it, there came though of these things and of the just credit to the conductor that they bring. Throughout the symphony he was now largely eloquent and now decidedly felicitous, while at every turn his men answered him. The strings were winged with fleetness and had a gossamer lightness of tone through the rhapsodic lash of the scherzo, whitten as though Schumann feared that his imaginings and his mood might fly away from him before he could set them to music paper. The horns were beautifully flowing and mellow, the clarinets had their utmost of pungent melancholy tone through the slow movement, while the whole orchestra, without the smallest edge or the faintest lapse, sustained, swelled, diminished, the intense yet dreamlike song of the music. Here is the Schumann who could write music as one suffused with romantic mood and vision that only tones might express and that in this Adagio they express perfectly. It is as though he saw the visions of happiness, yet trembled at each instant that it might flee.

Again in the finale the trombones and the rest of the brass choir were rich and full, helping to bear the music on its waves of vigorous climax, while Mr. Fiedler made the whole orchestra and the audience with it feel the fine mounting of the rhythm, the rich clangor of all the music on its triumphant course. Here was Schumann set free and made puissant with the orchestral power for which he strove so hard and to which, as he fondly believed, Mendelssohn's music might help him. There was more power in his own spirit; the conductors to come were more to be trusted. Yesterday, indeed, Mr. Fiedler made the vigorous drum beats of the finale, which he loves as Mahler loved them, seem like the climax of this release and this triumph. No wonder the audience brought the conductor back twice and thrice and set the orchestra on its feet. They were next best to Schumann himself.

The rest of the concert was much tamer—once through the shortcomings of the composer and the changes in musical fashions and standards and once through the inadequacy of the pianist to his task. Dvorák's overture, "Husitzka," which reappeared on the programme for the first time in five years, is no very interesting piece nowadays, and the ardent young modernists hastened to say, when the concert was ended, that Dvorák was fading fast, faster even than Tschaikowsky. It is the present mode of "the advanced" to find Tschaikowsky somewhat antiquated, and a little of his music, but only a little, has faded, especially in its harmonic and instrumental dress. But the "Husitzka" overture is, like so much of Dvorák's music, gone now beyond resuscitation. If we must have occasional music of obvious pattern—the Hussites' sturdy hymns, their songful advance to battle, the triumphant proclamation of their victory and all the rest—let us have the occasional music of our imediate time and circumstance. Heaven knows it is written plentifully enough, and earth-born prophets can predict confidently that in a quarter of a century it will sound as outworn and banale to the youngsters as did Dvorák's overture yesterday.

Once pon a time, when our musical generation was young, it was told to heed the Bohemian's instrumental and harmonic panoply. How rich and colorful, how varied and eloquent we and our mentors believe it was. Maybe it was so for the eighties and the early nineties, but how faded and thin, it seems in this present year of grace. The externals, if not the substance, of music have advanced fast and far in the intervening years. We must have now on our symphonic music the instrumental and harmonic vesture of an Elgar or a Rachmaninoff, to say nothing of the stranger harmonic robings and orchestral tints of a Debussy or a d'Indy. How poor and pale seemed Dvorak's ideas through the resnts in this vesture, how commonplace and a little inflated the music all sounded. To hear it was to hear regretfully—for a lost youth, a lost time as well as a lost composer. A few weeks ago Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" bore ill the card test of our rich and exacting musical years. Before long, even the eclectic and elegant Saint-Saens may come also to judgment.

JANUARY 28, HERALD,

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony orchestra will leave Boston tomorrow night by special train on the first of the two western trips it is to make this season. It will carry with it eighty-odd men. The first concert will be given Monday night in Rochester. Concerts will be given on successive nights in Buffalo, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Toledo, Detroit and, a week from Monday night, Schenectady, on the way home. The programmes that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for this trip are almost exclusively Wagnerian. In Rochester he will play the "Eroica" symphony, and in Schenectady the "Leonora" No. 3 overture and Mme. Samaroff-Stokowski will play Grieg's concerto for piano. The only other soloist on the trip will be at the Cleveland concert, when Herbert Witherspoon will sing two Wagnerian selections. There will be no soloist at the 15th concert in Boston, Feb. 9-10, nor at the 5th Cambridge concert, on Feb. 8.

MENDELSSOHN CHOIR

In Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 29, Boston will have its first opportunity to hear what is generally conceded to be the finest chorus in this country—the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto. With the choir will come the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago. The Mendelssohn Choir, a unique organization, consists of 240 voices; 120 women and 120 men. It has been in existence for a number of years and already made two journeys to New York, where its singing made a most profound impression. It is a voluntary association, but unlike most choruses, it is practically reorganized at the beginning of each season, at least to this extent: Every member must undergo a rigorous examination at the beginning of the season. The chorus is kept up to its high mark of efficiency by the fact that there is a waiting list of several hundred singers who are eager to join its ranks. The conductor of the choir, Mr. Vogt, is a choral conductor of great ability. He organized the society and is largely responsible for its state of discipline.

MISS TEYTE IN RECITAL

Chicago Lyric Soprano to Appear Here on Wednesday.

Miss Maggie Teyte, the principal lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, will give a song recital in Jordan Hall Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 14. Her program will include many songs by Debussy that are unknown to our concert-goers; also songs by Gabriel, Faure, Duparo, Hahn and Hue.

Miss Teyte, whose name before she went to France was spelled Tait, was born in April, 1891, near Wolverhampton, England, but her parents moved to London when she was very young. She studied at the Royal College of Music in London and afterward with Jean de Reszke in Paris. When she was 17 she made her debut at Monte Carlo as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni." She made her first appearance at the Opera Comique, Paris, as Glycere in "Circe," by the Hillemacher brothers, April 17, 1907, but it was not till she took the part of Melisande in Debussy's opera that she became famous. This was on June 12, 1908. She herself has said that she was allowed to take the part because Mme. Marguerite Carre had no time to learn it, and being jealous of Miss Mary Garden, did not wish her to be recalled, so she decided to get an unknown singer.

After her engagement at the Opera Comique, Miss Teyte sang in Beecham's Opera Company in London in operas by Mozart and in "Les Contes d'Hoffmann." Her first appearance in the United States was at Philadelphia on Nov. 4, 1911, as Cherubino.

Miss Teyte is the wife of Eugene Piumon, a young French lawyer. The Paris correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette described her in 1909 as an ideal Melisande: "pretty, petite, with an air of mediaeval mystery about her acting which is thoroughly in keeping with the part * * * a vision of golden hair, with the delicate outline, soft and harmonious, of some figure detached from a stained glass window."

[127]

AMERICAN—
JANUARY 28, 1912.

MELTZER PRAISES BOSTON SYMPHONY

Rivals Best in World, Says Expert in Article on Musical Entertainment.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

NEW YORK, Jan. 27.—Most music lovers, the world over, prefer opera to symphony. Opera has a human interest. Even when most veiled by cryptic tongues, as at the Metropolitan, it conveys something—however little it may be, and sometimes a great deal—which can be grasped.

The appeal of opera is, in short, more concrete than the appeal of symphony; and for this reason it impresses far more people.

When Carmen woos Don Jose, all know what she means. When Faust goes courting Marguerite, we understand.

"Faust," to be sure, like "Carmen," is an easy opera. The action is so clear that, here and there, it hardly needs the words.

And opera has another potent charm besides human interest. It gives us pictures.

Yet symphony is a much higher form of art. It is pure music. To those who have enough imagination it gives endless joy.

In listening to a symphony, however, we should co-operate with the composer. We need not know the meaning of his tones. But we must find some meaning in them.

The meaning we may find will only seldom be the one which the composer had in mind. That matters little. And, even if we interpret symphony wrongly, we may love the mere tones we hear.

Germany Cradle of Symphony.

To the unimaginative, symphony may be only sound. For many years men differed as to the significance of Beethoven's "Choral" symphony, some seeing in one part an ode to joy, while others thought it meant the praise of peace.

The culture of the nation which loves symphony is surely deeper, though it may not be more lustrous, than that of the nation which swears first and last by opera.

Italy is pre-eminently the home of opera. Germany was the cradle of symphony.

So, when we talk about our fondness for good music we may point with pride not only to our patronage of opera, which is largely due to fashion, but also and above all to the support we give our many symphony orchestras.

New York alone now boasts seven symphony organization: Naming them in order of their importance, the Symphony Society of New York, the Philharmonic Society, the Russian Symphony Society, the Young People's Society, the Volpe Society, the People's Society and the Commonwealth Society.

Of these, the first two have for long years done splendid work. The others are of much more recent growth. But they, too, have done something to help art.

It may be questioned whether three, or at most four, of these organizations, firmly established and endowed and ably led, could not do more than seven. The position of even the Philharmonic and the New York Symphony has frequently been precarious. The struggle has at times been very hard and the expense of victory great.

Boston Leads New York.

Boston, which has but one important orchestra, ranks higher than New York as a symphonic centre. The Boston Symphony Society now rivals—and, some say, excels—the most famous of the foreign concert organizations. It owes this honor to the devotion of one private citizen, whose word is law, and who has for long years past done his utmost to make symphony popular.

Thanks to his enterprise, we are privileged to hear ten or a dozen performances by the Boston orchestra each year at Carnegie Hall. They set a standard which our own symphony societies have not quite reached.

Money is not all one needs to build up a great orchestra. One needs firm discipline, rare faith and first-rate leaders. Besides these factors one needs musicians of exceptional quality—men who work first for fame and then for dollars.

Colonel Higginson succeeded in recruiting a body of admirable musicians, who obey their conductor honestly and without faltering. To-day that conductor may be Fiedler; to-morrow, for the second time, it will be Muck. Once it was Nikisch, who when he went left glorious memories behind him.

The precision of the Boston orchestra is incomparable. Its delicacy is admirable. Its discipline is remarkable.

Moreover, in the interpretation of great works, the Boston orchestra reveals more than skill and style. It has poetry. It has sympathy. It has imagination.

* * *

Some day, maybe, our New York symphony societies may outdo the Bostonians. But not until they worship the same ideals.

Symphony on Western Trip.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston to-morrow night by special train on the first of the two Western trips it is to make this season. It will carry with it eighty-odd men. The first concert will be given Monday night in Rochester and then concerts will be given on successive nights in Buffalo, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Toledo, Detroit and a week from Monday night, Schenectady on the way home. The programs that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for this trip are almost exclusively Wagnerian.

ADVERTISER,
JANUARY 26, 1912

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY CECILIA SOCIETY

AUGMENTED BY SCHUBERT CLUB OF MALDEN

At Last Moment Miss Caroline Hudson Was Drafted to Take Place of Miss Nielsen.

In Symphony hall, last evening, the Cecilia society, Arthur Mees, conductor, sang Berlioz's dramatic legend, "The Damnation of Faust." The soloists were: Miss Caroline Hudson, soprano; George Hamlin, tenor; Herbert Witherspoon, bass, and L. B. Merrill, bass. The society was augmented by the Schubert club of Malden (50 men's voices). The orchestra was composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Owing to a severe cold, Miss Alice Nielsen was unable to appear, as announced The part of Marguerite was sung by Miss Caroline Hudson of New York.

"The Damnation of Faust" is a familiar work to Boston and is a favorite with the society. Its frequent repetitions are welcome, for each hearing reveals new beauties in this product of the genius who has given us the Fantastic Symphony, and whose fame, notwithstanding the fact that he composed numerous other important works, rests almost entirely on these two masterpieces. It is an interesting fact that the popularity of Berlioz's "Faust" was due in a measure to Gounod's opera, a much later work.

The "Damnation of Faust" was first sung in Boston in 1880 by the Cecilia society. At the concert last night the work was strikingly modern. Measure after measure might have been written in 1912. And yet many of the solos and choruses were composed when Berlioz was in the early 20's. Many of these gems which emanated from the youthful, fiery brain of the composer were afterward incorporated in the work as we know it today.

The Cecilia society has reason to be elated over the fine display of its capabilities last evening. In all respects the concert was a splendid artistic success, and one of more than passing interest. Aside from the usual interest in the organization per se, there were other causes, any one of which would have been sufficient to fill Symphony hall and make the occasion an important musical event. A new conductor made his initial bow; the interest in the able and excellent soloists and in the revival of Berlioz's masterpiece.

The history of the organization is familiar. Under the direction of Mr. Lang, who for so long a time disproved the maxim that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country," and through the conductorship of Messrs. Goodrich and Fiedler, the society may point with pride to a long list of fine concerts.

With the coming of a new man to guide its destinies and on account of the instability caused by so frequent changes of conductors, it was only natural that speculation and curiosity would be keen as to the exact status of the Cecilia society at the present time. Last night's concert proved it to be in a flourishing and vigorous condition, vocally and numerically.

Dr. Arthur Mees is a native of Columbus, Ohio. He studied piano with Kullak, theory with Weitzmann and conducting with Dorn. Resided in Cincinnati, where he was associated with Theodore Thomas in the direction of the May festival chorus. Later he succeeded Mr. Thomas as conductor of that organization. Went to New York to live and was assistant conductor of the American Opera Co. Among the societies which he has conducted are the German Liederkranz, Beethoven Mannerchor, Orange Mendelssohn union, New York Mendelssohn Glee club, Albany Musical association and others. After the Chicago orchestra was organized Mr. Mees was Mr. Thomas' assistant for two years. In 1907 he was selected as conductor of the Worcester festival, to suceeed Mr. Wallace Goodrich. Mr. Mees has evidently infused a new life and spirit into the society, as witnessed by the increased membership and splendid singing. His scholarly musicianship, wide experience and skill in choral conducting admirably fit him for the position.

The work of the chorus showed that details had been untiringly rehearsed in the prosaic drill room, thus obviating strenuous endeavor on the part of the conductor to smooth out wrinkles in the performance in the glamor of the concert hall. In the matter of intonation, dynamics and interpretation generally the ensemble work of the chorus was excellent. If the results attained at the concert last night are a criterion, the Cecilia society may be reasonably sanguine as to its future prospects of patronage and longevity.

No doubt the announcement of Miss Nielsen's inability to sing caused disappointment to many. It was fortunate, however, that so excellent an artist as Miss Hudson could be secured at such short notice. Miss Hudson needs no apology on account of the fact that there was no time for rehearsal. She was adequate to the occasion in every particular. The part was a familiar one to her. She had an intelligent insight into the character of Goethe's heroine and a clear understanding of the spirit of Berlioz's music. She sang the ballad, "King of Thule," with simplicity and good taste. In the "Romance" she brought warmth and intensity of voice to the aria.

When beauty of voice is combined with fine musicianship in a singer the result is enviable. Such a singer is Mr. Hamlin. He is well known as a singer of songs and his enterprise in introducing new compositions has long been commended. In the part of Faust he again proved his artistry. He was not merely a tenor making a vocal display. The climaxes were duly forceful, and in moments of placidity his voice was appropriately modulated, but without a suggestion of the collar-button timbre into which tenors so frequently degenerate when singing a soft tone. The "Invocation of Nature" and the soliloquy preceding the Easter Hymn were superbly sung.

Among the soloists, to Mr. Witherspoon must be awarded high praise for arousing the maximum of enthusiasm during the evening. Indeed the part of Mephistopheles admits of more vigorous vocalism and action than the others. Mr. Witherspoon took advantage of this fact to the fullest degree. He was grimly devilish, and subtly demoniacal on occasion, and appropriately sardonic when opportunity was offered. Throughout the evening his interpretation was convincing. He lacked nothing but a lurid crimson robe and the usual pyrotechnical accessories to have completed the picture. Special mention must be made of his fine legato singing in the aria, "The Banks of the Elbe." He was grimly humorous in the "Serenade."

Mr. Merrill courageously sang the thankless "Brander's Song" with good effect.

The audience was large and generous with applause.

F. M. W.

HERALD,
JANUARY 27, 1912.

DVORAK WORK BY SYMPHONY

Dramatic Overture "Husitska" Played at 14th Public Rehearsal.

MISS GOODSON PIANIST

Schumann's Symphony, No. 2, C Major, Deeply Moves Audience.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Katharine Goodson was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, C major, op. 61. . . .Schumann
Concerto for piano No. 1, B flat minor, Tschaikowsky
Dramatic overture, "Husitska". . . . . .Dvorak

Two of these compositions are familiar to concertgoers in Boston. Dvorak's overture has not been played frequently. It is not a composition that would bear many repetitions. Written for an occasion—the opening of a new Bohemian Theatre in Prague—it is appropriately theatrical. The composer attempted to celebrate in music the wars of the Hussites, and the important theme, which undergoes many changes, is a phrase from a Hussite hymn. The recipe for compositions of this sort is well known. As was to be expected, the solemn theme heard at the beginning, the typical motive of the faith for which men suffered persecution and death, is at the end pompously triumphant, shouted by the orchestra with beating of drums and other pulsatile instruments of joy and ceremony. Hanslick of Vienna found out that the allegro was fanatical in spirit, as though passages were "orchestrated with hatchets, scythes and battle maces," but today this fanaticism seems deliberately assumed and rather tedious. The overture is not one of Dvorak's best works, and in the flight of Time these best works are growing few in number.

Miss Goodson has now played three concertos at concerts of the orchestra. She chose Grieg's when she first played here. I did not hear that performance, but competent judges praised it highly. For her second concerto she chose her husband's—for, though she retains her maiden name for concert use, she is the wife of Arthur Hinton. Choosing this concerto, she proved her wifely devotion and also acquainted us with an unfamiliar work.

Her choice of Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor was not fortunate. She was busy in the first and third movements, very busy, most industrious; but the concerto is beyond her grasp. Her performance was lacking in breadth, in Cossack fury and wild abandon, in the demoniacal spirit that redeems certain pages from downright vulgarity. She played the running passages nimbly; the lyrical episode in the first movement had refined expression; the second movement was read with pretty sentiment; but as a whole the performance of this tumultuous work, with its relieving pages of song that is quickly shadowed by melancholy, was not impressive or exciting.

The feature of the concert was Schumann's Symphony with its wonderfully beautiful Adagio, which would be a perfect work of romantic art were it not for the incongruous and academic contrapuntal episode. When Schumann wrote it he was more than ever a dreamer; he would sit for hours, silent, in a nervous state. We read that when he did work, he applied himself to contrapuntal problems; hence, no doubt, this disturbing episode. How Schumannesque the Adagio is! How peculiar and individual its beauty! No wonder that the audience yesterday was deeply moved by it.

There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will make its western trip. The program of the concerts of Feb. 9 and 10 will be as follows: Symphony in F minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky; concerto for 'cello, Lalo (Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist); "Ormazd," a symphonic poem (Ms., first time), Converse.

[128]

GLOBE—
JANUARY 27, 191

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Plays Work of Schumann Finely.

Mme Goodson Chooses Too Virile a Concerto for Her Style.

The program at the 14th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 2 in C major; Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in B flat minor, opus 23, Mme Katharine Goodson, soloist; Dvorak, overture "Husitska."

The symphony was the feature of the afternoon. It seems incredible that this was the work of a man sick in mind and body, music so abundant in ideas, so well proportioned and coherent, so varied in emotional expression, so spontaneous in spirit. In a letter of the period Schumann wrote that he began to be himself only in the last movement, and was not wholly restored until the end.

In the Autumn of the year of composition, 1845, he had written Mendelssohn in Leipsic, "For days drums and trumpets have been throbbing in my head—trumpets in C. What will come of it I do not know." To Schumann, the true romanticist, the inspiration overruled, and the outcome was the theme in the trumpets of the opening bars of this symphony, a musical test to which he refers in the scherzo and again in the last movement, and 30 years were to pass before Cesar Franck should write the trio in F sharp of his opus one in the cyclic form.

The first theme of the scherzo becomes as champagne when played by the first violins of this orchestra. Fortunately fleetness which might terrify others is made ravishing by them. Set over in contrast to the exhilaration of these measures are the two trios, the first in the pleasant dialogue of the wood wind, and the second the rich four-voiced harmony in the strings. A movement of rare charm, simplicity and grace, unimpaired as some pages of Schumann's score by the heaviness of the orchestration.

Nor does he permit despondency to wholly overtake him in the andante, although he alluded to the "melancholy bassoon" which he "put in with especial pleasure." He strengthened the organic structure of the work here by carrying forward the pensive melody sung by violins and by oboe to become the second theme of the last movement, another token of the beauty of inner workmanship in which Schumann delighted.

The final allegro breathes forth the joy and exultations of life again, and concludes with superbly spirited pages, for with Schuman affirmation and exuberance of heart never inspire the weariness and oppression of parade or inflated bombast. Mr Fiedler's performance was one of unflagging energy, yet not without thoughtfulness and sympathy. The orchestra played with understanding, fine balance and beauty of tone Tschaikowsky's second concerto was a work of heartaches. Because of Rubinstein's vituperative misappreciation, it came to be played for the first time anywhere in Boston by Bulow, to whom it was rededicated. It presents more problems than the disappearance of the opening theme. That is a likely tune. If Sir Edward Elgar had ever achieved such a one, he would have worried it to death with new shapes, guises, garments, habits or other musical raiment with which to clothe it.

Besides accounting for its whereabouts the pianist finds a species of bravura in the first and last movements, music suggesting at times a stream of molten lava in its impassioned sweep. In the graceful arabesque of the second movement Mme Goodson played with lightness of touch, elasticity and fluency. The superb opening chords thundering in their rhythmic procession had something of their true import, but more masculinity and authority were needed in portions of this movement, and in the whole of the last.

The piano is frequently reduced to the position of an instrument of the score, and the orchestra is intrusted with some of the most effective passages, also with the banal waltz, which seems an odd incongruity.

Devorak's overture with its somber Hussite hymn and zealous use of brass brought the program to a close. The orchestra will be away on a Western tour next week.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the Wo
PUBLIC LEDGER
From PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
Address
Date

GLOBE—
JANUARY 26, 19

"DAMNATION OF FAUST"

First of the Season's Cecilia Concerts.

Excellent Performance of the Berlioz Legend.

Large Audience Attends in Symphony Hall.

Last evening the Cecilia Society gave the first of two concerts in Symphony Hall, presenting Berlioz' dramatic legend "The Damnation of Faust," with the following soloists: Mme Caroline Hudson, soprano, as Marguerite; George Hamlin as Faust, Herbert Witherspoon as Mephistopheles and L. B. Merrill as Brander. Florence Jepperson as "a voice," an orchestra of Symphony players and 40 members of the Shubert Club of Malden also assisted in the performance, which was under the direction of the new conductor. Dr Arthur Mees.

Mme Hudson, who took Miss Nielsen's place on account of the latter's illness, sang without having a rehearsal with the orchestra and is to be credited with giving an excellent performance under the circumstances.

It was evident that Dr Mees had made careful preparations for this concert, the results being highly satisfactory. The chorus and orchestra were kept well together as a rule, the chorus was prompt in following the guiding hand of the conductor in attack and shadings and their combined work was commendably smooth and harmonious. The voice choirs balanced well, though, as is generally the case, the tenors were the weakest.

Much has been written criticizing the structure and text of the work; but the fact remains that it is very popular in concert form and is so dramatic in spite of its disconnected scenes that it has achieved a certain vogue in operatic guise. And few modern cantatas have furnished so many orchestral selections.

Last evening the "Rakoczy" march and "Ride to the Abyss" went with becoming verve, and the "Waltz of the Sylphs" and "Will-o-the Wisps" minuet were given with exquisite delicacy and winning hearty applause.

The chorus work was praiseworthy throughout, whether in the trippingly measures of the peasants' festival, the somber choral, "O Heavenly Master," the rollicking student music, the dance of the gnomes; the songs of the mocking sprites or in the closing celestial choral.

Mr Hamlin sang the Faust music with good effect, giving to the somewhat colorless part a semblance of the latent passion awakened in his breast. The earlier solos were excellent in their expressions of sympathetic and poetic tenderness and in the love duets with Marguerite Mr Hamlin's sweet tenor voice was used with excellent effect.

Mme Hudson's voice is a pure soprano, rich in quality, fairly flexible and under admirable control. Her enunciation is unusually good, she colors her tones skillfully and in the love episodes with Faust and in the finale she sang with appealing warmth and dramatic intensity.

The Mephistopheles of Mr Witherspoon was consistently sardonic in its vocal suggestiveness and a splendid performance in every way. His sonorous and expressive voice was again heard with pleasure by all, and he is to be congratulated on giving "The Song of the Flea" with spontaneity and avoiding the verbal pitfalls.

Mr Merrill sang Brander's "Ra" very well and Miss Jepperson was satisfactory as the "voice." There was a large audience and considerable applause for Dr Mees and the soloists.

The next concert will be given Thursday evening, March 21, the assisting artists being Mme Emma Eames and Emilio de Gogorza. The program will include part songs, solo numbers, choruses and duets.

DR. MUCK COMING TO U. S.

Boston Symphony to Pay Great Conductor $28,000 for Single Season.

Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegram to the Public Ledger.

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—It was announced this week that Dr. Karl Muck, the celebrated conductor of the Kaiser's Royal Opera in Berlin, had finally concluded the long-pending negotiations with Colonel Higginson on behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct that organization in 1913.

Doctor Muck will receive the almost unprecedented salary of $28,000 for one season's work. It is said that Signor Toscanini is the only conductor who ever received a greater salary. The highest salary which the New York Philharmonic Society ever paid was $25,000. Herr Stransky, the present leader of the society, is understood to have accepted the position for $10,000.

Establi

AMERICAN—

JANUARY 26, 1912.

THE DAMNATION OF FAUST GIVEN

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

"The Damnation of Faust," by Hector Berlioz was sung for the first time in some years in Boston last night by the Cecilia Society.

The Cecilia introduced a new conductor and demonstrated to those who predicted that it would pass over, after the failure of the alliance with the Symphony Orchestra last season, that it possesses its old-time vitality an attractiveness.

Dr. Arthur Mees, the new conductor, comes from the Worcester Festivals, and is a chorus leader of long experience. His first concert was given a set-back by the illness of Miss Alice Nielson, who was to have sung the soprano role, but Miss Caroline Hudson of New York, who was secured at short notice, gave complete satisfaction as a substitute.

"The Damnation of Faust" was first performed in concert form in Paris in 1864, although it was written a number of years before. It is only in recent times that Berlioz has come into his own as a composer.

Contemporary musicians were either indifferent or violently opposed to him, and his musical ideas were so unconventional that the public of the day did not appreciate them.

His original intention was to write an opera upon Goethe's Faust. He modified it perforce to a dramatic legend. It has recently been given frequently in dramatic form.

Berlioz had no special aptitude in writing for the stage, although he was extremely theatrical or rather dramatic in his orchestral pieces. It is in the orchestra that "The Damnation of Faust" is finest. The Hungarian march which he built upon a Hungarian folk song, the dance of the sylphs, and the minuet of will of the wisps are superb pieces of orchestra writing, and the Ride into the Abyss is one of the most effective things ever composed.

He had not the gift of writing appealing melodies for voices, and while both Marguerite's songs are charming, and Mephistopheles has some spirited numbers, the vocal score is rather dry. There are numerous massive choruses, and some very pretty bits of choral writing, but after all, the greatest charm is in the orchestra.

The Cecilia Chorus was augmented by forty male voices from the Schubert Club of Malden, and there was a large orchestra of Symphony players.

George Hamlin sang Faust. He has always been an artistic singer, but since he was last heard, his voice has developed, and it is hard to imagine a more pleasing tenor for oratorio.

It is a light voice, but there are some beautiful high tones, and it is of good quality from top to bottom.

Herbert Witherspoon has sung here with the Metropolitan Opera, but the music of Berlioz's Mephistopheles is too much for his voice, a bass which is neither heavy, resonant or rich in quality. He is an excellent singer, but one kept wishing for a great bass voice to boom out the stirring music of the part.

Miss Caroline Hudson sang without an orchestral rehearsal, but she sang beautifully, and displayed qualities that we do not often get from a soloist in oratorio.

JOURNAL—

JANUARY 26. 1912.

DR. MEES CONDUCTS CECILIA CHORUS

Noted Newcomer Receives Cordial Greeting in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Arthur Mees made his debut as conductor of the Cecilia Society at Symphony Hall last night in the performance of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." The noted newcomer received a cordial greeting—a thrice cordial one from the chorus—and he impressed the large audience with his vigor and his earnestness. He was applauded frequently during the performance, and after the instrumental as well as the choral numbers. He led the combined forces of the Cecilia Chorus, the Schubert Club of Malden and the orchestra of Symphony players with spirit and firmness. There was no doubt about his grasp of the matter in hand any more than there was question about his enthusiasm. His revivifying effect upon the Cecilia was evident at this very first concert.

Dr. Mees, who wears a title accompanying an honorary degree conferred upon him eleven years ago by Alfred University, is an Ohioan by birth. He finished his musical education in Germany. His career as conductor began with the Cincinnati May Festival Chorus, and it has since been extended over a broad field, including choral, orchestral and even operatic work. He stepped last night into the place formerly occupied by Wallace Goodrich and B. J. Lang. It was Mr. Lang, by the way, under whose direction, in 1880, "The Damnation of Faust" was first performed in this city.

There was a disappointment and also a pleasant surprise for the audience last night. Alice Nielsen, who was to have sung the part of Marguerite, caught cold and could not appear. Yesterday morning the management telegraphed to Caroline Hudson, the soprano soloist of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, and she came to Boston just in time to change her dress, catch her breath and come out upon the stage with the assurance of a veteran artist. In some respects she proved to be the most pleasing of the soloists, for she not only sang well, but she showed much beauty of voice. George Hamlin, the Faust, exhibited his polished style, and Herbert Witherspoon, the Mephistofeles, his gift for dramatic singing. The small part of Brander was sung by L. B. Merrill.

The chorus did some excellent work. But the Cecilia in its new form can be judged better when it sings without recruits.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 27, 1912

MISS GOODSON PLAYS TSCHAIKOWSKY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, appeared in Symphony hall Thursday afternoon, rehearsing its fourteenth program. The turn of Schumann's Second symphony and of Tschaikowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor came in the program round, and an interesting matinee, though not an especially comment-provoking one, was the result. The scheme of presentation was that which the Symphony audiences are so well accustomed to, a large orchestral work, a solo piece and a concluding short, brilliant selection, as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 2, C major, op. 61; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1, op. 23; Dvorak, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," op. 67. The soloist was Miss Katharine Goodson.

Schumann and Tschaikowsky are composers with whom Mr. Fiedler invariably has success. According to the present Symphony conductor's views, as they express themselves in his readings, orchestral history begins with the Ninth symphony of Beethoven. The first eight Beethoven symphonies and the works of Mozart and Haydn are prehistoric, belonging to a time when the thought of symphonist had not differentiated itself from that of string quartet writer. Schubert comes into the period with his Symphony in C; and Berlioz of the Fantastic symphony is there. Tschaikowsky and Brahms are the last men of the epoch which begins with the Choral symphony. Dating within their time, but looking toward a new period, is Bruckner; and following him and establishing the modern epoch is Strauss. This is the record of a century of musical progress as Max Fiedler's interpretations give it. Another conductor will make it something altogether different, and the books will write it in a form to dispute everything that interpretation has to say.

Mr. Fiedler does his most brilliant work in the second of the two periods into which he divides orchestral history. But he wins many triumphs in the first. And his reading of the Schumann symphony No. 2, a dull work under a precise, Mozartian baton, yields marvelous riches of sentiment and emotion. Schumann has been dutifully placed on Symphony concert programs before Mr. Fiedler's time, because as one of the master-composers he could not with propriety be neglected. He usually took a place in public regard far inferior to Beethoven. Mr. Fiedler has lifted him to a position of practical superiority to Beethoven. He has regarded Schumann as a thinker representing future tendencies rather than maintaining traditions. He has shown the composer in a new light, and has made him a force in the repertory that he never was before. The Symphony audiences have always recognized Mr. Fiedler's ability as a Schumann interpreter. The listeners of Friday were enthusiastic in their applause of him and his men at the close of the first half of the program.

Schumann and Tschaikowsky in the old period and Bruckner and Strauss in the new are without much doubt the composers whose scores Mr. Fiedler studies with the deepest interest. Or, if he does not study them today, owing to the demand new compositions make on his attention, he has gone thoroughly into them in other days. The Tschaikowsky piano concerto, No. 1, Mr. Fiedler conducted as though it were an orchestral number instead of one wherein the soloist may make display. The interpretation seemed to be his rather than the pianist's; and that was to the praise of Miss Goodson. It showed that she took a view of her Tschaikowsky which fell in with the Symphony leader's and to do that meant a successful performance. The soloist is too often a problem for Mr. Fiedler. To the visiting artist who comes with an interpretive ideal out of accord with his he gives all possible consideration, but the work of studying out a helpful accompaniment more often than not takes away his spontaneity. The best results are reached when the director, as on Friday, actually directs. The concerto had real interpretation in its character of composition for piano and orchestra. Miss Goodson lent her abilities as virtuoso to a presentation which was calculated to heighten the ensemble impressiveness of the piece. Her listeners applauded her loudly and they will go on applauding her in thought for a long time.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 24, 1912

MR. FIEDLER AND THE REST OF THE SEASON

The Interest and the Promise of His Remaining Work Here—The Conductor and the Public—Mr. Renaud, Mme. Tetrazzini and Mme. Gay and Mr. Marcoux in New Parts at the Opera House Next Week—The Programme of the Munich Festival Next Summer—French Opera for New York?—The News of the Hour

MR. Fiedler is the present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. He will be such for three months and more to come through eleven pairs of regular concerts, a concert for the Pension Fund, two "trips" to the West and to New York and sundry "outside" concerts in the cities of New England. At the beginning of May, he will leave Boston, by an arrangement announced last autumn, and return to Europe to continue his work there with higher reputation, larger prestige and generally assured fortunes by reason of his four years with the Symphony Orchestra. In the three months of the season that remain, he will doubtless prepare programmes as catholic and interesting as those he has made throughout his term; he will give duly eloquent performances of the music in which his best traits as a conductor shine; he will lead in some pieces as memorably as he has played not a few in the past; he will not spare study, pains or accomplishment with the rest. He will continue, in short, to be the able and diligent, the interesting and excellent conductor that he has been from the first, while a public that has liked him warmly, will not wane in regard and applause for him.

Why, then, with these three interesting months to come and with Mr. Fiedler in the fulness of his powers and energy, should those that profess to admire him most be seemingly determined to begin very prematurely the rites of farewell? In private talk they discourse of the conductor solemnly, as though he had finished his work in Boston, whereas he has a full half-year of it (as seasons are measured) still to do ably and pleasurably. They write letters to the newspapers enumerating Mr. Fiedler's virtues and lamenting his departure, as though his final concert were at hand or he already had his foot on the gangway of his ship. Mistakenly they would speed his farewell when the rest of us have hardly thought of it and are looking forward instead to the long series of concerts that he has still to conduct here. Thereby enthusiasts believe that they testify their particular admiration for Mr. Fiedler. A wiser and a truer way to pay this "tribute" is to treat him as the actual conductor that he is and to take the pleasure and the interest of all that remains for him to do. He could ask no better proof of the liking of his Bostonian public for him and the audiences of Symphony Hall are not likely to spare it.

H. T. P.

[129]

POST,

JANUARY 25. 1912

MEES' BOSTON DEBUT TONIGHT

Alice Nielsen to Sing Marguerite With Cecilias

ARTHUR MEES,
The new conductor of the Cecilia Society.

Tonight brings the first concert of the reorganized Cecilia Society and will introduce to Boston, as conductor, Arthur Mees, who has taken the place filled so many years by the late B. J. Lang and after him Wallace Goodrich and last year by Max Fiedler.

For two months the work of rehearsing the "Damnation of Faust" has been going on with much enthusiasm. The membership of the chorus has been enlarged and for this concert the mal chorus will be recruited by the Schuber Club of Malden—50 men's voices. Tw full rehearsals with orchestra have bee held and an exceedingly fine performanc of this favorite choral work is expecte

Miss Alice Nielsen will make her debu as a concert singer in the part of Mar guerite. The part of Faust will be sun by George Hamlin, that of Mephist pheles by Herbert Witherspoon and that of Brander by L. B. Merrill.

POST,

JANUARY 26, 1912

NEW CECILIA'S FIRST CONCERT

Dr. Mees Makes Debut—Miss Hudson as Marguerite

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Cecilia Society, Dr. Arthur Mees directing it for the first time, gave its first concert this season yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" was given with these soloists: Caroline Hudson, George Hamlin, Herbert Witherspoon, L. B. Merrill, Florence Jepperson. The chorus of the society was assisted by 40 members of the Schubert Club of Malden (men's voices) and an orchestra of players from the Boston Symphony.

The "Damnation of Faust" becomes more interesting, appears more remarkable as years go by and works supposed to be of greater worth commence to decay in the public estimation. Listening last night everyone marvelled all over again at the intensity and the force of Berlioz' flaming imagination, at his superb originality and the audacity and success of his strokes of genius, and one had occasion to be distressed anew at the sound of a work written and composed in French and sung in an English translation that fitted the spirit and the metre of the music about as well as a pair of trousers would fit a humming-bird.

The performance was in certain respects admirable. Dr. Mees had trained his chorus carefully. They knew the music well. They sang it smoothly and with good balance and quality of tone. He interpreted this picturesque and richly emotional music with a singular lack of imagination, elasticity, conviction. And yet Dr. Mees has long since this proved himself a musician of uncommon equipment and energy. In this human world there are certain ones who are temperamentally remote from certain music. It will be interesting to hear Dr. Mees do other things.

As for the soloists, Miss Hudson, who had taken Miss Nielsen's part at such short notice, sang very intelligently and efficiently, with appreciation of the spirit as well as the letter of her music and with appropriately sensuous coloring of her tones. Mr. Hamlin made every effort to meet the composer half way. Mr. Witherspoon, an excellent singer, took a part which changes surprisingly from oratorio to pure operatic style back and forth again, sang sonorously and as a rule admirably, and had made a careful study of the character of his text. The audience was large and it applauded cordially.

MONITOR,

JANUARY 25, 1912

Miss Alice Nielsen, who was to have taken part in the performance by the Cecilia Society in Symphony hall this evening, will be unable to appear. C. A. Ellis has made arrangements whereby Mme. Caroline Hudson of New York will take Miss Nielsen's place. Mme. Hudson is one of the younger oratorio singers of this country and her work is very highly spoken of.

* * *

The Cecilia Society gives its first performance of the season at Symphony hall tonight, presenting "The Damnation of Faust," with three soloists of operatic fame assisting in the dramatic roles of Marguerite, Faust and Mephistopheles. These singers are Miss Alice Nielsen, formerly of the Boston opera compay; George Hamlin of the Chicago opera company; and Herbert Witherspoon of the Metropolitan opera of New York. A fourth soloist is L. B. Merrill, who sings the role of Brander. The idea of employing artists of operatic training in the work of Berlioz, which is almost an opera anyway and is sometimes presented in dramatic form, must appeal to the imagination of the concert public. There is opportunity for vocal impersonating in the Cecilia program which the artists selected are not likely to miss.

Mr. Hamlin and Mr. Witherspoon arrived in Boston in time to take part in a soloists' rehearsal of the Berlioz work Wednesday afternoon with the orchestra. Mr. Hamlin began his operatic career this season in Chicago, singing with Miss Mary Garden in Victor Herbert's American opera "Natoma." He is now interested in Wolf-Ferrari's new work, "The Jewels of the Madonna," which had a successful production recently in Chicago in the presence of the composer. Mr. Hamlin is enthusiastic over Wolf-Ferrari's music, because it is of the melodious sort that is grateful to the lyric tenor voice. Asked if he expected to sing with the Boston Opera Company this season, Mr. Hamlin said that he had not heard that he was to sing here; but added that he should be glad to take the part of the American officer in "Natoma," if the Boston company ever produced the work. He spoke in high praise of Miss Mary Garden's portraiture of the Indian girl in Herbert's opera, and said that the piece was a favorite with the Chicago pubilc.

GLOBE

JANUARY 28, 1912.

MME. GOODSON WINS FRESH HONORS AT SYMPHONY MATINEE

In a performance of Tschaikowsky's near classic concerto that strangely had its premiere in Boston in 1875, Katharine Goodson—no longer plain Katie since she married and became an international star—won fresh honors at the Symphony matinee yesterday.

It didn't seem as the tall, pale, frail Englishwoman turned the corner of the aisle leading to the front of the stage—looking taller and more tenuous than ever in a plain gown of faint blue over creamy white—that she could ever hold her own in the crashing first movement or in the big, melodious flourish which the popular Russian penned at the end. But she rose like the artistic heroine she is, with power, and, as becomes a pupil of the great Leschetitski, with perfect polish.

There are pianists who make much of the resounding chords at the start and little of the luscious cantilena that ripples through the rest of the concerto—the first one the Russian wrote. Mme. Goodson played it in masterly style yesterday, with proper regard for ensemble effects in the vigorous measures; with the mellowest tone, and yet without ever sentimentalizing, in the gentler pasages. Nor did the truly formidable difficulties that abound in the concerto reveal any perceptible technical weakness. The orchestra vied with the soloist in a performance of true virtuoso beauty and brilliancy.

The hall was filled. The brilliancy of the afternoon began with a performance of the second Schumann concerto, in C major, that was altogether worthy of this solid and romantic work. Mr. Fiedler would not take all the applause to himself. The orchestra had to rise and take its share of it.

Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," is the final number on this week's program, which will be heard again tonight.

Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto.

In Symphony Hall, Thursday evening, Feb 29, Boston will have its first opportunity to hear the remarkable Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto. With the choir will come the Chicago Orchestra. The Mendelssohn Choir is a unique organization. It consists of 120 women and 120 men.

It is a voluntary association, but unlike most choruses it is practically reorganized at the beginning of each season. At least to this extent that every member has to undergo a rigorous examination at the beginning of the season and it is kept up to its high mark of efficiency by the fact that there is a waiting list of several hundred singers who are eager to join its ranks. The conductor of the choir is Mr Vogt.

Longy Club Evening.

The third and last concert of the Longy Club will be given in Jordan Hall Monday evening, Feb 12. A very interesting feature of the program will be a sonata for violin and piano, by Georg Enesco, which will be heard in Bos for the first time. This will be pla by Mr Noack, the second concertmast of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mr A fred de Voto.

Symphony Orchestra on Its First Western Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston tomorrow night on the first of the two Western trips it is to make this season. The first concert will be given Monday night in Rochester, and then concerts will be given on suc sive nights in Buffalo, Cleveland, In apolis, Toledo, Detroit, and a week from Monday night Schenectady on the way home.

The program that Mr Fiedler has arranged for this trip are almost exclusively Wagnerian. In Rochester he will play the Evoica Symphony and in Schenectady the "Leonora" No. 3 overture, and Mme Samaroff-Stokowski will play the Grieg concetto for piano. The only other soloist on the tr will be at the Cleveland concert, when Herbert Witherspoon will sing two Wagner selections.

There will be no soloist at the 15th program to be played here Feb 9 and 10, nor at the fifth Cambridge concert Feb 8.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

CONVENTION HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony concert of last night was superb, both in programme and performance. A Beethoven symphony finely played is always tonic in effect on the really musical public. The dignity of the thought and its splendid expression with a clearness that amounts almost to definition in each theme and movement is a corrective to the neurotic appeal of musical meanderings. The Eroica is a particularly perfect example of noble music, so written that, when played with the mastery of last night's rendition, the hearer without knowledge of the method of its mechanism may readily realize its suggestive meaning. Beethoven did not try to make his hearers think of specific events or characteristics after the manner of Richard Strauss; he set down the musical thought which came to him when he mused on heroism, and the greatness of the theme is measured in the music.

With the Eroica, on Mr. Fiedler's programme last night, was coupled a group of Wagner excerpts and the sequence appeals as logical. Wagner believed that Beethoven exhausted the possibilities of abstract suggestion in music for the orchestra. His own effort was to use his musical means in a more concrete way and he succeeded. His thematic material shows a wonderful appreciation of the suggestive appeal of melody, and his ability to build this material into dramatic climax opened new channels to his successors in orchestral composition.

All this is in the nature of platitude, but it recurs to the mind when such readings of this music are heard as Mr. Fiedler and his men gave last night. For Beethoven's themes and their developments were given to the full their definitive character, his melodies were voiced as songs without words, filled with understandable meaning, and this meaningful appeal was never lost in the massing of the instrumentation. Mr. Fiedler's reading was masterful; his perception of the symphony is a finely balanced combining of its intense virility and searching melodic beauty. He commands his players absolutely, and the hearer assents to the justness of his demands. He conducted the symphony last night without the score and one felt throughout the completeness of his knowledge of its full content. It was a memorable performance.

In the Wagner numbers the two great essentials, sensuous beauty of tone and dramatic intensity in ensemble without loss of this beauty, were completely realized. Indeed with each successive hearing of this great orchestra one appreciates how much of its superiority depends upon the never failing flood of sheerly beautiful sound which its composite instrumentalism produces. The Lohengrin prelude is one of the most perfect examples in music of the upbuilding and subsidence of musical mood; it was played with the dignity it deserves and there was none of the over-sentimentalizing in tempo and tone that sometimes mars it. The excerpt from the "Twilight of the Gods" was made to convey its immense suggestion of the shattering of the things that were; there may be some musical trickery about Wagner's instrumentation here but it amply succeeds; there was a colossal finality in the number as it was played last night. The Siegfried Idyl is delightful scoring of much diverse material and one sensed its charm of manner and method last night to the full. The Tannhauser Overture was as magnificent as the memories of Mr. Fiedler's former reading of it in Rochester gave promise of. The audience was cordially appreciative throughout the evening, paying tribute to every number heartily, and twice causing Mr. Fiedler to call his men to their feet to share in his acknowledgments.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

Esta

RAPT AUDIENCE HEARS SYMPHONY

Beethoven and Wagner by Boston Orchestra.

The warm, unanimous applause which resounded through the well-filled Convention Hall at the end of each episode of the programme last night proclaimed clearly that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held in high esteem by the musical public of Rochester. If such enthusiastic audiences greet the artists announced for the remainder of the season in the same manner and numbers, the stigma that Rochester is unmusical will not hold good.

The programme, which had been criticised as being unsuited to the tastes of musical Rochester, consisted of Beethoven's Third Symphony, "The Eroica," and four Wagner excerpts, the prelude to "Lohengrin," funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," "Siegfried Idyl" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The Beethoven Symphony, which marks a new departure in the composer's method, in which the continuous and organic mode of connecting the second subject with the first, and the introduction of episodes into the working out, were first used. In the second movement the title of "March" is used, a distinct innovation, and in the third the title of "Scherzo" is used for the first time in symphonies; also the finale contains daring freedom and romance in the midst of such strict form.

"The Eroica" always will have a great historical claim, apart from its inherent beauty as music, that of being in honor of Napoleon, who was at that time known less as a soldier than as a public man who had been the champion of freedom and savior of his country. After Beethoven learned that he had been elected Emperor and had become a tyrant, his admiration

The first movement, allegro con brio, is ushered in by two staccato chords in E-flat, by the full orchestra, followed by the chief theme, which is given to the 'cellos, a suave minuet-like melody four bars long. The development is elaborate and is followed by a second theme of much greater length and in absolute contrast to it. Alternate sunlight and cloud, fury and tenderness mark the characteristics of the first movement. Even the coda, which had been used to terminate a movement, is an essential part of the poem.

Needless is it to say that the performance was superb. A tremendous ovation greeted the orchestra and conductor at the close of the first movement.

Wonderful Music.

The second movement is in the form of a funeral march, a march worthy to accompany the obsequies of a hero of the noblest type. It is in the key of C minor, and commences sotto voce in the strings. The subject is harmonized in a wonderful way, and received an impassioned interpretation at the hands of Mr. Fiedler and his men.

The third movement, the scherzo, for which the theme is taken from an Austrian folk song, is a complete relief to the march, and is largely in the hands of the horns, of which there are three in the score.

The finale seems almost trivial after the first two movements, and seems to be inconsistent, until it reaches the wonderful Andante, which forms so grand a climax to the composition, which, as played last night, was wonderfully impressive.

The second part of the programme revealed the ability of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to put new light into apparently hackneyed compositions as the works had been frequently played here, except, perhaps, the "Siegfried Idyl," and great was the delight of the audience at hearing such marvelous interpretations of Wagner's masterpieces. At the conclusion of the concert, the conductor Max Fiedler, was recalled, and the players rose to their feet in response to an enthusiastic greeting.

James E. Furlong was responsible for the local management of the concert, and on Friday he brings Emma Eames and Gogorza to sing at Convention Hall.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Suppose the birth of Beethoven, the master musician of all history, had been delayed one hundred years. Suppose his works, many of the greatest of which have been known for a century, were just now dawning upon the world as fresh revelations of the genius of a new composer. Suppose, in the meantime, the "moderns" had made their entrance, captured the attention of the public with their curious creations, their reckless cacophanies, their melodic vagaries, their insults to rhythmic intelligence, their abandonment of key relations, their scorn of cadences and "points of repose," their incoherent instrumental harangues, and their exploitation of the orchestra as a cover for lack of sane and orderly musical thought.

Now suppose Beethoven, in this year 1912, should come upon the scene as a stranger, offering his productions for the consideration of the music-loving public. Assume that the public should become interested, or at least that its curiosity should be aroused to the extent of giving him a respectful and impartial hearing. It is more than conceivable, it is altogether probable, that the verdict would be something like this: "Blessed relief! Welcome revelation! This man Beethoven has heavenly talent, splendid imagination; he is a melody maker, a wonder worker in harmony, a master of form and structure, a rythmic wizard, a profound scholar. More than all, his whole being is surcharged with music, he has something to say and he says it with the authority of deep learning, the eloquence of impassioned oratory, and the diction of a born poet. Even as Shakespeare was the dramatist of the masses, so is Beethoven the musicism of humanity. Away with the disciples of ugliness, of evasion, of musical poverty, of—one is almost tempted to say—gumbug. Hail the new light, the bearer of messages to the soul, the proclaimer of glad tidings from the very fountain head of pure music."

Last night at Convention Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Beethoven's Third Symphony in E-flat, the "Eroica." The piece and the performance were, in a word, glorious. This symphony marked a long step in the development of Beethoven's genius. For unlike Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schubert, Beethoven was never a prodigy. They produced some of their greatest works in the years of their boyhood and youth, whereas Beethoven gave to the public his first symphony at the age of 30, and his last, the ninth, was written when he was 53 years old. After the first two had been composed he said: "I am not satisfied with my works up to the present time. From to-day I mean to take a new road." This purpose was [illegible] and splendidly carried out effect. The "Eroica" was designed as a tribute to Napoleon, the reformer and the administrator of France's civic affairs. When Napoleon became emperor Beethoven burst into a paroxysm of rage, tore the title page of the symphony in two, and exclaimed: "He will trample on the rights of man and become a greater tyrant than any one."

But the music itself was not destroyed. It has lived until to-day and will live through the centuries, no matter how many strange doctrines creep into the musical art with their corrupting or enervating propaganda. Of the performance of the orchestra last night it would be superfluous to speak in terms of laudation. From the two explosive staccato chords, followed by the splendidly simple four-bar theme, to the beautiful climax of the last movement, the rendition was characterized by technical virtuosity and interpretive illumination. That first theme, by the way, is an example of Beethoven's ability to produce overwhelming effects by the most simple devices. The subsequent developments are manifestations of his wealth of imagination and contrapuntal resources. There is the sensational "mistake," for instance, of the chord of the dominant, played by violins, with an underlying horn theme in the chord of the tonic. But Beethoven knew what he wanted to do, and the effect is intensely poetical. But this is a mere incident. There are harmonic changes of the utmost audacity, and melodic figures which entrance while they bewilder. The funeral march in C minor (second movement); the elegant scherzo (third movement); the capricious finale (fourth movement), consisting of a theme with extraordinary and captivating variations, complete a work which, apart from its historical associations, must always have distinction because of its nobility, beauty and variety. Mr. Fiedler and his musicians did not permit the audience to relax its attention or lose its interest for one moment, so superb was their performance and so unflagging their fidelity to every detail of this wonderful work. It was an achievement in orchestra playing long to be remembered with enthusiasm and gratitude by every

Mr. Fiedler was thrice recalled. After bowing his acknowledgments of the demonstrations of approval for the third time he summoned his musicians to their feet, whereupon the applause was still louder and more prolonged.

After the intermission which followed the symphony, the orchestra played four Wagner selections, namely: Prelude to "Lohengrin," funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," Siegfried idyl, and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." These are among the demonstrations of Wagner's ability to write music which in itself has a measure of appeal apart from its relation to the drama of which it is a constituent part. Wagner expressly disavowed any purpose to write music for music's sake, holding it to be merely one of the elements of the drama, and standing on an equality with the dialogue, the action, the scenery—acting as an "expository medium" for creating an atmosphere and designed to place the listener and beholder in a frame of mind suitable for taking in the significance of the characters and the development of the plot. In this line of endeavor his achievements were tremendous, but his aim had nothing in common with that of Beethoven, to whom music was the beginning and the end—sufficient unto itself and having no regard for externals. But notwithstanding the theory which Wagner declared to be the basis of his efforts, a considerable proportion of his music is magnificent and enjoyable when detached from its dramatic associations, although we are assured that this was far from the intention of the composer. What he might have done if he had devoted himself to symphonies and other instrumental forms is an interesting subject for conjecture. Mr. Fiedler's selections were fruitful of speculation in this direction. The work of the players in the Wagner section of the program was up to the highest possibilities of orchestral virtuosity and intelligent expressiveness.

A large audience constantly and keenly enjoyed the concert. It was under the local management of J. E. Furlong, who announced Emma Eames and Emilio Gogorza, with Henri Gillies as pianist and accompanist, for next Friday evening.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

Esta

MUSIC LOVERS GIVEN TREAT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Rare Feast.

A WAGNER SUITE

Beethoven Work of Unusual Charm Pre-

[120]

There are those who would prefer a meal of corned beef and cabbage served on a deal table to a feast with Lucullus. The best argument that Rochester has a host with the latter and higher taste was the audience last night at the Lucullan feast of music provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall. The attendance not only filled the seats, but was prompt and enthusiastic in its appreciation of the wonder work of the big human organ.

Max Fiedler conducted. He not only conducted, he wielded a magic wand that synethesized the component units of his organization into a composite unity. He was recalled time and time again to bow his acknowledgment of the plaudits.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, the "Eroica" over which musicians are still in dispute, was the composition chosen for first rendition. Beethoven, the Meister, composed this work in his latter days and in it are reflected the moods and phrases of his more mature philosophy. Whether or not he wrote it as a memorial to Napoleon and whether or not it stands as a grotesue bit of incoherent composition, its hearing is a pleasure. The well-regulated phrases of Beethoven, the fine regard for the unities of harmony, the romance that is interwoven into the plot, the constantly recurring, heavy burden of fate, make it an intensely dramatic thing.

The first movement, the Allegro con brio, with the deep-voiced 'cellos carrying the theme, is an elaborate exposition of the momentous struggle between Fate and the human soul. The brilliant contrasts of the episode are wrought with the amazing fineness of a beautiful filigree. The ideas are jewel-like notes to form a perfect necklace of gems.

The second episode is the funeral music, majestic, full-rounded, swelling. is the procession of cowled, hooded figures—ambition, pride, lust of life, desire of eye. The antiphonal and solemn chant of the string and wind section is a racking and soul-searing bit of composition. If it is true that Beethoven wrote this after he had humbly submitted to the sacrament and put aside the theistic Egyptian inscription with which his name has been associated, then he has indeed expressed true penitence.

Then comes the lilting, tantalizing Scherzo, full of the invitation of the joy of life. Once the momentous struggle is suggested, but the great joy overmasters it. It is the sequence of this moving picture of the inner life of man. The trio and the fugue are full of abrupt questions and answers, mingling comedy and tragedy, the very heart of mystery.

Over a golden bridge the romance passes to the finale, the Allegro molto and the surprising recapitulation, when the theme, victorious, sweeping all instruments into a mighty flood, that knows no brooking, stopping a moment to take up the delicate and mysterious melody of the Scherzo (changed by magic into something new and strange) then swelling into a tide until it breaks in swift-rolling, thunderous billows of unmeasurable jubilation, in the all-conquering, all-embracing summation of the problem.

The Symphony is a wonderful thing. It is musically interesting, it is dramatically powerful. It is not new in any of its methods, in fact there are hints or thefts from other scores, but what is incomparable, what stirs in us a Beethovian thrill is the evocative powers of the Meister that put the dramatic action before us with such force that we take part in the acute physical and psychical processes of the romancer. The enthusiasm of the allegro, the dolorous lament of the andante, the feverish pulsations of the pizzicati of the scherzo, become part of our own human experience. The Eroica Symphony to those who heard it last night will long remain a real bit of experience that will express the verity of the hearers' lives.

Fiedler interpreted it with a humanness and a spirit that breathed of the soul of the Meiter.

The second part of the concert was given over to four Wagnerian numbers. The Boston Symphony has done a wonderful thing with the Wagner music—made it popular and a thing apart from the mere incidental accompaniment to a plot that the composer insisted it should be.

The prelude to "Lohengrin," that dramatic telling of a fateful tale, was a marvelous bit of intense music. The effects obtained from the cacophonal combinations of instruments gave a new color to the episode and the single theme with its throbbing, sobbing tale of the fate-enmeshed Brunnhilde, was interpreted with a new meaning.

The funeral music of Siegfried, the crashing death motive that mingles with the gamut of leit-motive in its menacing grimace at the futility of life, was carried to the idyl, where for a few brief moments it was lost in the romancing of a summer day.

The programme closed with the ponderous, religioso sweep of the Tannhauser overture, the supplication, the contrition and the triumph of rejoicing, intermingled with the temptation of the passionate, bacchanalian, swift-phrased subsidiary theme.

Probably no Rochester audience had ever listened to a more completely rounded programme of master works than that at last night. To the music lover it was a delight. To one uninitiated into the pleasures of harmony, it was an invitingly simple glimpse into a wonderland of color, where one might revel for a time apart from any cold, barren realities.

From Union & Advertiser

Address Rochester N Y

Date Jan. 30-1912

Estab

CONVENTION HALL.

When the programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall was first made public there were more than a few expressions of disappointment because of the Wagnerian selections. After listening to and witnessing the most remarkable demonstration ever accorded an orchestral concert in this city, one almost fears to hazard a guess as to what the reception would have been, had the programme been made up in accordance with the expressed desires of prospective auditors. Formers visits of the unrivaled organization to Rochester had prepared an encouragingly large audience for a rare treat, and it was one of those rare occasions when anticipation was not disappointed by realization. Beethoven's Third Symphony, "The Eroica," constituted the first half of the programme, and the final note of the first movement was the signal for a tremendous demonstration of approval, persisted in to an unusual degree. It was a spontaneous tribute to a superb performance of a wonderful composition. The delight aroused by this introduction was intesified as the symphony progressed through the three other movements culminating in the tremendously impressive finale. Conductor Max Fiedler was recalled three times and then in response to the insistent demands of the crowd he signaled to his players to also rise and join in acknowledgment of the demonstration. The "Lohengrin" prelude constituted the introduction to the second half of the programme. It was played just as such an organization might be expected to play it, revealing new beauties in a quite familiar composition. The funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" and the "Siegfried Idyl," both perfectly given, followed, and the concert was concluded with the "Tannhauser" overture. On the occasion of a former visit the orchestra was heard in this same number with unrestrained delight. Last night's playing of the familiar number was followed by an outburst of enthusiasm rivaling that accorded the playing of the Symphony. It is James E. Furlong to whom Rochesterians are indebted for opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and on Friday evening of this week at Convention Hall he will offer Madame Emma Eames and Emilio De Gogorza in concert.

From TIMES,

Address Buffalo, N. Y.

Date JAN 3 1 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT DELIGHTED AUDIENCE

Estabi

The fourth in the series of six concerts under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, took place last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave a delightful program of Wagner music before a large and representative audience. This is the first of two concerts to be given this season in Buffalo by this organization.

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner made up the program. The opening number was the brilliant Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," followed by the Prelude to the opera "Lohengrin." The impressive funeral music written to celebrate the heroism of the dead Siegfried in the last act of "Gotterdammering" and the Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde closed the first part of the program. A piece of orchestral painting was the Prelude to "Lohengrin" in which the lights and shades were delightfully blended to produce a harmonious whole. Of exceptional beauty was the sublime funeral music, a slow and stately movement with ten interwoven motives of which the "Death-Motive" is the most insistent.

The second part included the Prelude to "Parsifal," a Siegfried idyl, and the ever welcome Overature to Tannhauser, a fitting climax to a splendid program.

As a master of the baton, Mr. Fiedler's leadership was characterized by an instantaneous responsiveness in tone coloring and tempos and his superiority as an artist was demonstrated by his intelligent and poetic interpretations.

The next concert in the series under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith will be given on March 5th with Vladimir de Pachmann, pianist.

From COMMERCIAL,

Address Buffalo, N. Y.

Date JAN 3 1 1912

Establi

WAGNER PROGRAM

Boston Symphony Orchestra Enthralled Large Audience Last Evening.

AT CONVENTION HALL.

Max Fiedler Directed the Organization With Great Ability—Return Engagement in April.

A large and brilliant audience gathered at Convention Hall last evening to hear the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, in a program that was made up entirely of selections by the Bayreuth master, Richard Wagner.

The fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so well known to all music lovers that it is hardly necessary to speak of the fine work of this organization. The playing last evening of this large body of well trained musicians seemed more magnificent than ever. Surely these artists, so absolutely complete in technique, cannot be refused first rank in the orchestral field in this country. The violins are so uniform, the wood-wind instruments produce such soft, sweet tones and the brasses are so rich and powerful that one is carried away by the loveliness of the tone as a whole. At no time does the effect become blurred or bulky and one is aware only of the beautiful blending of the tone colors.

The orchestra was remarkably virile and impressive in reading the portentous opening number, "Prelude" to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." This is without doubt one of the greatest compositions ever written. It is intricate and replete with technical difficulties and the many themes are worked out with great care. The pompous theme of the mastersingers, the beautiful love theme of Walter and the Beckmesser motive are heard separately and together. The melodious phrase is developed with superb breadth and the sonorous affirmation of the mastersinger theme serves as a song of apotheosis.

No less remarkable was the music of the "Prelude" to "Lohengrin." The introduction was so delicate that one imagined the tones came from the clouds. The string orchestra especially deserves hearty praise for the superb manner in which it played this number.

The dark and imaginative coloring of the music of "The Funeral March" from "Dusk of the Gods" held the audience enthralled and the love themes from "Tristan and Isolde" were played with such fervor that one was drawn closer to the love drama.

The "Parsifal" prelude, "Siegfried Idyl" and overture to "Tannhauser" were the other numbers on the program and in all these the orchestra was superb.

Max Fiedler is a conductor of great power and he has complete control of his players at all times.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard here again in April.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Es

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS MARVELOUSLY

Director Fiedler's Wagner Program Makes Deep Impression on Convention Hall Audience.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become an event of ever increasing importance in this city until it may be named as the most powerful magnet of the concert season. Last night at Convention Hall, where the orchestra appeared under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the seating capacity was taxed to accommodate the immense audience present. It is a delight to honor this superb organization not merely for its incomparably fine achievement, but also and very especially for its eloquent and convincing proving that ideals are a vital force in a scheme of such breadth as the activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A Wagner program as offered last night is one of innumerable testimonies that Wagner's music is not

From ENQUIRER,

Address San Francisco, Cal.

Date JAN 3 1 1912

Est

MUSIC WAS QUITE ENTRANCING

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delighted Large Audience at Convention Hall Last Evening With Classic Numbers.

Perhaps one of the most delightful concerts ever heard in this city was that given last night at Convention hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler. The concert was the fourth of a series of six, arranged by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, and was keenly enjoyed. It was a triumph for Mr. Fiedler and his musicians and the closing number brought forth a prolonged ovation.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is one of the oldest symphonic organizations in the country, and considered one of the greatest in the world. It was not alone the tonal loveliness that aroused last night's audience to demonstrations of heartiest approval, but the wonderful technical finish and the interpretative powers that brought to fullest revealment the beauties of the masterpieces.

Mr. Fiedler chose for the opening number the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was rendered with delightful effect. The superb beauty of the prelude to "Lohengrin," was also brought forth in meritorious quality.

In the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the orchestra once more gave a tremendously impressive performance, and were accorded a fresh ovation. To many the prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" was the most beautiful number of the evening, the sensuous melody and gorgeous color and all its passionate ecstasy being brought out with almost overpowering effect and yet never lacking in extreme delicacy. The applause which followed its ending was sufficient proof that it was looked upon as a great performance.

Part second of the programme opened with the preulde to "Parsifal," which was played with inspired and deep devotional feeling. "A Siegfried Idyl," perfect in its way, led up to the big climax of the evening, the overture from "Tannhauser," in which Mr. Fiedler fairly eclipsed himself and drew from his orchestra such marvelous response that the audience went wild, and in the finale, when the trumpets played the counter melody with the trombones, the gorgeously dramatic ending was followed by perfect storms of applause, until Mr. Fiedler and his musicians stood for some moments bowing their acknowledgments.

marvelous a portrayal of the mood that it can, in certain cases, be lifted from its frame and be heard with complete satisfaction. The numbers included among Mr. Fiedler's selection were the preludes to the Mastersingers, Lohengrin, Tristan and Parsifal, the funeral march from act 3 of "Dusk of the Gods," a Siegfrier Idyll, closing with the overture to Tannhauser.

These were given with the breadth and nobility of conception characteristic of Mr. Fiedler's conducting. Elaboration of details was constantly in evidence in the clarity and surety of hand with which the mazes of the scores were guided, but always was such finish made to contribute to the large outline and general character of the composition. So deep was the impression made upon the last night's audience by the superb qualities of the playing that the applause would have no end and twice during the evening Mr. Fiedler had the orchestra stand to acknowledge with him the tributes.

To comment upon the superlative merits of the equipment of this orchestra, its virtuosity in performance, bent entirely to the adequate, eloquent interpretation of the task in hand, its magnificent tone color, the incomparable art with which it can voice the tenderness of a Siegfried Idyll, the passion of the Tristan music and the endless variety of the Meistersinger prelude, is to rehearse again what has been already said many times, and there are a few things in art anyway that are beyond praise.

The orchestra will visit Buffalo again on April 9.

[131]

From EXPRESS
Address Buffalo, N. Y.
Date JAN 31 1912

PROGRAMME OF WAGNER

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Much Enjoyed.

RETURN IN APRIL

Marvelous Work Under the Leadership of Max Fiedler.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler, and a Wagnerian programme, formed the potent attraction which drew a large audience last evening to Convention Hall. The concert was the fourth in the series of six arranged, by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, and was a source of true and keen enjoyment.

There is nothing to say of the virtues of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the oldest symphonic organizations in the country, and one of the greatest in this or any other land. It is a noble company of players, equipped with instruments of such perfection as to produce in the hands of the skilled performers tones of the utmost beauty. It would be difficult to imagine a lovelier tone, both of the entire orchestra and of the individual sections, than emanates from this body of players. Strings, woodwind and brasses in turn compel sincerest admiration and the blending of these divisions produces a tone of finest quality.

But it was not alone tonal loveliness that aroused last night's audience to demonstrations of heartiest approval. It was the wonderful technical finish, the virtuosity of the thoroughly routined performers, combined with interpretative powers which brought to fullest revealment the beauties of the masterpieces they present.

Last night's programme offered the Prelude to The Meistersingers; the Prelude to Lohengrin; the Funeral Music from Die Goetterdaemmerung; the Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde; the Prelude to Parsifal; the Siegfried Idyl and the Tannhauser overture. It was merely a matter of individual taste on the part of the listeners as to which of these works received the most beautiful performance. The richness and sweetness of the strings and their ethereal loveliness, as shown in the Lohengrin prelude; the clarity and purity of the woodwinds, the sonority and mellowness of the brasses, notable in the Tannhauser excerpt, the balance and contrasting of the different choirs in the Liebestod, all these were points to delight the musical ear. Mr. Fiedler is a conductor who has a masterful control of orchestral resources and a keen sense of the lyrical phrase. He never loses the opportunity to raise into due prominence the melodic line, and in the involved contrapuntal passages of the Meistersinger prelude, it was marvelous how he brought out the various voices, keeping always a just balance of sound. Mr. Fiedler was recalled many times during the programme, and twice during the evening he shared the honors with his orchestra, motioning to the men to stand and acknowledge with him the applause. A last opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler will be given on April 9th, when a second Buffalo concert will be given by this organization.

M. M. H.

valled in every number, the strings seeming to be moved by a single hand, the brasses and woodwinds to be blown by a single breath.

Of the eight numbers, the most impressive was the Death Music from Gotterdaemmerung. The sad, slow pomp of the hero's passing was most vividly portrayed. The Siegfried Idyl was given a beautiful reading.

Herbert Witherspoon, bass, sang the "Song to the Evening Star" and "Wotan's Farewell." In the former number he seemed embarrassed by the lack of the operatic stage setting, and his voice was rasping in several passages. Improvement was noted in the forceful magic fire and farewell number, however, and the applause for Witherspoon's art was generous and prolonged.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From [illegible]
Address Cleveland Ohio
Date FEB 1 - 1912

Wagner Magnificent Under Fiedler's Baton

By Wilson G. Smith.

The colossal musical conceptions of Wagner always present something new and imposing—no matter how often we hear them. And the closer the study, the greater the amazement that human mind could conceive and execute such stupendous ideas.

Frequent hearing and study of the Wagner scores is like the illuminating rays of the sun—it discovers new mountain tops of inspiration. Little wonder that the musical world quailed before them, amazed and appalled. It has been the familiarity of subsequent years and constant repetition that have brought our musical eyes into a proper focus to appreciate and understand them.

Works that were received at first with cold disdain and even hissed, attracted to the armory Wednesday night the largest audience of the season. Surely the "world do move," and the best part of it is that we are moving with it. As in the sunset habit I have acquired, I do not go to the bank of old Erie to criticise, so when the Bostonians come all the way from Beanville to give us a Wagner program, I am in the mood for enjoyment.

I have heard more passionately emotional interpretations than Fiedler gave us; I have heard the Wagnerian themes and motives seethe and boil as in a caldron; I have heard the blare of brass, the shriek of reeds and beating of drums as though the prelude to the last day was at hand. It was merely another man's conception of the inferno—possibly Wagner's, too; I know not.

Fiedler, while emotional and climactic in his readings, kept on the safe side of sanity and within the jurisdiction of legitimate musical effects. The orchestra played magnificently—as always. Perhaps a note was slipped here and there, an attack unsynchronous or something else that theoretically jars on the ear of astute criticism. If so, I did not hear it, for as my ears drank in the noble music, my mind was lost in contemplating the colossal mind that created it. Such achievements are but little short of infinitude.

Herbert Witherspoon gave two Wagner excerpts in a style of artistic delivery he has never excelled, if equaled, locally. His tones are more plastic and sympathetic than formerly, particularly in his use of the head tones. Had encores been permitted, he would have had to respond, for the audience greeted him with enthusiastic applause. The orchestra, too, was compelled to rise and share with Fiedler the homage of the delighted listeners.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date FEB 1 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS CLEVELAND

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra appeared at Grays armory last evening, under the direction of Max Fiedler, with Herbert Witherspoon as soloist, and before an audience that taxed the capacity of the big auditorium. Without doubt it was the most successful concert of the season, as it should have been, for in many particulars it was the best that has thus far been given. Not since Nordica appeared here as a star attraction years ago, has any such gathering turned out at the armory. The front of the house was packed with extra chairs and all of them were taken. About as much standing room was sold as the fire laws permit. And what's more important, the crowd was representative of the musical element, not alone of Cleveland, but of northern Ohio, Oberlin, Ashtabula and Akron being well represented.

There's a magic goes with the name of the Boston symphony. The name is synonymous with what is best in music. It happens that it is an organization that has taken years to build. It also happens that each member of the organization is an artist. In almost every instance before acceptance to this organization every man has proved his mettle on previous occasions with similar bodies or as a soloist. The result, therefore, is an almost perfect ensemble. When they play, they do so as one great instrument. The bowing of the fiddlers is as if one man were doing it. The crashing of the brasses is in perfect unison. As much may be said of the wood-winds. To hear them is to hear the best expression of orchestral voices, and when there is coupled with such perfection a program which is entirely made up of excerpts from Wagner, little is left to be desired by the musician or the music lover.

There is no doubt that the works of Richard Wagner, at least most of those selections that were rendered last night, are not so interesting in concert as they are when given in their proper place, the opera house. Wagner, however, denied that this was true himself, by leading various orchestras through the intricacies of the compositions, and by giving his permission for others to do likewise. Most of his operas were given to the world piece-meal and naturally caused the lions to rage and his adherents to more closely adhere than ever before. But it must be remembered that Wagner and his followers were called upon to do a lot of missionary work. Even "Lohengrin" was hissed and howled down when it was tried in Paris. It is a good thing to remember that such a thing has happened within the memory of many people still alive, in view of the almost prayerful rendering of the "Parsifal" prelude and the more characteristic fire music and the charm from "Die Walkure," which was given last night.

Without a doubt, the prelude to "Meistersinger" was not given in true Boston-symphony style. Some of the strings played out of tune, there was a hesitation in attack and the general spirit of the thing was not made so evident as in the other works that appeared later on the program.

Rarely, if ever, has a local audience heard the funeral music from "Goetterdammerung" played as it was given last night. It produced all the composer's ideas of grandeur, pomp and the glory of a hero. The enticing and sensuous beauty of the love death from "Tristan and Isolde" was also beautifully given, as was the "Siegfried Idyl."

Mr. Fiedler proved himself a veritable Titan, in directing the majestic excerpt from "Die Walkure." It was all gorgeous, awe-inspiring and wonderful, and words are foolish things in attempting to describe its majesty.

In the "Evening Star" number from "Tannheuser," Mr. Witherspoon practiced the art of repression until it became a fault. He was throaty and seemed to be suffering from cold, or what is more natural, the Lake Erie fog that seems to get into the throats of all singers who visit us in cold weather. He quite redeemed himself in the final number, however, and sang beautifully, with full warm tones the colossal "Wotan's Farewell."

Mrs. Hughes, under whose direction the local symphony concerts are given, announced last evening that she had added the Minneapolis orchestra for one evening to the list of concerts already announced. She has also booked Vladimir De Pachmann for a recital in Mar[illegible]

From Leader
Address Cleveland Ohio
Date FEB 1 - 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SETS NEW STANDARD

Superlatively Good Music Draws Enthusiastic Appreciation.

PACKS GRAYS' ARMORY

All-Wagner Program is Rendered With Exquisite Expression.

When the eighty and one wise men from Boston hugged great old Wagner to their bosoms last night at the Grays' armory there was not a seat in the venerable old hall vacant and indeed the audience was so great that it overflowed into the spaces to the rear of the last seats both on the main and on the balcony floors. It was the largest audience of the season and the enthusiasm it showed was proportionate to its numbers.

The orchestra, too, was of greater size than usual and the violins stretched clear across the front of the stage almost to the tumbling off places at each end. The bandsmen were all packed in so closely together that Director Max Fiedler found it difficult to edge his sideward way to the big stand where, when he did reach it, he was obliged to turn around and bow several times in acknowledgment of the noisy greeting the audience gave him.

The program, an all-Wagner one, was superlatively excellent. It was beyond the farthest traveling arrows of criticism. No better orchestra comes to this town than the Boston, and the Boston orchestra never did better playing than it did last night. Director Fiedler scorned his scores for most of the time and held his chin down on his chest, keeping his baton still and permitting his bandsmen to go their excellent way about as they listed. It is doubtful if any orchestra but the Boston could do this without getting into serious trouble.

The only criticism of the orchestra came from within its own ranks. In the "Lohengrin" prelude the violins scowled deeply when a far away train whistle was dissonant with their high ethereal harmonies in the first few bars. In the "Tristan and Isolde" selection the first gentleman of the cellos did not like the way in which the other cellists were proceeding and took advantage of his rests to expostulate with a patiently listening, white-haired cellist and to demonstrate certain things to him. These are but examples to show with what thoroughgoing earnestness and seriousness the Boston bandsmen take their work and explain in part why these same bandsmen produce the best music to be heard in this country.

The brass choir, in its delicacy and smoothness of tone, flexibility and fluency, set a new standard here for such instruments. The strings, as usual, and the woodwind performed to perfection. The whole orchestra was but little less than wonderful in its delicacy and finish of utterance, in its capabilities for tremendously resonant and powerful expression which never approached blatancy; for its perfect understanding of dynamics and for its rare ability to express just what a composer desires be expressed. So thoroughly did the audience appreciate its work that at the close of the first section of the program it brought the bandsmen to their feet by prolonged and loud applause.

Herbert Witherspoon, a high basso—if there be such a thing—was the soloist. With great gentleness of voice and manner he sang the Wolfram's Song to the Evening Star. Now and again he was heard in the "Die Walkuere" selection, but too often he could not bring his voice above that of the orchestra and when he did his intonation was generally poor or his voice reedy. He added little to the pleasure of the evening.

R. N. O'NEIL.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date FEB 1 - 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN A FLAWLESS CONCERT

Gives Wagner Program to Big Audience; Fiedler Strong Conductor

No greater treat has been given Cleveland lovers of great music in years than was afforded them Wednesday night by the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Grays' armory. It was by odds the best of the symphony series so far, and to surpass it, organizations yet to come will, to put it slangily, have to "go some."

It was a Wagner program, and such was the sympathy and understanding with which it was rendered that even those who profess to have small liking for the Bayreuth master's heavy works in concert became enthusiastic. As such a concert deserved, this one had an audience that taxed the capacity of the armory, and its appreciation was expressed often and vociferously.

Max Fiedler, conductor, gave a scholarly yet virile reading to each number. Fiedler is not a spectacular conductor; he makes his commanding personality felt nevertheless, in dynamic fashion.

Not a flaw can be picked in the performance of the immense body of musicians. Perfect harmony pre-

[132]

News
Indianapolis Ind
FEB 2 - 1912

GREAT AUDIENCE HEARS GREAT WAGNER CONCERT

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GETS BIG OVATION AT MURAT.

TRIUMPH FOR THE DIRECTOR

It was a great audience last night at the Murat theater that faced a great orchestra, the Boston Symphony, with Max Fiedler director, and heard a program of Wagner music. This was the third of the Ona B. Talbot series for the season and, attracted by the offering, people came from all over the state. The audience was representative and brilliant. There were the devotees of Wagner, admirers of orchestra and just plain lovers of music. It is a long time since a Wagner program has been given in this city, and never was there a more satisfying one.

The director, Max Fiedler, now completing his fourth season with the orchestra, is a man of tremendous force, enthusiasm, energy and intellect, combined with a love for his art. These qualities are so happily blended that the result is an interpretation of compositions, so unlike that usually given, that many of the best known numbers appeared in new guise.

Program Wonderfully Arranged.

The program was wonderfully arranged, beginning with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," with its beautiful melody of the "Prize Song" woven throughout. This was followed by the prelude to "Lohengrin." These were followed by the funeral music to "The Dusk of the Gods," very rarely heard, which was very solemn and very impressive.

Then came the most wonderful part of the evening, the prelude and "Love's Death," from "Tristan and Isolde." To the untrained musician this is usually so heavy, so unrelieved, that it is scorned, but Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra gave it so much grandeur and such a wealth of beauty that it was the favorite number of the program, so far as outward demonstration went, and the director was not only recalled four times by the applause, but finally the entire orchestra of eighty-four men stood to receive the tribute of hand clapping and shouts. It was a great triumph.

Second Ovation.

After a short intermission the orchestra began again with the prelude to "Parsifal," with its wonderful motifs, then the "Siegfried Idyl," a vertitable tone poem, charming with its melodic themes.

The final number was the overture to "Tannhauser." No other orchestra ever played it in the same way. It was the old composition, but it was so invested with the grace and beauty of its new treatment that it took on fresh meanings, and one person was heard to say that he had heard it so much he had hoped never to hear the work again, but that, as played by these men, he would like to hear it forever. There was a second ovation of long duration, and the entire orchestra stood with Mr. Fiedler while the applause and shouts continued.

Hearing the varied works of a master composer such as Wagner, on one program, is a special privilege, not only of pleasure, but of interest and profit. It gives opportunity to learn the composer by comparison. It was a concert in the musical life of Indianapolis and one that made a deep and lasting impression.

"Mr Fiedler is to close his work with the orchestra this season," said C. A. Ellis, the manager of the organization, and next season Dr. Karl Muck will return to us."

The organization left this morning at 9 o'clock for Detroit, and from there will return to New York. During the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays two concerts a week in Boston for three weeks of each month, and then spends the fourth week in giving concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, D. C. It is one of the greatest orchestras in the world.

At Hume-Mansur Garden.

After the concert a supper was given at the Hume-Mansur garden for Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler, who sat with Dr. and Mrs. H. O. Pantzer and Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Williams. C. A. Ellis, the manager, and Mr. Brennan, the assistant manager of the orchestra, were with Mrs. Talbot and a party of her friends.

The next concert of the series will be given February 28, by Jan Kubelik, the famous violinist, and the fifth and last will be given March 13 by Alessandro Bonci, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan opera, known as the king of bel canto.

...one of a more miscellaneous character, is doubtful.

Wagner himself protested against the giving of extracts from his operas or the playing in concert form his music, written with the distinct purpose of emphasizing the dramatic action of the opera. But notwithstanding this objection, there is another consideration sufficient to justify a conductor in playing this music on a distinctly concert program. Wagner's music is enjoyable in proportion as it is known and understood. Because of the difficulty in producing his music dramas they can only be heard in the great musical centers. To hear these great musical dramas without some previous knowledge of the music itself robs them of much of their interest. Therefore, though the program last night was somewhat trying, Toledo nevertheless owes to Mr. Fiedler a debt of gratitude for having placed this feast before us.

The program opened with the superb Mastersinger's Prelude. Perhaps nowhere else has Wagner so shown his mastery of composition and his power to combine instruments in the most effective way as in this prelude. The orchestra played it with all the nobility and perception expected from this superb body of musicians. This prelude, together with that of Lohengrin and Parsifal and the overture to Tannhauser, furnished fine examples of Wagner's tremendous musical genius. These four compositions differ greatly in their musical treatment. Each is full of nobility and each bears direct reference to the story of the opera which it precedes.

The program was arranged throughout to illustrate by contrast Wagner's skill in instrumentation and musical expression, which only a great orchestra of 80 to 100 players, under a competent conductor, can bring out.

The hearing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event of such importance that it is hoped that the splendid audience last night may serve as an encouragement to the management to bring this wonderful band to Toledo each year. S. E.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World
From News
Address
Date

From Star
Indianapolis Ind
Address
Date FEB 2 - 1912

Boston Orchestra Scores Triumph

Render Wagner Program Before Brilliant Audience at Murat Theater.

BY PAUL R. MARTIN.

One word only is needed to describe the Boston Symphony concert given at the Murat Theater last evening, and that word is "brilliant." It may be applied to the orchestra, to the program and to the audience. Never has Indianapolis turned out in finer style. The theater was filled and the popularity of Mrs. Ona B. Talbot's subscribed series was demonstrated by the large number of people who attended from distant points over the state.

Mrs. Talbot—she must be mentioned at this point—covered herself with glory. She has given Indianapolis a real feast of splendid music, and the present writer feels entirely justified in having predicted in the music department of The Star last Sunday, that last evening's concert would be by all means the biggest musical event of the season. He is sure now that he was absolutely correct in the statement, broad as it may have seemed at the time.

The Indianapolis public, which rallied to the support of this event in so generous a manner, is also deserving of its share of praise. C. A. Ellis, general manager of the orchestra, and who has been identified with it since its organization in 1889, was enthusiastic. During the intermission he remarked that it was one of the finest and most appreciative assemblies he had ever seen gathered to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Indianapolis," he continued, "has always had a splendid reputation as a music center, and I see that its interest has by no means diminished. I have always been glad to bring the orchestra here, but I never expected to have a reception as cordial as this."

The complete program rendered by the orchestra follows:

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "Parsifal."
Siegfried Idyl.
Overture to "Tannhauser."

It was a happy chance that gave Indianapolis a program consisting entirely of Wagnerian music. It was something unique in the history of music in this city, and the appeal it made was tremendous. One can hear a Wagnerian opera or a Wagnerian number on a mixed program and yet not grasp the immense mentality and genius of the composer. But to hear a whole program of Wagnerian music casts an entirely different light on the matter. It is then one begins to realize what it really means and what a wonderful part this great composer has played in the development of the world's music.

There is another element which must also be considered in discussing the success of this program. That is the fact that Max Fiedler is a Wagner enthusiast and a Wagner authority. He knows these huge scores to the smallest detail. Throughout his entire musical career—and it has been both long and honorable—he has made a special study of the master of Baireuth. The wealth of Wagnerian tradition, which he has at his finger tips, and which he draws upon frequently, is a practical assurance that the interpretation he gives of this music will reflect the thoughts, the ideas and ...

...shot one ... who ... it all and gave it as his offering to the world's art.

It is only natural then, that when Max Fiedler is conducting a Wagner concert, he is in his happiest mood. This was quite apparent last evening as he stood before his desk wielding the baton over his men, who answered him at every turn.

The program he arranged was selected from those works which are, perhaps, best known and most appreciated by American audiences. The preludes are comprehensive and the layman who makes no pretentions to being musical can not fail to enjoy them and to get from them a fairly adequate knowledge as to what Wagner is like.

The "Siegfried Idyl" might be considered a novelty, but it is such a valuable addition to a program of this kind that it would be more than a pity to think of omiting it. It probably meant more to the composer than anything else he ever wrote, and in it one may find the expression of his love and of the hidden phases of his unusual life. It is a marvelous composition and one which gives an orchestra the opportunity to display all its prowess. Throughout its rendition Mr. Fiedler seemed fairly to pull down melody out of the atmosphere. He was now largely eloquent and again delicately felicitous, while the orchestra sustained, swelled, diminished, the intense yet strangely eerie song of the music.

A remarkable thing about this organization is the ease with which it shifts from one mood to another seemingly without the slightest effort. It will begin a passage in pianissimo and work into a climactic fortissimo so gradually that one is carried along with its spirit without even realizing the force that is causing the change. It is like the sunrise of a summer morning with the light growing stronger and stronger until finally all nature is illuminated with a brilliant, golden blaze.

No better selection than the overture to "Tannhauser" could have been made as a closing number. Practically everybody knows this work and it is always a source of satisfaction to any audience to hear at least one number with which it is thoroughly familiar. It was rendered in a manner so masterful that it is small wonder that a storm of applause broke before the last notes had died away.

From Star
Toledo Ohio
Address
Feb. 3-1912
Date

Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Wagner program:
Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.
Prelude to Lohengrin.
Funeral music from Dusk of the Gods.
Prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde.
Prelude to Parsifal.
Siegfried Idyl.
Overture to Tannhauser.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Valentine last night attracted an audience which filled nearly every desirable seat.

The program was devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner. That this music was played with all the skill and intelligence for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is famed goes without saying. That it was enjoyed by the audience is likewise true. Whether it is possible, however, for a Toledo audience, unacquainted in the main with the Wagnerian music dramas, to derive the same satisfaction from a program exclusively devoted to the works of this master, as ...

The Boston Symphony Concert

The program given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and its eminent director, Max Feidler, at the Valentine, Friday evening, was entirely of Wagner's music.

Surely no one composer but Richard Wagner could hold the intense interest and awake such enthusiasm for an entire evening.

To thoroughly enjoy his music one must know something of the legends it portrays or at least be a thinker as well as a listener. It expresses the deepest emotion and represents earnest feeling more than action.

Mr. Feidler is one of the really great interpreters of Wagner. Feidler's orchestra is to be specially praised for its great climaxes gained by pure volume of tone and not by a great clash of brasses and the percussion instruments.

Mr. Feidler might have given us a soloist or at least an encore, but after all these very things would have spoiled the unity of a perfect Wagner evening. M.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau
Times
Toledo Ohio
FEB 3 - 1912

MAX FIEDLER AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARE GIVEN OVATION BY TOLEDO

Analysis of the enthusiasm displayed at the Valentine theater Friday niht shows it to have been composed of three parts.

First, there was the usual enthusiasm for the Boston orchestra. This is a feeling that in former years has shown itself among a select few who can tell mediocre playing from good playing, and whom the Boston band satisfies. The few are being added to year by year as musical culture grows in Toledo, until now there is a considerable number who can be depended on to support the best musical organizations.

Then there was the enthusiasm for Wagner, who appeals to the American temperament more than any other European composer with the possible exception of Tschaikowsky. A Wagner program is almost certain to draw a large audience; and having attended "Wagner matinees" of various brass bands, many people are following up that experience by "having a try at the symphony gag."

And last, the enthusiasm was in no small measure an appreciation of Max Fiedler. The director's quiet but forceful personality shows in the work of the orchestra, and America has learned to esteem him highly—so highly that efforts to depreciate him in favor of Mr. Stransky are meeting with laughter and ridicule. This was Mr. Fiedler's last concert in Toledo for perhaps many years, since he leaves for Germany at the end of this season. There were many whose applause came largely as a thank-offering to the director.

All this explains why the Valentine gallery was sold out early in the evening; why the balcony was filled; and why Mr. Fiedler was recalled to the podium time after time to respond to the plaudits of the multitude.

As for the concert, women said it was glorious, and men, more adept in expressing their emotions, swore. It was the usual Wagner concert program, twisted out of chronological order, but probably arranged after a purpose, tho it was not very evident. The program opened with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," with its march; passed to the Lohengrin prelude's sky-music, the Siegfried Funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung" and the wonderful prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." The second part consisted of the Parsifal prelude, the charming Siegfried idyl, and as a climax, the familiar "Tannhauser" overture. The orchestra played to the crowd's enthusiasm, and it was a wonderful evening. Moreover, the threat that the Boston band will cease to visit Toledo because of poor patronage received its quietus, which is a comforting thought.

A large number of people from surrounding cities came to Toledo for this concert.

[133]

From Journal
Detroit Mich
Address
FEB 5 - 1912
Date

Detroit Mu ic Lovers Given a Rare Treat

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Interpretation of Wagnerian Music.

For two hours Saturday evening 3,000 people from every circle of Detroit's society sat under the spell of compelling and satisfying mu ic, when the Boston Symphony orchestr under Max Fiedler, played a progra of seven Wagner numbers in Light Guard armory.

There are two ways of listen to the great master of Bayreuth rather, more strictly speaking, t are always to be found among auditors two classes of persons— musician, who listens with the of the technician and the "m lover" (an abused term, too o disapplied,) to whom the devel ment to themes, the tracing of tives, the scoring of moveme as such, are mysteries penetrable or at most but incident matters. Yet, at this day, each hear the same thing, and is satisfie Time was when this was not t case, when to the professional mu ician Wagner was the revolution the anarchist, the iconoclast, vi ing traditions alike of rule and s and as such was to be scorned, culed and condemned. But time was when the general public "unmusiced" but not the musical—condemned him. To he was a deliverer, opening to t new avenues to a promised l They cared not what shocks were methods to those then in vogue; t only know that he offered someth not only new and different, but finitely satisfying.

Of such latter class, unquestic ably, was the majority of Saturda evening's audience, and the thunder ous applause with which they greet ed each number, especially the clos ing "Tannehauser" overture, spok more in its intensity, even, than i its volume. For musician or "mus lover" the evening was a revel delight.

To discuss Wagner now wer gild refined gold or paint the but the superlative can hardl made too strong for Max F and his 80 musicians. Wagne Wagner, but the interpretatio him varies as the man who w the baton understands and pathizes with his score, and th able to reveal himself to his icians. It is this revelation of own personality as affected by music before him that impres one as Fiedler works with his His is no perfunctory beating o tempo, with here and there a n of warning or encouragement rather a leadership that emb the spirit of the score and projects it to the players that they may follow.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers f Nuremberg" opened the evening, and its lyric joyousness was exquisitely emphasized. Then followed the prelude to "Lohengrin," celestial music if ever man has written such. The almost ethereal quality of the op ning and the close of the composi on, the approach to and the recession from the intervening crescendo, was handled with beautiful delicacy. The funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," removed from its natural context, loses somewhat, as does all operatic music, but there is in it an appeal that at some point must meet with response in the soul of the hearer. The ecstatic "Liebestod" and the prelude of "Tristan and Isolde" closed the first portion of the program.

The prelude to "Parsifal," "A Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhauser" overture comprised the second portion. "Wonderful" is an impotent word because of its vagueness, but t clings inseparably to the music f "Parsifal." In the idyl, Wagner s pouring forth his pride and joy t the birth of a son in the autumn f his life, and the hopes natural to ny father, but seemingly more extravagant in the great composer han the ordinary mortal dare cherish.

Then came the overture, "Tannauser," the best known, probably, the Wagner compositions, with s stately opening of the pilgrims' horus and its thrilling, thunderous, ul-firing climax. Hardly had the mbones and trumpets blared the t great ringing chords were the ent up emotions of the audience urst forth into such waves of aplause that, though the program was nded, the director and his musians were held bowing half a dozen imes.

Max Fiedler comes to Detroit with he Boston Symphony yet once more, n April, before he quits America for is native Germany. R. F. H.

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Makes Musical History He

Musical history was made in troit, Saturday evening, when largest audience ever gathered i Light Guard armory for a mu event, greeted the Boston Symp orchestra. Not a single seat wa cant, extra chairs had been pro and standing room was at a prem The audience was an exceptiona brilliant one, and even the bare an uninviting background of the armor could not detract from the beauty o the women's gowns, the richness o furs and the general atmosphere of a smart social function.

The orchestra of 80 players, under the benign and fatherly Max Fiedler, played a remarkable program in a remarkable manner, and there was a genuine ovation for conductor and men at the intermission and again at the close of the program. Music-lovers have grown to expect perfection in orchestral playing from the Boston orchestra, and the time has yet to be recorded when expectation was not realized.

The program was devoted entirely to Wagner—the preludes to "Die Meistersingers," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," and "Parsifal;" funeral music from "Gotterdammerung;" overture to "Tannhauser" and the "Siegfried Idyll." Such a program was enough to send a Wagner enthusiast into the seventh heaven of delight, and, as a matter of record, it completely satisfied everyone in the great audience, Saturday evening, whether a Wagner devotee or not, judging from the discriminating appreciation and applause that followed the numbers. At the close of the concert, Mr. Fiedler told The Times that rarely during his stay in America had he met with a finer reception or sensed a keener appreciation on the part of an audience for the music he and his men were pre ing. Mr. Fiedler even had a kin word for the hall saying, "Nein, nein, it 'ees not so bad," when some one remarked on its shortcomings. Like many other conductors and artists who have visited Detroit, however, Mr. Fiedler declared that it was a great pity so beautiful a city as Detroit should be without an adequate music hall, especially when the city is able to muster so large and fashionable and musical an audience as filled the armory Saturday evening.

According to a number of the older musicians of the city exchanging reminiscences as the audience departed, not within memory of the most inveterate concert-goer has so wonderful an evening of orchestral music been heard in Detroit. All-Wagner programs have been given before but not as the Boston Symphony plays the great music-drama scores of the German iconoclast. The beauty of tone, the exquisite quality of the various choirs, the precision and finish of the playing of this orchestra makes it unique and alone in the orchestral world, the numbers selected by Mr. Fiedler made demands upon every resource of the organization, and so the listener had opportunity to hear the orchestra at its greatest and best.

It is matter for congratulation that Detroit will have a second visit from the Boston orchestra this season, Saturday evening, April 13, which will be, unfortunately, Mr. Fiedler's last visit to this city for an indeterminate time, as he returns to Germany, in time, to resume his post as one of Kaiser Wilhelm's own conductors, his leave of absence to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony having expired.

The next concert in the Detroit Orchestral association series will be given by the New York Symphony orchestra, with Conductor Walter Damrosch, Saturday evening, Feb. 17.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in Boston
Union-Star
Schenectady N
FEB 6 - 1912

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the musicians of Schenectady it is acknowledged that no musical program that can be presented in this city this entire season will equal the feast that was provided by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its initial appearance here at the Armory last evening. It was brilliant, satisfying and varied enough to suit the most exacting. Every number was a musical treat and comparisons are almost useless, for the marvelous work of this orchestra and the faultless playing of the pianoforte by Mme. Samaroff-Stokowski was on a plane above the possibilities of criticism.

Of the orchestra one can say that the pre-eminent position which it holds is due to its conductors, and Max Fielder, to whose baton they responded last night, was just as magnetic and commanding as could be pictured in the rosiest dreams of the lover of the best in music. He lacks absolutely nothing in temperament and the dramatic fire and intensity which he throws into his interpretations combined with the exquisite tone quality of the orchestra creates for it a distinction which is shared by no other organization.

The program last night consisted of Beethoven's great overture, "Leonora," a concerto in A minor by Grieg for piano and orchestra, and four Wagnerian numbers, the preludes to "The Mastersinger," "Lohengrin" and "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture from "Tannhauser," each one of which will never be forgotten by the audience of last night.

Mme. Samaroff-Stowkowski gave the audience a decided thrill, her work electrifying them in the Grieg concerto. Beautiful to look upon, her magnificent presence in no way detracts from her complete artistry, and all who heard her would hail with delight the possibility of hearing her once more. Her work was possibly the most finished ever heard on the piano in this city. In the forte passages she showed the strength of a man and in the delicate passages her work was as limpid as purling water. At the conclusion of this number she was given an ovation. Still it was in this number that Mr. Fielder showed the complete mastery over his ensemble for it mattered not whether the passage was forte or the most delicate pianissimo it was apparent that the concerto was written for both the piano and orchestra.

The orchestra numbers about 80 men and nothing was lacking in any detail to make the concert one of perfect enjoyment. Too much credit can not be given Ben Franklin and the men of Company E for making it possible to enjoy so rare a treat. That their work was appreciated was attested by the great audience, numbering over 2,000, that turned out to hear this wonderful concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in Boston
JOURNAL
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date FEB 4 - 1912

THE postponement of the Arion Club rendition of Elgar's "Apostles," originally set for next Wednesday evening, leaves the week without important concerts, the next event being the Boston Symphony concert on Feb. 13. The postponement of the "Apostles" is the result of an unexpected delay in securing some of the orchestral parts from London, where they are held by a rule of the publishers. Dr. Jordan completed arrangements last week, however, for the performance on March 26, when the same soloists announced for next week will be available. The club will devote a few more rehearsals to the "Apostles" and then take up the work for the following concert.

* * *

For the next Symphony concert, at the request of patrons, Conductor Fiedler has put on the programme Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which was last played here almost exactly four years ago, when Dr Muck was conductor. The "Pathetic" symphony is a work that appeals, particularly to the genius of Mr. Fiedler, and with it he has enjoyed brilliant success as an interpreter. Katharine Goodson, the soloist, will play the Pianoforte Concerto by Grieg. The other numbers will comprise Weber's "Oberon" overture and the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 4 1912
Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Concert with Katharine Goodson.

The fourth local Boston Symphony concert, and the last but one of the series of the present season, will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 13. The soloist will be Katharine Goodson, the justly admired English pianist who is now making her third tour of America.

At the request of many patrons of these concerts Mr. Fiedler has put on the programme Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, which was last played here almost exactly four years ago, when Dr. Muck was conductor. The "Pathetic" Symphony is a work that appeals particularly to the genius of Mr. Fiedler and it is with the "Pathetic" that he has enjoyed the most brilliant success as an interpreter. As Mr. Fiedler leaves America at the end of the current season, his many admirers in Providence will only have this concert and the one in April to hear the orchestra under him.

Miss Goodson will play the ever-welcome Pianoforte Concerto by Grieg. The other numbers will comprise Weber's "Oberon" Overture and the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

[134]

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 4 - 1912

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his debut as a soloist in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston Symphony concert here in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19. Mr. Witek has been heard often in the last two seasons in incidental solos in various works that have been presented. He is a worthy success to the great musicians that have preceded him in the post of concertmaster in this orchestra. His success in Boston and New York has been most remarkable. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 4.

* * *

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 4 - 1912

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his debut as a soloist in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston Symphony concert here in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19. Mr. Witek has been heard often in the last two seasons in incidental solos in various works that have been presented. He is a worthy successor to the great musicians that have preceded him in the post of concert master in this orchestra. His success in Boston and New York has been most remarkable. Here he will play the B ahms concerto. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 4.

* * *

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his debut as a soloist in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston symphony concert here in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, February 19. Mr. Witek has been heard often in the last two seasons in incidental solos in various works that have been presented. He is a worthy successor to the great musicians that have preceded him in the post of concert master in this orchestra. His success in Boston and New York has been most remarkable. Here he will play the Brahms' Concerto. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 4.

From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date FEB 4 - 1912

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his debut as a soloist in Philadelphia at the fourth Boston Symphony Concert here in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19. Witek has been heard often in the last two seasons in incidental solos in various works that have been presented. He is a worthy successor to the great musicians that have preceded him in the post of concert master in this orchestra. His success in Boston and New York has been most remarkable. Here he will play the Brahms concerto. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 4.

From EVENING BULLETIN,
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date FEB 3 - 1912 FEB 3 - 1912

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony is to take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19, when Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, will make his debut as a soloist in Philadelphia. The symphony of the program will be Beethoven's No. 4.

From EVENING NEWS.
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

Tschaikowsky Concert By Bostom Symphony

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, February 21, will be devoted to the works of the greatest of Russian composers, Tschaikowsky.

Last season Max Fiedler, conductor, gave one "one-man" program, devoting an entire concert to Wagner, and it was one of the most successful that the Orchestra has ever given in this city. The program will comprise four numbers—the "Elegie" from the "Serenade," Op., 48; the "Pathetic" symphony; the "Nutcracker" suite, which has already been played here by Mr. Fiedler, and finally the "1812" overture.

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 3 1912

TSCHAIKOWSKY PROGRAM

Fourth Concert Of Boston Orchestra At Lyric February 21.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, February 21, will be devoted entirely to the works of the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky.

Last season Max Fiedler gave one "one man's" program, devoting an entire concert to Wagner, and it was one of the most successful that the orchestra has ever given in this city. The program will comprise four numbers—the Elegie from the Serenade, op. 48; the "Pathetic" symphony, the charming "Nutcracker" suite, which has already been played here by Mr. Fiedler, and finally the "1812" overture.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in concert in New York this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carngeie Hall on Thursday, Feb. 22. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser" and a group of four songs. At the matinée two days later, the soloist will be the justly admired 'cellist of the Boston orchestra and formerly also of the Kneisel Quartet, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From

Address

Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 22. At the following Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhäuser," and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York on February 22 and 24.

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 3 1912

Geraldine Farrar ist die Solistin in dem am Abend des 22. Februar in Carnegie Hall stattfindenden Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, was zugleich das einzige Konzert-Auftreten der populären Sängerin in dieser Saison bedeutet. Die Künstlerin wird das „Gebet" der Elisabeth aus „Tannhäuser" und vier Lieder singen. Der bekannte Cellist des Orchesters, Herr Alwin Schroeder, spielt im Matinee-Konzert vom 24. Februar als Solist Tschaikowsky's „Variationen über ein Rokoko-Thema".

From PRESS

Address New York

Date FEB 4 1912

Farrar to Appear in Concert.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the justly admired principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser," and a group of four songs. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococco Theme.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date FEB 4 1912

Miss Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser" and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococco Theme.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 4 - 1912

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, Feb. 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser" and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing "Elizabeth's Prayer from Tannhaeuser" and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. 1912

Date

The entertainment of the Girls' Branch of the Public Schools Athletic League to be given at the Waldorf-Astoria, Manhattan, on Feb. 23, promises to be a great success not only financially, but from an artistic and social standpoint. It is not necessary to say anything about the music, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra needs no introduction, and the dances will be some of the best and most popular of the real folk dances of Europe, which all nations are now trying to preserve as a part of the traditions and customs of the people.

******

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y

Date FEB 3 1912

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the young American violinist of much talent and charm, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 23. She will play Saint Saens' Concerto in B minor. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D minor.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date FEB 4 1912

Miss Farrar to Sing in Concert.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play, owing to illness.

Choir and Thomas Orchestra
6 Waltz ..... Stock
Thomas Orchestra
Folk-Song, arranged by ..... Bantock
Nonino," double chorus ..... Brockway de, "Awake," and Choral Final from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Mendelssohn Choir and Thomas Orchestra

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date FEB 4 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Good Friday Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last season, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhäuser," and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

HERALD,

FEBRUARY 4, 1912.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. There will be no soloist. The program comprises Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummernight's Dream"; Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat, No. 4; Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd" and the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Noremberg" by Wagner. "Ormazd," composed last summer, had its first performance in St. Louis Jan. 26 and 27. It will be played here at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, consequently the performance in Cambridge will be the first performance as far as Boston is concerned.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY 4. 1912.

Converse's "Ormazd" This Week at Symphony Concerts

Musical interest in this week's Symphony concerts will center in the performance for the first time in Boston of the latest work of Frederick S. Converse, a symphonic poem for full orchestra, entitled "Ormazd." Mr Converse started this last Spring and did the major part of the work on it last Summer, but the orchestration was finished only a month or so ago. It is still in manuscript, and had its first performance anywhere in St Louis week before last, where it was played by the St Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Max Zach.

This is the first orchestral work that Mr Converse has done in several years, his last having been the dramatic scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc," played by Dr Muck in 1908. This new symphonic poem is based on the Persian legend of Ormazd, the God of Light, and has to do with the conflict of Good and Evil, and the final triumph of Good.

The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, who shares with Mr Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr Warnke will play Lalo's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, next Thursday evening. There will be no soloist. The program comprises Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 5, 1912

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Visit of the Mendelssohn Choir

DETAILED announcement of the concert of the Mendelssohn Choir and the Chicago Orchestra in Boston is now possible. It is appointed for the evening of Thursday, Feb. 29, at Symphony Hall, and the prices of seats will range from $1 for the whole second balcony and many other places to $1.50 and $2. The Choir, the most remarkable body of its kind in America and comparable with the best of the choruses of England, will come in its full strength of 225 singers from Toronto under its own conductor, Mr. Vogt. The Thomas Orchestra will come from Chicago in sufficient numbers for the chosen pieces and Mr. Stock will conduct as he did in its concert in December when it stirred the admiration of the town. It was cause for regret then that the conductor and the band played no music of Wagner. When they come with the Mendelssohn Choir they will play such pieces and also a "symphonic waltz" of Mr. Stock's own composing. The choral numbers on the programme range widely and ought to disclose very fully the qualities that have made the Mendelssohn Choir unequalled in America in its kind. A motet by Lotti and the Sanctus from Bach's mass in B minor represent the older choral music; a fragment from Berlioz's "Te Deum" and another from Verdi's Requiem Mass suffice for choral music in quasi-romantic and quasi-ecclesiastical vein; while excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" will prove the abilities of the choir in massive choral singing in operatic fashion. There are folk-pieces and sugary Gounod besides. Number by number, the programme is:

Overture, "Liebesfrühling" ..... Georg Schumann
Thomas Orchestra
Motet, "Crucifixus" ..... Lotti
Motet, Psalm 137 ..... Gounod
Mendelssohn Choir
"Judex Crederis," from "Te Deum" ..... Berlioz
[illegible]
(Arranged for concert performance by Theodore Thomas)
Bacchanale, from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Thomas Orchestra
"Sanctus," from Mass in B Minor ..... Bach
Mendelssohn Choir and Thomas Orchestra
"Ave Maris Stella" ..... Grieg
"Libera Me," from the Manzoni Requiem Mass ..... Verdi
Miss Hinkle

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 3, 1912

Mr. Converse's New Tone-Poem in Boston and Cambridge—A Recital by Mr. Slezak, the Operatic Tenor—Miss Scotney and Mr. Copeland for the Hersey Charities—Miss Ormond's Final Recital—Other Concerts—The Lectures on Opera

THE new tone-poem by Mr. Converse, to be played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday, and in Cambridge on Thursday, and the coming of an eminent operatic tenor, M. Slezak as a singer of songs, are the conspicuous items in the announcements of concerts next week. Mr. Converse's "Ormazd" is his first symphonic music in some years, and for the first time on Saturday afternoon in Jordan Hall Mr. Slezak will appear in Boston in a song recital. For the rest, Miss Ormond will take leave of her public here in a song recital at Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon; Miss Scotney, the coloratura singer, and Mr. Copeland, the pianist, will appear in a joint concert there on Thursday afternoon; the Apollo Club sings also at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, and Mr. Hawthorne, the pianist, announces a recital for Tuesday afternoon in Steinert Hall.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

AT last Mr. Converse is writing again the symphonic music in which he has, thus far, won most distinction. For some months past he put aside his preoccupations with opera and opera houses and worked steadily at a new tone-poem, "Ormazd." He finished it, and the first performances befell rather obscurely a week ago at the concerts of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. Hereabouts the music will be played for the first time at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening and repeated at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. In spite of the title Mr. Converse has not written Oriental music. Instead, he has let Ormazd, who represents light and beneficence in the religion of Zoroaster, do musical battle with the deity of darkness and evil. The struggle invites to musical exposition and eloquence and Mr. Converse has written in "cyclic" form for full modern orchestra. Next Wednesday a detailed account of the tone-poem will appear in this place. Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor—the symphony with the scherzo pizzicato—and Lalo's concerto for violoncello, with Mr. Warnke to play the solo part, will precede Mr. Converse's piece at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler is usually sympathetic and eloquent was Tschaikowsky's music, and as a 'cellist of expert skill and happy feeling for tone and instrument Mr. Warnke, who has sat long in the orchestra, needs no heralding.

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

MR. CONVERSE'S new tone-poem, as already noted, will make the chief item in the programme for the fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Harvard next Thursday evening. The other pieces will be Beethoven's symphony in B-flat, the fourth; Mendelssohn's overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the prelude to Wagner's operatic comedy, "Die Meistersinger." Except the symphony, none of these pieces has been played recently at the regular concerts in Boston.

TRAVELER, FEBRUARY 3, 1912.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the Symphony orchestra, will be soloist at next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, playing Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, in D minor. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor, always a favorite with the Symphony public particularly because of the pizzicato scherzo which it contains.

Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd," will be played for the first time in Boston at next week's concert. For this work Mr. Converse has drawn his inspiration from the legend of Ormasd, the god of light, as recorded in the Zend Avesta. The work is based on the struggle between the god of light and the god of darkness and the ultimate triumph, when the world shall end, of goodness and beauty. The symphonic poem is in modern vein and there is a cyclet of the themes. Its opus number is 30.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE.

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, Feb. 8. There will be no soloist. The programme comprises Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat, No. 4; Frederick S. Converse's Symphonic Poem, "Ormazd," and the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

"Ormazd" is the most recent work from the fertile pen of Dr. Converse. It had its first performance in St. Louis the week before last, and is to be played at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, consequently the performance in Cambridge will be the first performance so far as Boston is concerned.

The third and last concert of the Longy Club is set for Monday evening, Feb. 12, in Jordan Hall. The programme comprises D'Indy's "Chanson et Danses," opus 50, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and two bassoons; Enesco's "Second Sonata for Violin and Piano," by Messrs. S. Noack and A. de Voto, and Raff's "Sinfonietta," opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

From EVENING SUN
Baltimore, Md.
Address
Date FEB 3 1912

TSCHAIKOWSKY PROGRAM

Fourth Concert Of Boston Orchestra At Lyric February 21.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, February 21, will be devoted entirely to the works of the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky.

Last season Max Fiedler gave one "one man's" program, devoting an entire concert to Wagner, and it was one of the most successful that the orchestra has ever given in this city. The program will comprise four numbers—the Elegie from the Serenade, op. 48; the "Pathetic" symphony, the charming "Nutcracker" suite, which has already been played here by Mr. Fiedler, and finally the "1812" overture.

From EVENING SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in concert in New York this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carngeie Hall on Thursday, Feb. 22. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser" and a group of four songs. At the matinée two days later, the soloist will be the justly admired 'cellist of the Boston orchestra and formerly also of the Kneisel Quartet, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From
Address
Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 22. At the following Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elisabeth's prayer, from "Tannhäuser," and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From EVE. JOURNAL
New York City.
Address
Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the first of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York on February 22 and 24.

From STAATSZEITUNG,
New York City. FEB 3 1912
Address
Date

Geraldine Farrar ist die Solistin in dem am Abend des 22. Februar in Carnegie Hall stattfindenden Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, was zugleich das einzige Konzert-Auftreten der populären Sängerin in dieser Saison bedeutet. Die Künstlerin wird das „Gebet" der Elisabeth aus „Tannhäuser" und vier Lieder singen. Der bekannte Cellist des Orchesters, Herr Alwin Schroeder, spielt im Matinee-Konzert vom 24. Februar als Solist Tschaikowsky's „Variationen über ein Rokoko-Thema".

From PRESS
New York
Address
Date FEB 4 1912

Farrar to Appear in Concert.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the justly admired principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser," and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococco Theme.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York
Address
FEB 4 1912
Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser" and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococco Theme.

From TIMES,
New York City.
Address
FEB 4 - 1912
Date

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, Feb. 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser" and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From AMERICAN
New York
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing "Elizabeth's Prayer from Tannhaeuser" and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme."

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 4 1912
Address
Date

The entertainment of the Girls' Branch of the Public Schools Athletic League to be given at the Waldorf-Astoria, Manhattan, on Feb. 23, promises to be a great success not only financially, but from an artistic and social standpoint. It is not necessary to say anything about the music, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra needs no introduction, and the dances will be some of the best and most popular of the real folk dances of Europe, which all nations are now trying to preserve as a part of the traditions and customs of the people.

******

From Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date FEB 3 1912

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the young American violinist of much talent and charm, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 23. She will play Saint Saens' Concerto in B minor. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D minor.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York
Address
FEB 4 1912
Date

Miss Farrar to Sing in Concert.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last year, but was unable to play, owing to illness.

From TRIBUNE
New York
Address
Date FEB 4 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Geraldine Farrar's only appearance in New York in concert this season will be at the next evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, Thursday, February 22. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, Alwin Schroeder, who was announced for an appearance last season, but was unable to play owing to illness. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhäuser," and a group of four songs. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

HERALD,
FEBRUARY 4, 1912.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. There will be no soloist. The program comprises Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummernight's Dream"; Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat, No. 4; Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd" and the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Noremberg" by Wagner. "Ormazd," composed last summer, had its first performance in St. Louis Jan. 26 and 27. It will be played here at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, consequently the performance in Cambridge will be the first performance as far as Boston is concerned.

GLOBE-
FEBRUARY 4. 1912.

Converse's "Ormazd" This Week at Symphony Concerts

Musical interest in this week's Symphony concerts will center in the performance for the first time in Boston of the latest work of Frederick S. Converse, a symphonic poem for full orchestra, entitled "Ormazd." Mr Converse started this last Spring and did the major part of the work on it last Summer, but the orchestration was finished only a month or so ago. It is still in manuscript, and had its first performance anywhere in St Louis week before last, where it was played by the St Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Max Zach.

This is the first orchestral work that Mr Converse has done in several years, his last having been the dramatic scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc," played by Dr Muck in 1908. This new symphonic poem is based on the Persian legend of Ormazd, the God of Light, and has to do with the conflict of Good and Evil, and the final triumph of Good.

The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, who shares with Mr Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr Warnke will play Lalo's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, next Thursday evening. There will be no soloist. The program comprises Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," and the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 5, 1912

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Visit of the Mendelssohn Choir

DETAILED announcement of the concert of the Mendelssohn Choir and the Chicago Orchestra in Boston is now possible. It is appointed for the evening of Thursday, Feb. 29, at Symphony Hall, and the prices of seats will range from $1 for the whole second balcony and many other places to $1.50 and $2. The Choir, the most remarkable body of its kind in America and comparable with the best of the choruses of England, will come in its full strength of 225 singers from Toronto under its own conductor, Mr. Vogt. The Thomas Orchestra will come from Chicago in sufficient numbers for the chosen pieces and Mr. Stock will conduct as he did in its concert in December when it stirred the admiration of the town. It was cause for regret then that the conductor and the band played no music of Wagner. When they come with the Mendelssohn Choir they will play such pieces and also a "symphonic waltz" of Mr. Stock's own composing. The choral numbers on the programme range widely and ought to disclose very fully the qualities that have made the Mendelssohn Choir unequalled in America in its kind. A motet by Lotti and the Sanctus from Bach's mass in B minor represent the older choral music; a fragment from Berlioz's "Te Deum" and another from Verdi's Requiem Mass suffice for choral music in quasi-romantic and quasi-ecclesiastical vein; while excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" will prove the abilities of the choir in massive choral singing in operatic fashion. There are folk-pieces and sugary Gounod besides. Number by number, the programme is:

Overture, "Liebesfrühling".....Georg Schumann
Thomas Orchestra
Motet, "Crucifixus".....Lotti
Motet, Psalm 137.....Gounod
Mendelssohn Choir
"Judex Crederis," from "Te Deum".....Berlioz
.....
(Arranged for concert performance by Theodore Thomas)
Bacchanale, from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Thomas Orchestra
"Sanctus," from Mass in B M[illegible].....Bach
Mendelssohn Choir and Thomas Orchestra
"Ave Maris Stella".....Grieg
"Libera Me," from the Manzoni Requiem Mass.....Verdi
Miss Hinkle

Choir and Thomas Orchestra
[illegible] Waltz.....Stock
Thomas Orchestra
Folk-Song, arranged by.....Bantock
Nonino," double chorus.....Brockway
[illegible], "Awake," and Choral Final from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Mendelssohn Choir and Thomas Orchestra

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 3, 1912

Mr. Converse's New Tone-Poem in Boston and Cambridge—A Recital by Mr. Slezak, the Operatic Tenor—Miss Scotney and Mr. Copeland for the Hersey Charities—Miss Ormond's Final Recital—Other Concerts—The Lectures on Opera

THE new tone-poem by Mr. Converse, to be played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday, and in Cambridge on Thursday, and the coming of an eminent operatic tenor, M. Slezak as a singer of songs, are the conspicuous items in the announcements of concerts next week. Mr. Converse's "Ormazd" is his first symphonic music in some years, and for the first time on Saturday afternoon in Jordan Hall Mr. Slezak will appear in Boston in a song recital. For the rest, Miss Ormond will take leave of her public here in a song recital at Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon; Miss Scotney, the coloratura singer, and Mr. Copeland, the pianist, will appear in a joint concert there on Thursday afternoon; the Apollo Club sings also at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, and Mr. Hawthorne, the pianist, announces a recital for Tuesday afternoon in Steinert Hall.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

AT last Mr. Converse is writing again the symphonic music in which he has, thus far, won most distinction. For some months past he put aside his preoccupations with opera and opera houses and worked steadily at a new tone-poem, "Ormazd." He finished it, and the first performances befell rather obscurely a week ago at the concerts of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. Hereabouts the music will be played for the first time at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening and repeated at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. In spite of the title Mr. Converse has not written Oriental music. Instead, he has let Ormazd, who represents light and beneficence in the religion of Zoroaster, do musical battle with the deity of darkness and evil. The struggle invites to musical exposition and eloquence and Mr. Converse has written in "cyclic" form for full modern orchestra. Next Wednesday a detailed account of the tone-poem will appear in this place. Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor—the symphony with the scherzo pizzicato—and Lalo's concerto for violoncello, with Mr. Warnke to play the solo part, will precede Mr. Converse's piece at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler is usually sympathetic and eloquent was Tschaikowsky's music, and as a 'cellist of expert skill and happy feeling for tone and instrument Mr. Warnke, who has sat long in the orchestra, needs no heralding.

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

MR. CONVERSE'S new tone-poem, as already noted, will make the chief item in the programme for the fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Harvard next Thursday evening. The other pieces will be Beethoven's symphony in B-flat, the fourth; Mendelssohn's overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the prelude to Wagner's operatic comedy, "Die Meistersinger." Except the symphony, none of these pieces has been played recently at the regular concerts in Boston.

TRAVELER,
FEBRUARY 3, 1912.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the Symphony orchestra, will be soloist at next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, playing Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, in D minor. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor, always a favorite with the Symphony public particularly because of the pizzicato scherzo which it contains.

Converse's symphonic poem "Ormazd," will be played for the first time in Boston at next week's concert. For this work Mr. Converse has drawn his inspiration from the legend of Ormasd, the god of light, as recorded in the Zend Avesta. The work is based on the struggle between the god of light and the god of darkness and the ultimate triumph, when the world shall end, of goodness and beauty. The symphonic poem is in modern vein and there is a cyclet of the themes. Its opus number is 30.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE.

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, Feb. 8. There will be no soloist. The programme comprises Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat, No. 4; Frederick S. Converse's Symphonic Poem, "Ormazd," and the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

"Ormazd" is the most recent work from the fertile pen of Dr. Converse. It had its first performance in St. Louis the week before last, and is to be played at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, consequently the performance in Cambridge will be the first performance so far as Boston is concerned.

The third and last concert of the Longy Club is set for Monday evening, Feb. 12, in Jordan Hall. The programme comprises D'Indy's "Chanson et Danses," opus 50, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and two bassoons; Enesco's "Second Sonata for Violin and Piano," by Messrs. S. Noack and A. de Voto, and Raff's "Sinfonietta," opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

[135]

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 7, 1912

MR. CONVERSE'S NEW PIECE

HIS RETURN IN IT TO SYMPHONIC MUSIC

The Tone-Poem, "Ormazd," to Be Played at the Next Symphony Concerts—The Persian Legend and Philosophy That Suggested It—The Course and the Substance of the Music—The Thematic Design and the Orchestral Means

FOR the first time since 1904, when he finished "The Mystic Trumpeter," one of the indubitable landmarks in American orchestral achievement, Mr. Converse has turned again to the orchestra without the adjuncts of voices, dramatic setting or action, and to the tone-poem as a medium of expression. "Ormazd," which was conceived and sketched last summer, and finished within a few months, has already had its initial production under Mr. Max Zach at the St. Louis Symphony Concerts of Jan. 26 and 27. While the subject of this work, the conflict between "Ormazd" and "Ahriman," the chief deities in Persian mythology, has already been announced in these columns, the nature of the tenets of Zoroaster and the poetic vitality of his philosophy is perhaps sufficiently remote from the average concert-goer to justify some exposition of their character by way of preliminary for the performances of this tone-poem at Cambridge on Thursday, and at the regular Symphony Concerts of this week.

Mr. Converse was incited to the composition of this piece by the graphic and dramatic presentation of the conceptions of Zoroaster in James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions," a book which has passed through some thirty editions since its appearance in the early seventies. These impressions were heightened by a perusal of an elaboration of this philosophy in a later Persian sacred book, the Bundehesch. Some hint of the mystic quality of this mythology may be gained by a quotation from a summary by Mr. Clarke of the Parsi version as given in the Bundehesch.

"In the beginning, the Eternal or Absolute Being produced two other great divine beings. The first, who remained true to him was Ahura-Mazda (Ormazd) King of Light. The other was Angra-Mainyus (Ahriman) King of Darkness. Ormazd found himself in a world of light; Ahriman in boundless darkness, and the two became antagonists.

"The Infinite Being now determined, in order to destroy the evil which Ahriman had caused, to create the visible world by Ormazd — Ormazd began the creation by bringing forth the Fravashis. Everything which has been created, or which is to be created has its Fravashi, which contains the reason or basis of its existence. In creating the material world, which was in reality only an incorporation of the spiritual world of Fravashis, Ormazd first created the vault of heaven and the earth on which it rests. On the earth, he created the high mountain Albordj, which soared upward through all the spheres of heaven, till it reached the primal light, and Ormazd made this summit his abode. From this summit the bridge Chinevat stretches to the vault of heaven, and to Gorodman, which is the opening in the vault above Albordj. Gorodman is the dwelling of the Fravashis and of the blessed, and the bridge leading to it is precisely above the abyss Duzahk—th[illegible]gulf, the home of Ahriman [illegible]."

The summary [illegible] detail the creation of [illegible] moon, planets and stars [illegible] his captains and soldiers [illegible] he contains and soldie[illegible] in his [illegible]sponding prepa[illegible] It retinent for supre[illegible]y tle between the st[illegible] ntinues Ormazd a[illegible] as to [illegible] the fr[illegible] growth [illegible]man [illegible] resurand t[illegible] f Ahrimanis p[illegible] interesting [illegible] played, but [illegible] to many of [illegible]sm. But the [illegible]lot the plan of [illegible]nve[illegible]" More- ove[illegible] Percy [illegible]mbodied in pro[illegible]rfling imagery such extr[illegible] from t[illegible]ch as formed the [illegible] of [illegible]'s 'Ormazd." [illegible]trinsic [illegible] because of its ul[illegible]iveness [illegible] poem deserves its [illegible] [illegible]duction to the mod[illegible] Mr. C[illegible]ne-poem. O[illegible]ar mount[illegible]bordj, in the realm of prin[illegible]t is [illegible] Ormazd.

Beyond the sphe[illegible] o[illegible]igh heaven he created his [illegible] hos[illegible]un, his giant runner [illegible] reve[illegible]loon, who girdles the ea[illegible]rt[illegible]ds splendid captains. S[illegible]as [illegible]n a titan's head were t[illegible]mb[illegible] the ramparts of Or- n[illegible]eve[illegible]olendid captains. Beheaven he marshalled [illegible]sp[illegible]o.

[illegible] realm of [illegible]nan the dwelling of the b[illegible]d Fra[illegible]shi th[illegible]cl[illegible]eling of worlds in their [illegible]eres was like to immortal music.

Below the bright bridge Chinavat, in the bowels of darkness, is the abodes of Ahriman.

Deep in the abysmal Duzahk he created his terrible numbers—for every creature of light a Dalva of gloom. Like the death-pang of the primal Bull was the moaning of Ahriman—his loathing for Ormazd.

Twice on huge wings, above abysmal Duzahk, he fluttered up towards Albordj; twice he fell back.

Beyond his bleak pit of doom beautiful rose the peak of Albordj; in the bowels of darkness, like fire were the dreams of the damned.

A third time, then, Ahriman uprose; around him he marshalled his hordes—cold stars and wandering comets, the kings of chaos. Glittered against them the ranks of Ormazd. Dazzling and dark was the conflict.

For ninety nights the smoke of stars obscured them; till back into abysmal Duzahk fell Ahriman defeated. Golden then, was the laughter of Ormads. Like laughter, the gold haired Planets rattled their shields.

In the realm of Gorodman, the dwelling of the blessed Fravashis, the circling of worlds in their spheres was like to immortal music.

With the foregoing extract as a basis, it will be easy to imagine the dramatic action which underlies the tone-poem—the marshalling of the forces of "Ormazd," the passing to battle, the conflict between Ormazd and Ahriman and their respective soldiers, ending in the overthrow of Ahriman, and the rejoicing of the holy Fravashis at the triumph of light (or the powers of goodness) against darkness and evil. This conflict, whether viewed from the standpoint of Persian mythology or that of today, has not only poetic imagery, but an intensely human and ever-present vitality. Once for all be it said that Mr. Converse has not attempted to write "Persian music," nor has he even suggested "local color" of any sort. He was concerned wholly with the poetic and dramatic outlines of the mythological conflict, and he has relied upon his own musical idiom to intensify the stirrings of his imagination upon a subject which is, after all, cosmic.

As for the musical analysis of "Ormazd," the work begins with a short sombre introduction of a few measures. Then follows a suggestion of the gathering of the forces of light. Beginning with faint and distant trumpetlike calls, there is a progress of impetus and sonority, constantly gaining in accent and brilliance up to a marchlike episode of martial splendor. Gradually the procession of Ormazd's forces passes into the distance, ending with a resumption of the distant trumpet calls in a passage of imaginative poetry. Then the Fravashis of holy men sing praises of Ormazd in chants of romantic uplift. Their rejoicings are interrupted by turbid and gloomy lamentations of Ahriman and his forces from the pit Duzahk. Their swelling wrath and envy is broken in upon by a poignant episode expressive of the memories of past happiness. Intermingled with the ferment of evil emotion is interwoven a motive descriptive of Ahriman's destructive unrest and "pernicious activity" which gains in malign power. Then follows the tension and grip of battle between the forces of Ormazd and Ahriman, but the composer has wished to portray spiritual rather than material conflict. The motives of Ormazd's forces gradually secure the ascendancy, and in an expansively powerful climax is pictured the defeat of Ahriman and his legions and their fall into the abyss Duzahk. The episode of the lofty praises of the blessed Fravashis returns, bringing the work to an elevated and mystical conclusion.

The motives most in evidence are: First, the distant trumpet calls; the martial theme of the forces of Ormazd; the lyrical episode of the Fravashis; the surging phrase of the envy and hatred of the followers of Ahriman; a short passage typifying "happy memories of the past," and the militant figure descriptive of the "pernicious activity" of Ahriman.

The orchestral requirements are those normal to the purposes of the modern tone-poem. If Mr. Converse has used six horns (in place of his accustomed four) it is because the scope of his theme justifies it. So also the use of the glockenspiel, celesta, piano as well as harp is amply warranted to produce the glitter and vital radiance of the forces of light. In its general orchestral style, "Ormazd" shows that economy of resource (in the best sense of the phrase), poetic adaptation of means to descriptive end, the conspicuous brilliance and power which are associated with Mr. Converse's mastery of the orchestral medium.

If an introductory article may not venture far into comment on the musical subject matter of Mr. Converse's tone-poem, it may at least be stated that in formal treatment he has been happy alike in its freedom and concise restraint where there was abundant temptation to be discursive. That in its evocation of "atmosphere," the picturing of dramatic conflict with a definite contrapuntal skill in the combining and opposing of motives, and more especially in the largeness of ideas and outlines, Mr. Converse has shown that the interaction of his recent interest in opera has superadded an increased instinct for dramatic values in a purely instrumental work. In a word, "Ormazd" bids fair to be its composer's largest achievement in the orchestral field, and the audiences of this week may well be expectant.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

TRAVELER,
FEBRUARY 3, 1912.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE.

The fifth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, Feb. 8. There will be no soloist. The programme comprises Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat, No. 4; Frederick S. Converse's Symphonic Poem, "Ormazd," and the Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

"Ormazd" is the most recent work from the fertile pen of Dr. Converse. It had its first performance in St. Louis the week before last, and is to be played at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, consequently the performance in Cambridge will be the first performance so far as Boston is concerned.

The third and last concert of the Longy Club is set for Monday evening, Feb. 12, in Jordan Hall. The programme comprises D'Indy's "Chanson et Danses," opus 50, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and two bassoons; Enesco's "Second Sonata for Violin and Piano," by Messrs. S. Noack and A. de Voto, and Raff's "Sinfonietta," opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

ADVERTISER.
FEBRUARY 10, 191[illegible]

NEW SYMPHONIC POEM BY MR. CONVERSE

HEARD YESTERDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Composer Has Worked up a Very Striking Climax—Mr. Warnke Violoncello Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky—Symphony in F minor, No.
Lalo—Concerto for violoncello and orchestr.
Soloist—Heinrich Warnke.
Converse—"Ormazd," Symphonic Poem.

It is unfair that the pathos of the [illegible]xth symphony and the fury of the fifth should throw Tschaikowsky's other symphonies in the shade. There is something attractive in each one of them, and something to study, too. In each one he teaches the lesson that intense emotion can be expressed without suppressing melody. In each one there are almost pioneer touches in the use of the modern orchestra, and particularly of the woodwind and the deepest brasses. When Tschaikowsky dedicated this fourth symphony "To my best Friend" (Mme. Von Meck) he certainly felt it to be a work of great importance. In fact he felt convinced that it was his best work up to that time (1877-8), and he wrote as much to the lady aforesaid.

As usual Tschaikowsky uses an introduction to herald the chief thoughts of the subsequent movements, and this introduction carries the germ of the work within itself. The chief essence of the work is sorrow, but not that dissonant, ascetic sorrow which many moderns affect. It is rather that melancholy and unsatisfied longing to which a true Muscovite takes as a duck takes to water. In the first movement there are contrasts of bright happiness as well, and these were finely brought out in the reading. But the predominant mood is one of sadness.

But in the finale these contrasts are made most vivid. Here we have the heartiest folk-music placed against the brooding figures of the first part, the suggestion of Fate. Only Berlioz made such a contrast, in his "Childe Harold" symphony, and he did not do it as melodiously as Tschaikowsky and we are getting to be grateful for crumbs of melody. Some day a modern composer will come along and again give us an entire loaf. But we get almost that (even if a trifle soggy) in the beautiful melody of the andante movement. The pizzicato effects of the scherzo, and the tricksy humor of the trio of this, also form bright oases in the long stretches of despair. The first and third movements seem to be the strongest parts of the work, the second having a suspicion of sentimentality, and the finale an artificial merriment. It is, in short, the work of an orchestral virtuoso, bombastic at times and not always natural, but it pleased the audience, and the brilliancy of the finale won a double recall at which the orchestra was obliged to rise in response.

Boston is a city that has always been rich in violoncellists, even from the days (more than a century ago) when Mr. Schaffer played the instrument at the concerts of the Philo-Harmonic orchestra, and at present we have two great artists in a sort of divided consulship at the head of the violoncellos of our own orchestra. Recently we had Mr. Schroeder in excellent solo work in these concerts (next week we are to hear him in recital), and yesterday afternoon we heard Heinrich Warnke in Lalo's concerto for the instrument. This work has its faults, but there are not enough violoncello concertos that it can be spared from the repertoire. The first movement is rather too long, but the more popular character of the two last movements make amends.

While the first movement is earnest and dramatic, the second is pastoral even to the drone-bass stage, and the finale has some touches of dance themes. Both this number and the preceding symphony sound as if they were programme-music with the story left to be guessed at.

Mr. Warnke played like the finished artist that he is. He was cordially welcomed at the first, in a manner which must have showed him that his excellent work in Boston has been appreciated. At the end the audience recalled him twice. One could have asked a trifle more of breadth in the first and last movements, but the surety of intonation, the sympathetic quality of tone, deserve the heartiest praise. But we are by no means convinced that the Lalo concerto is a great work.

The concert ended with Mr. Converse's new symphonic poem, still in manuscript, entitled "Ormazd." If Mr. Converse is tepid in opera, in symphonic music he is the converse. His field is really the advanced orchestral one, for he has good control of the mighty modern tonal machine, and he is not only melodic in invention, but subtle in his treatment of themes and interesting in his development of them.

In the Persian mythology Ormazd is the deity of Light and Goodness, and Ahrimanes the ruler of Darkness and Evil. It would have been an excellent foil to the Converse work, and would have added to it, if the Ahrimanes music, from Schumann's "Manfred," could have been played together with it.

In this symphonic poem the composer has worked up a very striking climax, for it is almost a crescendo from the first. The gathering of celestial hosts is carried from vagueness to a triumphant military theme. Celestial music, the choruses of the blest, comes next, and then, in sharp contrast, suggestions of the turbulent and rebellious Ahrimanes. Guiding motives are used, and the auditor will readily recognize the figures devoted to the two combatants, the representatives of Light and Darkness. But one may first pay attention to the climax which is worked up on the Ahrimanes theme, the gradual rising of revolt, the combat, too, [illegible] teresting, although here one could demand more intensity of dramatic effect. The triumph and the celestial praises at the end are noble. It is very evident that by his studies in operatic work Mr. Converse has become stronger in his symphonic composition.

The spirits are, however, too often ruminative, and there is sometimes too much of complexity. The music is not Oriental at all, but that is no defect, the Occidental is not barred from treating Oriental topics in his music.

There are moments of great beauty in the work, and we think that it is a composition that will grow upon one with repeated hearing.

The spirits of the blest are at first rather given to chromatics, but they grow more diatonic as they progress. The earlier part of "Ormazd" is a trifle too fragmentary (possibly this was intentional) and the continuance of the tortuous harmony robs the composition of contrasted effect, but the beauties of the work overbalance these defects.

JOURNAL-
FEBRUARY 10, 1912.

CONVERSE SYMPHONY DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Composer Hears Brilliant Performance and Congratulates Fiedler.

At the close of yesterday's Symphony concert a young looking six-footer, who might have been an all-America guard in his college days, left his seat in the middle of the hall, with a smile on his face, and quietly made his way through the rising, clapping throng to the side corridor and disappeared.

Conductor Fiedler stopped bowing and looked all around the hall. The orchestra stood up and joined the search. There was no let up in the applause. Everyone seemed reluctant to go until someone had been found. But after a few minutes the clapping dwindled away and Mr. Fiedler gave one last futile sweep with the stick that he had been using to conjure up the missing hero, and——

Just as the crowd rushed for trolley cars and automobiles Frederick S. Converse, the composer of the new symphonic poem, "Ormazd," stalked enthusiastically in through the stage door to congratulate the conductor and the orchestra on the fine performance of his orchestral masterpiece.

From Persian Mythology

"Ormazd" is a musical setting of a story taken from the mythology of ancient Persia. To the followers of Zoroaster, Ormazd was the spirit of light and Ahriman the spirit of darkness. Ormazd summons the hosts of heaven to repel the attack of Ahriman and his evil forces. Ormazd conquers Ahriman, "and from above is heard the rejoicing of the hosts of light, also the song of the blessed Fravashis," or the souls of the good, "in praise of Ormazd." Mr. Converse makes this philosophical comment: "There are, no doubt, an Ormazd and an Ahriman within each of us, and so my work may have subjective emotional significance as well as decorative and imaginative qualities."

It has all these and more. It has not only poetical and psychological qualities, but realistic features that vividly present the unearthly beauty of the existence of the blessed Fravashis, the hideous, despairing fate of the souls struggling desperately to escape from the pit of Dusahk, the clash of battle, the holy joy of the conquerors. It is a remarkable composition, full of spiritual suggestion, musical resourcefulness, imaginative power and individual idioms that place Mr. Converse in the forefront of the progressive twentieth century composers, and its moral message to the world is well conveyed in measures of unmistakable significance.

First Performance Here

This admirable tone poem yesterday had its first performance in Boston. The performance will be repeated tonight. The orchestra did full justice to the work. The only disappointment came when Mr. Converse bashfully slipped out before the audience caught sight of him.

Heinrich Warnke played the solo part in the melodious Lalo concerto for 'cello and orchestra in a style that earned several recalls for him. The orchestra performed all but the first movement of the fourth Tschaikowsky symphony brilliantly.

Longy Club

The third and last concert of the Longy Club will be given in Jordan Hall Monday evening. The program is as follows:

"Chanson et Danses".....V. d'Indy
Second sonata for violin and piano (S. Noack and A. de Voto).....G. Enesco
Sinfonietta.....J. Raff

The assisting artist will be Sylvain Noack, violinist.

[136]

Teyte Recital

A recital of French songs will be given in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon by Maggie Teyte, the principal lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, whom Mr. C. A. Ellis is bringing to Boston. This will be Miss Teyte's first appearance in this city. The program will be as follows:

De Greve	Debussy
Claire de Lune	Debussy
La Chevelure	Debussy
De Soir	Duparc
Extase	Rue
L'Ane Blanc	Reynaldo Hahn
Les Fontaines
Le Manoir de Rosemonde	Duparc
Air d'Azael ("L'Enfant Prodigue")	Debussy
	Debussy
C'est l'extase langoureuse	Debussy
Il pleure dans mon coeur	Debussy
L'ombre des arbres	Debussy
Fantoches	Debussy
Aquarelle, No. 1, Green	Debussy

Symphony Program

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, will be the soloist at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Her first number will be the aria from Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew," and her second number will consist of three of Hugo Wolf's songs, with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Gsts." Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major will have its first performance in Boston. The other numbers on the program comprise Mozart's Symphony in C-minor and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 10, 191

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky's Noble Work Played.

Mr Converse's New "Ormazd" Heard for First Time.

The program of the 15th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon included Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, Heinrich Warnke soloist, and "Ormazd," symphonic poem by Mr. Converse, played for the first time in Boston.

Tschaikowsky was not accustomed to attach a definite interpretative significance to his music. He wrote to his "best friend," Mme von Meck, to whom this symphony is dedicated, a letter shortly after its first performance in which he tried to analyze his mental and emotional processes in writing the work, a letter that pictures a great creative mind viewing itself as a spectator, and trying to spell out in words what can be expressed only by feeling.

To this remarkable woman, his benefactor, to whom by letter he laid bare his heart in all things, although she insisted that they never meet, he confessed a "program," the series of thoughts and feelings which to the music inspired, or more prob the moods which were his inspirati

When he had finished the letter he read to himself in dismay at the stark concreteness, the limitations and inefficacy of written words to catch and convey the fugitive and intangible spirit of music.

The thought of fate brooding over and controlling the lives of men, superior to their wills, is an ancient principle in tragedy. Tschaikowsky was 37 years old when he wrote this symphony. Save the "Francesca da Rimini," and in lesser degree "The Tempest," it was the first of his works that denoted the master, and a worthy companion to the fifth and sixth symphonies, that were to follow at long intervals. He had lived long enough to suffer deeply from a morbid imagination as from reality, and through suffering he knew the true essence of joy, and could himself know happiness through the joy of others.

There is the sinister and bodeful text in the opening measures of the "fate" motive in horns and bassoons, and reinforced by trumpets. It recurs in the last movement, but is swallowed up and submerged under the flood of rejoicing that the composer bids his hearer find in the lives of others. Here is the triumph of a sweet, unselfish spirit, a transporting, yet a human benediction.

How might he have closed this movement? With ears stopped to the laughter of children, eyes closed to the light of the sun, with the mind brooding upon morbidity and "the inevitable." Instead, Tschaikowsky wrote as a true poet of life, of life bigger than he knew it. Although cast down by melancholy at the writing, according to his own words, he did not fill these pages with whimpering, nor with pompous blasphemies in the face of heaven. He remembered rather the spirit of play, the pleasures derived from the memories of youth, days that to Wordsworth could make the sounding cataract haunting "like a passion."

There might have been pitfalls at every step, ways of artificiality, extravagance and error for a composer creating in music thoughts as majestic and terrible as man's struggle against the innate fear of his doom, but to listen to this music is to feel coupled with its imaginative sweep a sanity, a sweet and pervading humanness. Here are pages that kindle the fancy, that stir the heart, that touch and exalt the spirit.

There are measures of noble beauty as the episode for oboe in the second movement, and Tschaikowsky's melody had caught the Italian grace of contour without losing the Slavic fervor and power of content. The pizzicato scherzo is filled with ravishing surprises and should pass in its flow of nuances as light clouds over a Summer sun. It is music that carries all before it by the sheer force of its own appeal, and the orchestra made it significant and moving yesterday.

Lalo has written a plentiful amount of merely decorative and rapid music in his concerto for the 'cello. The slow movement holds a few opportunities [illegible] pose. Besides a singing style in table he also was dexterous in florid passages. He was cordially applauded.

Mr Converse, by his analysis of his symphonic poem, "Ormazd," played here yesterday for the first time, has endeavored to incorporate two principles into the work, one typical of the Persian god of light, Ormazd, according to the followers of Zoroaster, and the other symbolical of Ahriman, the god of darkness.

Mr Converse not being a pessimist upon the future of music, one need not guess too shrewdly to surmise that the god of light will give battle at some point in the firmament to the god of darkness, and that he will triumph over him. The idea is not without analogy to "Paradise Lost," which has served as a musical test for many. The last new work of any pretence to celebrate it heard in Boston was an oratorio by Bossi, a gentleman who wrote excellent direful and horrendous music of hell and the forces of wickedness, but such pale and innocuous sounds for the suggestion of Paradise that in a choice between the two all active persons would have taken the former.

Mr Converse appears to have struck a contrast in his balance. The music typical of the god of light has strength and dramatic character as well as beauty in both melodic and harmonic structure and instrumental color. The measures dedicated to darkness and the dramatic conflict are less successful as sources of imagination. There was cordial applause and many waited to applaud the composer's public acknowledgment.

AMERICAN—
FEBRUARY 4, 1912.

NEW SYMPHONIC POEM BY CONVERSE

"Ormazd" Will Be Performed for the First Time Here at Next Symphony Concert.

Musical interest in next week's Symphony concert will centre in the performance for the first time in Boston of the latest work of Fredrick S. Converse, which is a symphonic poem for full orchestra entitled "Ormazd." Mr. Converse started this last Spring and in the major part of the work on it last Summer, but the orchestration was finished only a month or so ago. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance anywhere in St. Louis, week before last, where it was played by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Max Zach.

This is the first orchestral work that Mr. Converse has done in several years, his last having been dramatic scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc" played by Dr. Muck in 1908. Recently he has been entirely occupied with operatic work. This new symphonic poem is based on the Persian legend of Ormazd, the God of Light, and has to do with the conflict of Good and Evil, and the final triumph of Good.

The soloist will be Mr. M. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke will play Lalo's Concerto in D Minor. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

POST,
FEBRUARY 4, 1912

Symphony Concert

Musical interest in next week's Symphony concert will centre in the performance for the first time in Boston of the latest work of Frederick S. Converse, which is a symphonic poem for full orchestra entitled "Ormazd." Mr. Converse started this last spring and did the major part of the work on it last summer, but the orchestration was finished only a month or so ago. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance anywhere in St. Louis, week before last, where it was played by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Max Zach.

The soloist will be Mr. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke will play Lalo's concerto in D minor.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

HERALD,
FEBRUARY 10, 1912.

CONVERSE'S NEW WORK IS GIVEN

"Ormazd" Is Played Here for First Time by Symphony Orchestra.

SOUL CONFLICT IN MUSIC

Has Many Decorative and Sonorous Effects—Mr. Warnke Is the Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Heinrich Warnke, cellist of the orchestra, was [illegible] The program was as fol-

[illegible]ony No. 4, E minor.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for 'cello and orchestra.....Lalo
"Ormazd" symphonic poem (MS.)..Converse

Mr. Converse's latest orchestral work, composed for the most part in the course of last summer, was played for the first time in Boston. The first performances were at St. Louis last month.

This symphonic poem has a program, which was published in The Herald of last Sunday. The subject is the conflict between Ormazd and Ahriman, light and darkness, whom the disciples of Zoroaster deified as the gods of good and evil; the constructive and destructive principles. As in certain other religions, the conflict will finally end in the triumph of Ormazd. The poetic idea appealed to the composer, as he informs us, on account of its picturesque expression of elemental truths: for in each one of us the two spirits are contending.

Now in the sonata form, which is still the basis of many symphonic poems and of the first movement of a symphony, a conflict is established between two themes or musical ideas which, to quote M. Vincent d'Indy, present themselves in succession, each at one of the two poles of the adopted tonality; they seek each other, shun each other, arrive at an explanation, and end by uniting in one and the same tonality. The opposition of two decided elements of musical expression may be more or less strongly defined, so that there is dramatic action in music, whether the composition have a title and a program or be presented to the public as absolute music.

In Mr. Converse's symphonic poem, Ormazd assembles the heavenly hosts, and there is a martial motive. There is a contrasting motive which suggests "the pernicious activity" of the spirit of darkness. The two are in sharp opposition in the Conflict episode. But there is another musical thought that musically is of equal importance, and to the average hearer probably of greater importance in that it makes a more emotional appeal; that is the song of good souls, the blessed Fravashis, which is heard before the conflict and at the end with the hosts of Light exulting in praise of the Conqueror.

The more salient features of this work are those that are decorative and imaginative. The music that describes the wild regret and the moaning anguish of Ahriman and the lost is not so effective—or, rather, it was not so effectively brought out yesterday—as the episode of the marching hosts of light and the song of adoration and of triumph. And it may here be said that "Ormazd" was unfortunately placed on the program, Tschaikowsky's symphony, an intermission, and then a 'cello concerto did not leave the audience in an eagerly receptive mood. A symphonic poem of these dimensions, when it is performed for the first time, should come early in the concert. It may also be said without disrespect to Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra that longer rehearsal would have given more value to the pages that are not purely pictorial or objectively striking.

After the performance of yesterday it may be justly said that "Ormazd" is planned on a large scale, but the musical thought is clear and continuous, and the episodes proceed one after, and from the other toward a powerful climax. There is no attempt at orientalism or pseudo-orientalism in the musical expression. Mr. Converse is of the advanced modern group, and the modern idiom as shaped by his individuality and for his own purposes is ample and elastic. The themes are sufficiently expressive and they are thoughtfully worked out. There are harmonic progressions that arrest the attention of the hearer, but not merely because they are bizarre. The workmanship is rightly put aside in the thought of the imposing structure and the architectural effect. Mr. Converse employs a large orchestra, but the instrumentation is not thickened thereby; it abounds in pleasing contrasts of color, it is brilliant, it is sonorous, and even in a scene of battle, in which composers are now allowed to be blatant, screamingly vociferous, Mr. Converse respects the difference between sound and noise.

The audience welcomed the new work warmly, and there was a protracted effort to call the composer on the stage.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave a highly dramatic performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which is more frankly Russian, less cosmopolitan, than the 5th or the 6th. The andantino was played poetically; the scherzo was performed with the utmost bravura, and the finale, often brutal in its gayety, a gayety that is alcoholic, was given with the appropriate fury. Mr. Fiedler doubled the horns and the woodwind instruments. Whether the effect was aesthetically doubled might be a subject for academic discussion.

Mr. Warnke played with fine tone and marked taste Lalo's 'cello concerto, which in spite of fortunate instances of instrumentation and the grace of the intermezzo, stands far below the composer's concerto for violin op. 20 and the Symphonie Espagnole.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Goetz, Air from "The Taming of the Shrew" (Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Hugo Wolf, songs with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit," "Er ist's" (Miss Gerhardt); Enesco, Rhapsodie Roumaine in A major op. 11, No. 1.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 9, 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MR. CONVERSE'S "ORMAZD"; DR. MUCK'S RETURN

The New Tone-Poem Played in Cambridge—Its Quality and the Impressions of a First Performance—A German View of Dr. Muck's Departure from Berlin—The Conditions That Brought It About—The Gap He Leaves

MR. CONVERSE'S "Ormazd" was played last evening in Cambridge for the first time hereabouts since its initial performance under Mr. Zach at St. Louis and despite the variety and indubitable attraction of the [illegible] Mendelssohn's "Midsummer [illegible] Dream" overture, Beethoven's [illegible] symphony, and Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers," curiosity and attention found their focus in listening to the latest tone-poem of a resident composer. In the seven years or so since Mr. Converse wrote "The Mystic Trumpeter" he has steadily broadened in his musical scope. From chamber and orchestral music, he turned to opera in "The Pipe of Desire," to a large choral "Job," to a dramatically illustrative style in the incidental music to Mackaye's "Jeanne d'Arc," and finally to opera again in "The Sacrifice." In all of these, he has been practising and moulding not only dramatic style but cultivating the instinct for dramatic expression. He returns to the tone-poem with increased maturity of conviction, and with a considerable residuum of dramatic experience. Nor should it be forgotten that "Job" was to all intents and purposes dramatic also. "Ormazd" shows clearly that Mr. Converse can coalesce instrumental and dramatic style; it also convinces us that he can retain his grasp of structure without abating the intensity of his dramatic purpose. He has never been so concise, so normally balanced in form, and yet so apparently spontaneously forceful in expression. His themes are larger in their suggestibility, and his development of them freer in a broad and elastic interweaving of motives. The analyst would note the apparition here and there of the "augmented triad" and the "whole-toned scale" both dear to Debussy. But the "augmented triad" was used before Debussy, and the whole-toned scale has traversed the civilized musical world; it is to be found in later works of Scriabine and many ultra-modern Russians, it figures conspicuously in the last opera of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Golden Cock"; it appears definitely in Strauss's "Salome" and in the works of Puccini. Mr. Loeffler is perhaps its pioneer in this country, but Mr. Strube and Mr. Eicheim have also used it for their own expressive purposes. In short, it is no longer fair or just to say "Debussy" when the whole-toned scale is heard. It is common property, one might as well suggest plagiarism for using the common triads of the modal scales. In "Ormazd" there are scarcely a dozen measures which might attract attention because of this scale, and its treatment is dominated by the stamp of Mr. Converse's individuality. Too much space has already been allotted to this detail, for "Ormazd" as a whole is as thoroughly characteristic of the style and personality of the man as anything he has written.

From the point of view of the "programme" it might be questioned whether the music depicting the "blessed Fravashis praise of Ormazd" is as etherial or disembodied as would seem fitting. This is a justifiable comment, but Mr. Converse has never written with a more persuasive humanity than in this section, and it is precisely the lyric beauty of melody and mood which linger in the mind. Objection might also be made on account of the introduction of a "combat" into music, as provocative of temptation to over-indulgence in sonorous description. In this respect Mr. Converse is far from courting the real [illegible] of Strauss' "Heldenleben," for instance, the conflict is more emotional and dramatic and is not without its spice of dissonance that no reasonable auditor unless he be [illegible] dicted in conservatism need find the mean excess of an adequately expressive end. As a whole "Ormazd" may fairly be enrolled Mr. Converse's largest instrumental achievement, although there are episodes in "The Mystic Trumpeter" which scarcely yield to it. But critical afterthought must affirm the larger outline, the dramatic color and maturity of expression of the later piece. From the standpoint of orchestral style Mr. Converse has never achieved anything at once more luminous, more amply sonorous without being blatant, more distinct with sense of contrast of color and timbre, more inventive in depictive device. Mr. Fiedler deserves great credit for the performance and for his rapid assimilation of the mood and content of the piece. A performance of a large tone-poem in Sanders Theatre presents difficulties, for a considerable proportion of strings have to be left behind for lack of space, with the full quota of wood-wind, bass and percussion, to make balance the more difficult. All the more is Mr. Fiedler to be commended for his presentation of the poetic and dramatic elements in "Ormazd." The audience responded unusually readily to the eloquence and poetry of Mr. Converse's work, and the composer was compelled not only to bow his acknowledgements from his place in the second balcony, but to advance to its balustrade and bow to those applauding below.

For the remainder of the programme, the numbers are all stock pieces in the repertory of the orchestra. It is needless to rehearse their virtues, but it is needful to remark on the plenitude and sweep of Mr. Fiedler's conducting of Wagner, of his sense of proportion and vitalizing energy in his interpretation of his music. E. B. H.

DR. MUCK'S RETURN

Conditions in Berlin

IT has been possible within the last few days to read a most amazing collection of inaccuracies and false statements concerning Dr. Muck's Boston engagement, both in the German press and in the dailies of our neighboring capitals. Especially inexact was the account which appeared in the Paris edition of the New York Herald. Let it be said here that Dr. Muck, at that time when he had won, as the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a very distinguished following, declared to Major Higginson of Boston, in the most loyal manner possible, that, though he could give no definite promises, he would gladly accept a return engagement as soon as his obligations in Berlin were discharged. Privately he hoped that he could extricate himself from these contracts in Berlin at the end of twelve months. But he was not in a position to make a very determined effort to do this after he discovered that the German emperor did not wish to release him.

Meanwhile, the conditions in the Berlin Royal Opera had become worse instead of better; creditable artistic performances had become the exception, and poor performances had become—and still are—the rule. The Opera House possesses two famous general music directors, Richard Strauss [illegible] happens and Dr. Karl Muck. Of their respective merits in musical affairs and their diverse achievements little can be said by way of comparison or parallel.

Dr. Muck can look back upon twenty years of activity on our imperial stage and in that long period this sensitive artist has exerted a sure, steady, and beneficial influence on all the forces under his command. Between Dr. Muck and the Imperial Orchestra the best relations appear to have existed; but an opera house does not consist of an orchestra alone.

The Negotiations

Dr. Muck's contract expired on the first of October, 1912, and he was expected, accordingly, to make it known before the first of January whether or not he intended to depart. The Intendance, however, was not willing to wait so long, and at the end of September of last year presented him with a new contract. The director was, therefore, invited to declare his intentions a quarter of a year beforehand, and the rumors of Dr. Muck's departure began to be noised among outsiders. Shortly before New Year's came an exchange of despatches between Dr. Muck and Major Higginson in which they agreed that nothing now need dissuade them from a public announcement of the engagement. The statement is incorrect that Dr. Muck was engaged to lead the Boston Orchestra for ten years. His contract is for five years only. Likewise it is false that by his departure he forfeits his claims to the pension which accompanies his position here. Dr. Muck is a court functionary and cannot forfeit his pension. Of course while he commands in another position a salary so much higher than the pension stipend no pension will be paid to him. But the moment his other stipends cease his pension as a Prussian court functionary is payable.

The Result

Dr. Muck goes, and he goes to a place where—in contrast to the stubborn prejudices which ride us in Germany—he need make no compromise in the matter of his art. If an ideal position for an orchestral leader exists on this earth Dr. Muck possesses it, and he enters upon it under the most flattering and favorable conditions.

Dr. Muck goes, and what of the Berlin Royal Opera? Dr. Richard Strauss, of late, has seemed scarcely able to find time to direct a pair of symphony concerts by the Court Orchestra. That he will be able after Dr. Muck's departure to devote himself to the directing of opera is highly improbable. Where will another "talent of the first order" be found?

Or are secret preparations to another end in progress? Private Secretary Winter of the Royal Intendance has been preparing for a journey to America to treat with Mr. Gatti-Casazza (of the Metropolitan Opera House) in a sort of card-game between artists. But what will come of it when Mr. Gatti-Casazza holds the hands with all the trumps? Unprejudiced observers could wish that Private Secretary Winter would make a side-trip from New York to Boston and seek the acquaintance of Major Higginson. In him, the private secretary would discern a very cultivated and urbane gentleman who knows exactly what he has, and who has not the slightest intention of lending a talent like that of Dr. Muck as a "guest director" to the Berlin Royal Opera. [August Spanuth, in Die Signale.

[137]

Teyte Recital

A recital of French songs will be given in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon by Maggie Teyte, the principal lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, whom Mr. C. A. Ellis is bringing to Boston. This will be Miss Teyte's first appearance in this city. The program will be as follows:

De Greve	Debussy
Claire de Lune	Debussy
La Chevelure	Debussy
De Soir	Duparc
Extase	Rue
L'Ane Blanc	Reynaldo Hahn
Les Fontaines	Duparc
Le Manoir de Rosemonde	Duparc
Air d'Azael ("L'Enfant Prodigue")	Debussy
	Debussy
C'est l'extase langoureuse	Debussy
Il pleure dans mon coeur	Debussy
L'ombre des arbres	Debussy
Fantoches	Debussy
Aquarelle, No. 1, Green	Debussy

Symphony Program

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, will be the soloist at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Her first number will be the aria from Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew," and her second number will consist of three of Hugo Wolf's songs, with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Gets." Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major will have its first performance in Boston. The other numbers on the program comprise Mozart's Symphony in C-minor and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 10, 191

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky's Noble Work Played.

Mr Converse's New "Ormazd" Heard for First Time.

The program of the 15th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon included Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, Heinrich Warnke soloist, and "Ormazd," symphonic poem by Mr. Converse, played for the first time in Boston.

Tschaikowsky was not accustomed to attach a definite interpretative significance to his music. He wrote to his "best friend," Mme von Meck, to whom this symphony is dedicated, a letter shortly after its first performance in which he tried to analyze his mental and emotional processes in writing the work, a letter that pictures a great creative mind viewing itself as a spectator, and trying to spell out in words what can be expressed only by feeling.

To this remarkable woman, his benefactor, to whom by letter he laid bare his heart in all things, although she insisted that they never meet, he confessed a "program," the series of thoughts and feelings which to him the music inspired, or more probably the moods which were his inspiration.

When he had finished the letter he read to himself in dismay at the stark concreteness, the limitations and inefficacy of written words to catch and convey the fugitive and intangible spirit of music.

The thought of fate brooding over and controlling the lives of men, superior to their wills, is an ancient principle in tragedy. Tschaikowsky was 37 years old when he wrote this symphony. Save the "Francesca da Rimini," and in lesser degree "The Tempest," it was the first of his works that denoted the master, and a worthy companion to the fifth and sixth symphonies, that were to follow at long intervals. He had lived long enough to suffer deeply from a morbid imagination as from reality, and through suffering he knew the true essence of joy, and could himself know happiness through the joy of others.

There is the sinister and bodeful text in the opening measures of the "fate" motive in horns and bassoons, and reinforced by trumpets. It recurs in the last movement, but is swallowed up and submerged under the flood of rejoicing that the composer bids his hearer find in the lives of others. Here is the triumph of a sweet, unselfish spirit, a transporting, yet a human benediction.

How might he have closed this movement? With ears stopped to the laughter of children, eyes closed to the light of the sun, with the mind brooding upon morbidity and "the inevitable." Instead, Tschaikowsky wrote as a true poet of life, of life bigger than he knew it. Although cast down by melancholy at the writing, according to his own words, he did not fill these pages with whimpering, nor with pompous blasphemies in the face of heaven. He remembered rather the spirit of play, the pleasures derived from the memories of youth, days that to Wordsworth could make the sounding cataract haunting "like a passion."

There might have been pitfalls at every step, ways of artificiality, extravagance and error for a composer creating in music thoughts as majestic and terrible as man's struggle against the innate fear of his doom, but to listen to this music is to feel coupled with its imaginative sweep a sanity, a sweet and pervading humanness. Here are pages that kindle the fancy, that stir the heart, that touch and exalt the spirit.

There are measures of noble beauty as the episode for oboe in the second movement, and Tschaikowsky's melody had caught the Italian grace of contour without losing the Slavic fervor and power of content. The pizzicato scherzo is filled with ravishing surprises and should pass in its flow of nuances as light clouds over a Summer sun. It is music that carries all before it by the sheer force of its own appeal, and the orchestra made it significant and moving yesterday.

Lalo has written a plentiful amount of merely decorative and rapid music in his concerto for the 'cello. The slow movement holds a few opportunities and t[illegible] pose. Besides a singing style in tabile he also was dexterous in florid passages. He was cordially applauded.

Mr Converse, by his analysis of his symphonic poem, "Ormazd," played here yesterday for the first time, has endeavored to incorporate two principles into the work, one typical of the Persian god of light, Ormazd, according to the followers of Zoroaster, and the other symbolical of Ahriman, the god of darkness.

Mr Converse not being a pessimist upon the future of music, one need not guess too shrewdly to surmise that the god of light will give battle at some point in the firmament to the god of darkness, and that he will triumph over him. The idea is not without analogy to "Paradise Lost," which has served as a musical test for many. The last new work of any pretence to celebrate it heard in Boston was an oratorio by Bossi, a gentleman who wrote excellent direful and horrendous music of hell and the forces of wickedness, but such pale and innocuous sounds for the suggestion of Paradise that in a choice between the two all active persons would have taken the former.

Mr Converse appears to have struck a contrast in his balance. The music typical of the god of light has strength and dramatic character as well as beauty in both melodic and harmonic structure and instrumental color. The measures dedicated to darkness and the dramatic conflict are less successful as sources of imagination. There was cordial applause and many waited to applaud the composer's public acknowledgment.

AMERICAN—
FEBRUARY 4, 1912.

NEW SYMPHONIC POEM BY CONVERSE

"Ormazd" Will Be Performed for the First Time Here at Next Symphony Concert.

Musical interest in next week's Symphony concert will centre in the performance for the first time in Boston of the latest work of Fredrick S. Converse, which is a symphonic poem for full orchestra entitled "Ormazd." Mr. Converse started this last Spring and in the major part of the work on it last Summer, but the orchestration was finished only a month or so ago. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance anywhere in St. Louis, week before last, where it was played by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Max Zach.

This is the first orchestral work that Mr. Converse has done in several years, his last having been dramatic scenes from "Jeanne d'Arc" played by Dr. Muck in 1908. Recently he has been entirely occupied with operatic work. This new symphonic poem is based on the Persian legend of Ormazd, the God of Light, and has to do with the conflict of Good and Evil, and the final triumph of Good.

The soloist will be Mr. M. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke will play Lalo's Concerto in D Minor. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

POST,
[illegible]UARY 4, 1912

Symphony Concert

Musical interest in next week's Symphony concert will centre in the performance for the first time in Boston of the latest work of Frederick S. Converse, which is a symphonic poem for full orchestra entitled "Ormazd." Mr. Converse started this last spring and did the major part of the work on it last summer, but the orchestration was finished only a month or so ago. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance anywhere in St. Louis, week before last, where it was played by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Max Zach.

The soloist will be Mr. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra. Mr. Warnke will play Lalo's concerto in D minor.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 4 in F minor.

HERALD,
FEBRUARY 10, 1912.

CONVERSE'S NEW WORK IS GIVEN

"Ormazd" Is Played Here for First Time by Symphony Orchestra.

SOUL CONFLICT IN MUSIC

Has Many Decorative and Sonorous Effects—Mr. Warnke Is the Soloist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Heinrich Warnke, cellist of the orchestra, was [illegible]. The program was as fol-

[illegible] Concerto for 'cello and orchestra.....
"Ormazd" symphonic poem (MS.)..Converse

Mr. Converse's latest orchestral work, composed for the most part in the course of last summer, was played for the first time in Boston. The first performances were at St. Louis last month.

This symphonic poem has a program, which was published in The Herald of last Sunday. The subject is the conflict between Ormazd and Ahriman, light and darkness, whom the disciples of Zoroaster deified as the gods of good and evil; the constructive and destructive principles. As in certain other religions, the conflict will finally end in the triumph of Ormazd. The poetic idea appealed to the composer, as he informs us, on account of its picturesque expression of elemental truths: for in each one of us the two spirits are contending.

Now in the sonata form, which is still the basis of many symphonic poems and of the first movement of a symphony, a conflict is established between two themes or musical ideas which, to quote M. Vincent d'Indy, present themselves in succession, each at one of the two poles of the adopted tonality; they seek each other, shun each other, arrive at an explanation, and end by uniting in one and the same tonality. The opposition of two decided elements of musical expression may be more or less strongly defined, so that there is dramatic action in music, whether the composition have a title and a program or be presented to the public as absolute music.

In Mr. Converse's symphonic poem, Ormazd assembles the heavenly hosts, and there is a martial motive. There is a contrasting motive which suggests "the pernicious activity" of the spirit of darkness. The two are in sharp opposition in the Conflict episode. But there is another musical thought that musically is of equal importance, and to the average hearer probably of greater importance in that it makes a more emotional appeal; that is the song of good souls, the blessed Fravashis, which is heard before the conflict and at the end with the hosts of Light exulting in praise of the Conqueror.

The more salient features of this work are those that are decorative and imaginative. The music that describes the wild regret and the moaning anguish of Ahriman and the lost is not so effective—or, rather, it was not so effectively brought out yesterday—as the episode of the marching hosts of light and the song of adoration and of triumph. And it may here be said that "Ormazd" was unfortunately placed on the program, Tschaikowsky's symphony, an intermission, and then a 'cello concerto did not leave the audience in an eagerly receptive mood. A symphonic poem of these dimensions, when it is performed for the first time, should come early in the concert. It may also be said without disrespect to Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra that longer rehearsal would have given more value to the pages that are not purely pictorial or objectively striking.

After the performance of yesterday it may be justly said that "Ormazd" is planned on a large scale, but the musical thought is clear and continuous, and the episodes proceed one after, and from, the other toward a powerful climax. There is no attempt at orientalism or pseudo-orientalism in the musical expression. Mr. Converse is of the advanced modern group, and the modern idiom as shaped by his individuality and for his own purposes is ample and elastic. The themes are sufficiently expressive and they are thoughtfully worked out. There are harmonic progressions that arrest the attention of the hearer, but not merely because they are bizarre. The workmanship is rightly put aside in the thought of the imposing structure and the architectural effect. Mr. Converse employs a large orchestra, but the instrumentation is not thickened thereby; it abounds in pleasing contrasts of color, it is brilliant, it is sonorous, and even in a scene of battle, in which composers are now allowed to be blatant, screamingly vociferous, Mr. Converse respects the difference between sound and noise.

The audience welcomed the new work warmly, and there was a protracted effort to call the composer on the stage.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave a highly dramatic performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which is more frankly Russian, less cosmopolitan, than the 5th or the 6th. The andantino was played poetically; the scherzo was performed with the utmost bravura, and the finale, often brutal in its gayety, a gayety that is alcoholic, was given with the appropriate fury. Mr. Fiedler doubled the horns and the woodwind instruments. Whether the effect was aesthetically doubled might be a subject for academic discussion.

Mr. Warnke played with fine tone and marked taste Lalo's 'cello concerto, which in spite of fortunate instances of instrumentation and the grace of the intermezzo, stands far below the composer's concerto for violin op. 20 and the Symphonie Espagnole.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Goetz, Air from "The Taming of the Shrew" (Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Hugo Wolf, songs with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit," "Er ist's" (Miss Gerhardt); Enesco, Rhapsodie Roumaine in A major op. 11, No. 1.

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 9, 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MR. CONVERSE'S "ORMAZD"; DR. MUCK'S RETURN

The New Tone-Poem Played in Cambridge—Its Quality and the Impressions of a First Performance—A German View of Dr. Muck's Departure from Berlin—The Conditions That Brought It About—The Gap He Leaves

MR. CONVERSE'S "Ormazd" was played last evening in Cambridge for the first time hereabouts since its initial performance under Mr. Zach at St. Louis and despite the variety and indubitable attraction of the deissohn's "Midsummer [illegible] Dream" overture, Beethoven's [illegible] symphony, and Wagner's Preludes [illegible] "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers," curiosity and attention found their focus in listening to the latest tone-poem of a resident composer. In the seven years or so since Mr. Converse wrote "The Mystic Trumpeter" he has steadily broadened in his musical scope. From chamber and orchestral music, he turned to opera in "The Pipe of Desire," to a large choral "Job," to a dramatically illustrative style in the incidental music to Mackaye's "Jeanne d'Arc," and finally to opera again in "The Sacrifice." In all of these, he has been practising and moulding not only dramatic style but cultivating the instinct for dramatic expression. He returns to the tone-poem with increased maturity of conviction, and with a considerable residuum of dramatic experience. Nor should it be forgotten that "Job" was to all intents and purposes dramatic also. "Ormazd" shows clearly that Mr. Converse can coalesce instrumental and dramatic style; it also convinces us that he can retain his grasp of structure without abating the intensity of his dramatic purpose. He has never been so concise, so normally balanced in form, and yet so apparently spontaneously forceful in expression. His themes are larger in their suggestibility, and his development of them freer in a broad and elastic interweaving of motives. The analyst would note the apparition here and there of the "augmented triad" and the "whole-toned scale" both dear to Debussy. But the "augmented triad" was used before Debussy, and the whole-toned scale has traversed the civilized musical world; it is to be found in later works of Scriabine and many ultra-modern Russians, it figures conspicuously in the last opera of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Golden Cock"; it appears definitely in Strauss's "Salome" and in the works of Puccini. Mr. Loeffler is perhaps its pioneer in this country, but Mr. Strube and Mr. Eicheim have also used it for their own expressive purposes. In short, it is no longer fair or just to say "Debussy" when the whole-toned scale is heard. It is common property, one might as well suggest plagiarism for using the common triads of the modal scales. In "Ormazd" there are scarcely a dozen measures which might attract attention because of this scale, and its treatment is dominated by the stamp of Mr. Converse's individuality. Too much space has already been allotted to this detail, for "Ormazd" as a whole is as thoroughly characteristic of the style and personality of the man as anything he has written.

From the point of view of the "programme" it might be questioned whether the music depicting the "blessed Favaslejs praise of Ormazd" is as etherial or disembodied as would seem fitting. This is a justifiable comment, but Mr. Converse has never written with a more persuasive humanity than in this section, and it is precisely the lyric beauty of melody and mood which linger in the mind. Objection might also be made on account of the introduction of a "combat" into music, as provocative of temptation to over-indulgence in euphonous description. In this respect Mr. Converse is far from courting the realism of Strauss' "Heldenleben," for instance. The conflict is more emotional and dramatic. It is not without its spice of dissonance but no reasonable auditor unless he be [illegible]pted in conservatism need find the meaning excess of an adequately expressive end. As a whole "Ormazd" may fairly be enrolled Mr. Converse's largest instrumental achievement, although there are episodes in the Mystic Trumpeter" which scarcely add to it. But critical afterthought must affirm the larger outline, the dramatic power and maturity of expression of the greater piece. From the standpoint of orchestral style Mr. Converse has never achieved anything at once more luminous, more amber sonorous without being blatant, more distinct with sense of contrast of color and fibre, more inventive in depictive device. Mr. Fiedler deserves great credit for the performance and for his rapid assimilation of the mood and content of the piece. A performance of a large tone-poem in Sanders Theatre presents difficulties, for a considerable proportion of strings have to be set behind for lack of space, with the full [illegible]ota of wood-wind, bass and percussion, make balance the more difficult. All the more is Mr. Fiedler to be commended for his presentation of the poetic and dramatic elements in "Ormazd." The audience responded unusually readily to the eloquence and poetry of Mr. Converse's work, and the composer was compelled not only to bow his acknowledgements from his place in the second balcony, but to advance to its balustrade and bow to those applauding below.

For the remainder of the programme, the numbers are all stock pieces in the repertory of the orchestra. It is needless to rehearse their virtues, but it is needful to remark on the plenitude and sweep of Mr. Fiedler's conducting of Wagner, of his sense of proportion and vitalizing energy in his interpretation of his music. E. B. H.

DR. MUCK'S RETURN

Conditions in Berlin

IT has been possible within the last few days to read a most amazing collection of inaccuracies and false statements concerning Dr. Muck's Boston engagement, both in the German press and in the dailies of our neighboring capitals. Especially inexact was the account which appeared in the Paris edition of the New York Herald. Let it be said here that Dr. Muck, at that time when he had won, as the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a very distinguished following, declared to Major Higginson of Boston, in the most loyal manner possible, that, though he could give no definite promises, he would gladly accept a return engagement as soon as his obligations in Berlin were discharged. Privately he hoped that he could extricate himself from these contracts in Berlin at the end of twelve months. But he was not in a position to make a very determined effort to do this after he discovered that the German emperor did not wish to release him.

Meanwhile, the conditions in the Berlin Royal Opera had become worse instead of better; creditable artistic performances had become the exception, and poor performances had become—and still are—the rule. The Opera House possesses two famous general music directors, Richard Strauss and Dr. Karl Muck. Of their respective merits in musical affairs and their diverse achievements little can be said by way of comparison or parallel.

Dr. Muck can look back upon twenty years of activity on our imperial stage and in that long period this sensitive artist has exerted a sure, steady, and beneficial influence on all the forces under his command. Between Dr. Muck and the Imperial Orchestra the best relations appear to have existed; but an opera house does not consist of an orchestra alone.

The Negotiations

Dr. Muck's contract expired on the first of October, 1912, and he was expected, accordingly, to make it known before the first of January whether or not he intended to depart. The Intendance, however, was not willing to wait so long, and at the end of September of last year presented him with a new contract. The director was, therefore, invited to declare his intentions a quarter of a year beforehand, and the rumors of Dr. Muck's departure began to be noised among outsiders. Shortly before New Year's came an exchange of despatches between Dr. Muck and Major Higginson in which they agreed that nothing now need dissuade them from a public announcement of the engagement. The statement is incorrect that Dr. Muck was engaged to lead the Boston Orchestra for ten years. His contract is for five years only. Likewise it is false that by his departure he forfeits his claims to the pension which accompanies his position here. Dr. Muck is a court functionary and cannot forfeit his pension. Of course while he commands in another position a salary so much higher than the pension stipend no pension will be paid to him. But the moment his other stipends cease his pension as a Prussian court functionary is payable.

The Result

Dr. Muck goes, and he goes to a place where—in contrast to the stubborn prejudices which ride us in Germany—he need make no compromise in the matter of his art. If an ideal position for an orchestral leader exists on this earth Dr. Muck possesses it, and he enters upon it under the most flattering and favorable conditions.

Dr. Muck goes, and what of the Berlin Royal Opera? Dr. Richard Strauss, of late, has seemed scarcely able to find time to direct a pair of symphony concerts by the Court Orchestra. That he will be able after Dr. Muck's departure to devote himself to the directing of opera is highly improbable. Where will another "talent of the first order" be found?

Or are secret preparations to another end in progress? Private Secretary Winter of the Royal Intendance has been preparing for a journey to America to treat with Mr. Gatti-Casazza (of the Metropolitan Opera House) in a sort of card-game between artists. But what will come of it when Mr. Gatti-Casazza holds the hands with all the trumps? Unprejudiced observers could wish that Private Secretary Winter would make a side-trip from New York to Boston and seek the acquaintance of Major Higginson. In him, the private secretary would discern a very cultivated and urbane gentleman who knows exactly what he has, and who has not the slightest intention of lending a talent like that of Dr. Muck as a "guest director" to the Berlin Royal Opera. [August Spanuth, in Die Signale.

[137]

POST, FEBRUARY 10, 1912

CONVERSE'S POEM PLAYED

Cordial Applause Greets Performance by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Frederick S. Converse's symphonic poem, after Zoroaster and others, was performed for the first time in this city. The work was given in St. Louis two weeks ago. It is based upon the wonderful tale of the conflict between Ormazd, god of light, and Ahriman, the prince of darkness, as told in the Zenda Vesta and the Bundehesch of the Parsis. Ahriman and his hosts rise from their realms of darkness to conquer Ormazd and his Fravashis, the spirits of good men. After several conflicts Ormazd and his hosts will triumph. There will be a new heaven and a new earth, and Ahriman, "the backward thinker," will have done as much as his holy opponent to bring about this end. It is hardly necessary to say that the various phases of the legend have not been followed literally. The symphonic poem is based upon the thought of the battle and the ultimate triumph of righteousness. There is plenty of opportunity for noble composition, for dramatic contrast and impressive peroration

Mr. Converse has been most successful in those pages of his work which treat of Ormazd and his hosts and their victory. The final sweeping pages are the most moving in the piece. It is as if Mr. Converse, too, hated the thought of evil and its oppressive shadow, as though he could only truly imagine when he contemplated the ultimate salvation of man. It would be interesting to note the development of the harmonic style of any composer in these days. Mr. Converse has in recent years learned of the Frenchman as well as of others. He has steadily developed, added new colors to his palette, new idiosyncrasies to his manner of composition, a manner which, above all things, remains refined, clean of anything like mere sensuous appeal, and always the mould for a high thought.

There are some remarkable pages of workmanship in his score, and there are pages of true eloquence. The thematic invention is not, as a rule, distinguished, and yet the thought behind the music is often so potent and so refreshingly sincere that even the thinner pages affect the hearer while they remind him, at the same time, of a certain paucity of invention. The theme which remains in the memory, a theme of a Franck-like character, is that which is first exposed by the oboe, if memory serves, after the introductory matter has been well developed. This introduction carries the suggestion of starry space. It is in accordance with what the writer considers Mr. Converse's best vein. In the passages devoted expressly to Ahriman and his hosts the composer becomes unfortunately bombastic. Sizzling passages in the strings and the wood-wind, a whack of the bass drum, and all that sort of thing, does not necessarily convince one that the devil and his crew are flying about. There is, it is true, an ingenious suggestion of the cries of the damned, the scurrying off of a defeated multitude. The pages of the poem which are Mr. Converse's, and which will stand among his best pages, are those which contain, first a serene and compassionate sweetness, and then a triumphal sweep of line, orchestral pomp and panoply. There was cordial applause for the new work.

Warnke the 'Cellist

Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, gave a musicianly and entertaining performance of Lalo's 'cello concerto. Mr. Warnke is not only an experienced but an enthusiastic musician. A 'cello concerto is always a hard task, and oftenest a rather ungrateful one for the soloist. Yesterday Mr. Warnke m[illegible] the most of the substance that he [illegible]pensed. The concerto of Lalo is sli[illegible] and sometimes a little dry. It has, ho[illegible]ever, many of the enjoyable qualit[illegible] of true French music, the orchestrati[illegible] is interesting, the writing for the s[illegible] instrument apparently idiomatic. M[illegible] Warnke was well rewarded for h[illegible] efforts. He had made a 'cello concert[illegible] interesting by a perfectly sound, sane, broadly musical treatment.

Mr. Fiedler is one of the best interpreters of certain moods of Tschaikowsky who have led performances of his music in this city of late years.

The fourth symphony is not so fine a work as the fifth. There are weak pages and tawdry in[illegible]mentation and poorly chosen musica[illegible]terial. But, like the fifth symphony, his work is such a human docume[illegible] that it may hold its own long aft[illegible]e time when other things, better [illegible] have perished.

Wro[illegible]f Himself

It is necess[illegible]o be more than an intellectual to [illegible]erstand Tschaikowsky. It is necessary [illegible]feel him and to realize the trammels [illegible]existence. His music is especially [illegible]ble, because it may show the stro[illegible]he pity, the sorrow and the terror [illegible]he weak. In his own naive, sentimen[illegible]and almost drunkenly emotional fash[illegible] Tschaikowsky wrote of himself and [illegible]rselves in a manner that few of us [illegible]an sincerely condemn or ignore. This, [illegible]spite of the cheapness of some mom[illegible]ts, the catch-trap for applause that is [illegible]rnished by the scherzo.

It was one [illegible] the first occasions in recollection, ye[illegible]terday, that the opening theme of the [illegible]barbaric final movement went down t[illegible]along, the music of a man or a r[illegible], crazy with grief and rum. The fi[illegible]l pages swept everyone away. At the [illegible]oncert's end Mr. Fiedler was called [illegible]k to his stand several

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS, MOZART, ENESCO AND MISS GERHARDT

"Death and Transfiguration," with an Excited Conductor, Orchestra and Audience—A Thrilling Performance of the Finale—Mozart a la Mode—Enesco's Brave New Rhapsody—Miss Gerhardt Sings at Her Best

OVER Miss Gerhardt at her best as a singer and plainly stimulated by the occasion, over a new Roumanian Rhapsody by the interesting Enesco, which often struck fire, over even Mozart's symphony in G minor, which might have been more sympathetically read, Strauss in "Death and Transfiguration" triumphed at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, and Mr. Fiedler was his prophet and his exponent. The tone-poem ended in the final suffusion of its mighty climax. For an instant there was silence, as though the audience were coming back to itself again. Then the applause rang; twice and thrice it recalled the conductor; and then gave to the standing orchestra the applause that it richly deserved. For no very obvious reason, in the usual unaccountable fashion of such things, it was on its mettle yesterday. It was very brilliant of tone and accent in the high colors and the sharp rhythms of Enesco's rhapsody. Mr. Fiedler chose a pace that oftener was breathless than fleet, but the orchestra kept to it, made the music bite, gave it due exotic tang. In Mozart's symphony the wind choir had been beautiful to hear—the soft outward shimmer the plaintive undernote of the music were in the tones. Time and again in it, too, the strings had seemed to outbreathe rather than play their figures, such light tracery of tone did they make of them.

Yet, in Strausss tone-poem and above all in the long and mighty crescendo of the hymn of transfiguration, the orchestra outdid itself. By conductor and men, the introduction was vividly and feelingly conceived and played. The very instruments became as tone-poets. There were the wretched chamber, the wrenching agony, the wan suffering, the feverish tremors, and there were the memories, soft, remote, haunting, that smiled across it. The tone seemed Strausss's music made penetrating, transporting sound. The tone-poem fuses almost perfectly its delineative and emotional purpose with the unfolding of the music that fulfills it. The actual performance yesterday was fused as perfectly with both. The death-agony, the death struggle, the ghostly retravelling of the joys and the pains of life ensued. Once as heretofore, Mr. Fiedler did not subdue and open the orchestral tumult enough to give the phrase of death, its true mystery. He preferred when it smote. The struggle of the expiring spirit lacerated the listening imagination. Then the pause of blacgkness, blankness and stillness.

And then out of these dark places of sorrow, and silence the great, unfolding, upsoaring hymn of the transfiguration. There is no contemporary music to match in sustained magnificance of tone and progression, in the depths of its emotion, in the might and the majesty with which it finds expression. It is Strauss not cerebral (as his detractors say) but inspired, singing his apocalyptic song of final deliverance and freedom and singing it with true German bigness and intensity of ideal emotion. And yesterday conductor and orchestra semeed inspired, too. The sustained upsweeping tone flooded and upbore those that heard. It was as flawless musically as it was impassioned emotionally. The hall seemed filled with it. Conductor, men and orchestra seemed transported by it. Throughout the year there has been no such thrilling moment at the Symphony Concerts. To Strauss was the first glory—for he stood at the highest point of beauty and passion that his music touches; and to Mr. Fiedler and the men, the second glory of complete translation. On occasion with Strauss Mr. Fiedler rises very high.

If Mr. Fiedler could only forget his Strauss, as the orchestra forgot theirs, if he could only subdue his exigent, accenting, big-moulded temperament, when he approaches the music of Mozart, if he were only content to let it speak for itself. Mozart did not write an assertive, but an insinuating music, and it is vain to try to give the finale of this symphony in G minor the exciting accents of contemporary music. To do so makes it seem coarse-fibred, over-strained. It is a finely touched music, even when as in this same finale, it is most nervous. The songful melody soon begins to soothe the uneasy strings. They have not even begun to rasp. And so with the scherzo. The counterpoint is light, tracy, not a sturdy diagram but adroitly ordered arabesques of tone. The trio is the smile of Mozart over them as he sits tranquilly making them. Some one laughed lightly yesterday at the end of the scherzo, and it was the true response to the gladness of the music.

The Andante was the Mozart of his own time and of his own temperament and of no other that so often evades the conductors and the listeners of the twentieth century. Only a few contemporary French poets and composers have continued this Mozartian, this eighteenth-century melancholy. It is pensive and plaintive, never woful and piercing. It would far rather sing beautifully than poignantly. It thinks of the artful breaking of its plaintive song. It knows when to brighten it with little glinting figures. It cannot make its shadowed chords really heavy and dejected. It breathes out the end—and has never lost its elegance. It was in the sunshine and shade of Mozart's quick temperament; it was in the wistful voice of so much of his music when he is not formally dutiful or mechanically gay. It is not a affectation, as it may be with the Frenchmen. It is sentiment sad-eyed; it is elegance wistful. The spirit of it was in the voice of the Paur to Succeed Muck?

A telegram from Berlin hints that Emil Paur, once the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and then of the defunct Pittsburg Orchestra, is under consideration as the successor to Dr. Muck at the Royal Opera in Berlin. If he is appointed conductor there, when Dr. Muck comes to Boston, the coincidence will be curious. In his time in America, Mr. Paur conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ADVERTISER.

CLASSICAL AND MODERN COMPOSERS TOUCH ELBOWS

IN PROGRAMME OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" Splendidly Interpreted—Miss Gerhardt Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
Goetz—"My Strength is spent" from "Taming of the Shrew."
Soloist—Miss Elena Gerhardt.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration," Tone Poem.
Wolf—Three Lieder.
Miss Gerhardt.
Enesco—Roumanian Rhapsody.

An enjoyable programme, in which the classical and modern German composers touched elbows. Mozart's G minor symphony seems never to grow old. Here we have the true voice of Mozart. When he is more ambitious in symphony (always excepting the "Jupiter") he is not the equal of the prattling Haydn. But in the G minor symphony he is his own natural self and the result is what Matthew Arnold would call "Sweetness and Light" translated into music.

Mr. Fiedler read the work excellently, not endeavoring to magnify it unduly, nor to individualize in tempo or shading. It was pleasant, too, to observe how much appreciated the old work was. Each movement aroused some applause and at the end there was something like a recall. It was quite evident that the old had not been abolished by the new in music.

What new thing can be said about Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration?" It wears well, probably the best of the master's symphonic poems. It is always played well when our orchestra gives it, and particularly under Mr. Fiedler, who is one of the best Strauss interpreters in the world. Boston is just now Wagnerizing to an abnormal extent, and it was interesting to listen to Richard Strauss with the memory of "Tristan and Isolde" strong upon one. Then it is that orchestral deftness loses its value and one begins to look at the contents of the work. Now "Death and Transfiguration" has more grand musical ideas in it than "Heldeneleben," or that family circle symphony, or "Don Juan." Place these, or many other ambitious modern works, against a "Tristan and Isolde" prelude, or a "Love-death," and they all fade out woefully. The chief fault of the modern school since Wagner may be summed up in this impeachment—a lack of true and sustained musical ideas.

"Death and Transfiguration," however, has something more than orchestral glamour and clamour. Its grand contrasts, its striking figures (worthy of a Wagner at times), the massive climaxes, the fitness of the music to its subject, all combine to make a work that is simply monumental, and possibly marks Strauss' zenith.

The performance requires stronger adjectives than are in the font of type. It was as powerful as anything ever heard in Symphony hall. The freedom and elasticity with which the composition was given was wonderful, and one never thought of its difficulties, because they were so well concealed. The applause at the close was loud and long-continued, until finally the orchestra was ordered to rise in response to it. In the midst of all the great German music we are having at present, this performance of Strauss' masterpiece was memorable.

Miss Elena Gerhardt made such a genuine success recently in a recital of German "Lieder," that her appearance in the Symphony concerts was awaited with interest by very many. The glory of her work is that she does not exaggerate or distort the songs. She lets the composer's music tell its own story without individualizing it. Not every great artist does this. We have recently had two great artists (who had won real triumphs in the larger and more ambitious forms) spoil several smaller works by sentimentalizing them. From this fault Miss Gerhardt is fortunately free. Her interpretation of Hugo Wolf's "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit," and "Er ist's" were all good specimens of lied-singing. Only we would have enjoyed these little gems better in a smaller hall. A violet is scarcely displayed at its best in a 10-acre lot, and even an orchestral accompaniment does not magnify these songs to the Symphony concert repertoire.

The operatic selection given was more fitting, and this taste of "The Taming of the Shrew" reminded us of how many important works in the operatic field are yet waiting for the first Boston performance. Glinka's "Life for the Czar," Smetana's "Sold Bride," Hugo Wolf's "Corregidor," and a host of other old works which are historically famous, have not yet been heard here.

Miss Gerhardt sang with feeling, directness and breadth. She was powerful in every climax. She did not dally with the shading of the "Lieder." Only a frequent tremolo may be recorded as a fault. She was recalled again and again, with much enthusiasm at the end of the group of songs, and the operatic aria was also suc-

AMERICAN, FEBRUARY 10, 1912

NEW CONVERSE SYMPHONY GIVEN

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

"Ormazd," the latest composition of Frederick S. Converse, composer of "The Sacrifice" and "The Pipe of Desire," was performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

"Ormazd" is a symphonic poem. A charming poetic program has been written for it by Percy Mackaye, but Converse does not emphasize the program side of it. If you like you may think of the music as detailed description of the three assaults upon Ormazd and his heavenly host by Ahriman and the powers of the Abyss, as told in Persian mythology. If not, consider it merely as the struggle between good and evil in your own soul.

Converse has written music that is worth listening to. It possesses the technical excellence that is to be expected from him, and it contains extremely effective melodies and rhythms.

He is still true to the guiding theme, and makes brilliant use of a number of life motives. The character of the orchestration is in keeping with the subject; it is spiritual, and is made so by unconventional and uncommonplace harmonies and rhythms.

The march of the heavenly hosts would not suit at all a regiment of militia, and the song of the saved souls could not be well sung by ordinary church choirs.

As usual, the good people get rather monotonous, while the fiends are picturesque and ingenious in their wickedness. Their three surges against the portals of Bliss are splendidly described in the music.

Mr. Converse was in the audience, but made his escape while the applause was still strong.

The soloist yesterday was Heinrich Warnke, who played the cello concerto by Edouard Lalo, a work infrequently heard here, which is at the same time bizarre and tedious, interesting and boresome.

The symphony was the beautiful Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

POST, FEBRUARY 18, 1912

Symphony Orchestra on 4th Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on the fourth southern trip of the season. It will give its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, and on Monday night, the 26th, the third and last concert of the season in Hartford. Anton Witek will be the soloist in Philadelphia and Washington, while at the Thursday night concert in New York Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist and on Saturday afternoon in the same city, Alwin Schroeder. Bessie Bell Collier will be the soloist in Brooklyn, and Kathleen Parlow in Hartford.

POST, FEBRUARY 11, 1912

Sixteenth Symphony Programme

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer of songs, who has appeared twice so successfully in recital in Jordan Hall, will be the soloist at the 16th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. Her first number will be the popular aria from Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew," the first words of which are "My Strength is Spent." Her second number will consist of three of Hugo Wolf's songs sung with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ista."

Mr. Fiedler places on this programme another of his promised novelties—Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major, Op. 11, No 1. This will be its first performance in Boston, and it is one of the latest of this Roumanian composer's works. The other numbers on the programme consist of Mozart's Symphony in G-minor and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

HERALD, FEBRUARY 10, 1912.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Goetz, Air from "The Taming of the Shrew" (Miss Elena Gerhardt, soprano); Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Hugo Wolf, songs with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit," "Er ist's" (Miss Gerhardt); Enesco, Rhapsodie Roumaine in A major op. 11, No. 1.

GLOBE— FEBRUARY 18, 1912.

Symphony Orchestra's Trip.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on the fourth Southern trip of the season. It will give its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, and on Monday night, Feb 26, the third and last concert of the season, in Hartford.

Anton Witek will be the soloist in Philadelphia and Washington, while at the Thursday night concert in New York Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist, and on Saturday afternoon, in the same city, Alwin Schroeder. Bessie Bell Collier will be the soloist in Brooklyn and Kathleen Parlow in Hartford.

[138]

AMERICAN

FEBRUARY 17, 1912.

ELENA GERHARDT AT SYMPHONY CONCERT WINS NEW SUCCESS

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Elena Gerhardt, the German singer of songs, was soloist at the Symphony Concert yesterday. It was a hodge podge sort of program, for it contained a Mozart Symphony, the G Minor; Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," three songs by Hugo Wolf, an operatic scene from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" and Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody No. 1.

The Enesco rhapsody is distinctly light music. It is founded on lively Roumanian folk tunes which the composer has set in clever instrumentation. The only criticism is that it is too long-winded. Enesco keeps repeating his pretty tunes until you wish he wouldn't.

Miss Gerhardt came here almost unknown and won Boston by several remarkable recitals of German songs. In the concert yesterday she offered an operatic scene and aria which had once before been sung at these concerts by Miss Gertrude Franklin in 1894. It is not impressive, either dramatically or melodiously, and it is saying much for Miss Gerhardt's powers that she made it endurable.

She sang the Wolf songs very winningly, with fine tonal quality and expression.

The Mozart Symphony was played with the usual delightful effect and the Strauss poem was overpowering as ever.

AMERICAN—

FEBRUARY 18, 1912.

ORCHESTRA ON TOUR.

Symphony Gives Concerts as Far South as Baltimore.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on the fourth Southern trip of the season. It will give its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York and on Monday night, February 26, the third and last concert of the season in Hartford. Anton Witek will be the soloist in Philadelphia and Washington, while at the Thursday night concert in New York Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist and on Saturday afternoon in the same city Alwin Schroeder. Bessie Bell Collier will be the soloist in Brooklyn and Kathleen Parlow in Hartford.

HERALD,

FEBRUARY 11, 1912.

MAGGIE TEYTE'S RECITAL

A recital of French songs will be given in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock by Maggie Teyte, lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, whom Mr. C. A. Ellis is bringing to Boston. This will be Miss Teyte's first appearance in this city. The recitals given in Chicago and New York this year have won for her warm praise from the critics. The program for Boston is especially interesting because it is composed, with one exception, of ultra-modern French songs and is largely given to Debussy. Miss Teyte has made a specialty of these songs, and many in this city are interested in French music. Charles Wark will accompany. The program as now determined is as follows:

De Greve, Clair de Lune, La Chevelure
De Soir.....Debussy
Extase.....Duparc
L'Ane Blanc.....Hue
Les Fontaines.....Hahn
Le Manoir de Rosemonde.....Duparc
Air d'Azael ("L'Enfant Prodigue"), Debussy
C'est l'extase langoureuse, Il pleure dans mon coeur, L'ombre des arbres, Fantoches, Aquarelle, No. 1, Green Debussy

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 10, 1912

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

ENESCO'S music interests Mr. Fiedler, and the one piece by the Franco-Roumanian composer that he has thus far put on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts has interested the audiences, too. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will venture a second piece, a "Roumanian Rhapsody," recently written and based presumably upon Roumanian folk-melodies. With the symphony in G minor, Mr. Fiedler will pay the annual tribute of the Symphony Concerts to Mozart, and with Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," he will repeat the best-liked of the composer's pieces and one that the conductor reads eloquently. For the first time, moreover, Miss Gerhardt will sing here with orchestra and no doubt with the amplitude of voice and feeling that characterize her in song recitals. One of her numbers is an air from Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," better known in Germany than in America. The others are orchestral versions of three of Wolf's songs — "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ists."

MONITOR,

FEBRUARY 17, 1912

The Symphony orchestra leaves Sunday night on the fourth southern trip of the season. It will give its usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York and on Monday night, Feb. 26, its third and last concert in Hartford. Anton Witek will be the soloist in Philadelphia and Washington, while at the Thursday night concert in New York Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist and on Saturday afternoon in the same city Alwin Schroeder. Miss Bessie Bell Collier will be soloist in Brooklyn and Miss Kathleen Parlow in Hartford.

GLOBE

FEBRUARY 11, 1912.

Maggie Teyte's First Recital Here Wednesday

One of the most interesting musical events of the season will be the recital of French songs to be given in Jordan Hall next Wednesday afternoon by Maggie Teyte, the principal lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, whom Mr C. A. Ellis is bringing to Boston. This will be Miss Teyte's first appearance in this city and the program she has prepared is composed, with one exception, of ultra-modern French songs and is largely given to Debussy.

Miss Teyte has rather made a specialty of these songs and with the considerable public of this city that is interested in French music the recital should be a success. Miss Teyte will have as her accompanist Mr Charles Wark.

Three sections of the program will be devoted to Debussy's songs, the other selections being: "Extase," Duparc; "L'Ane blanc," Hue; "Les Fontaines," Reynaldo Hahn, and "Le Manoir de Rosemonde," Duparc.

Elena Gerhardt This Week's Symphony Soloist

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, who has appeared twice so successfully in recital in Jordan Hall, will be the soloist at the 16th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively.

Her first number will be the aria from Goetz' "The Taming of the Shrew," the first words of which are "My Strength is Spent." Her second number will consist of three of Hugo Wolf's songs, sung with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ists."

Mr Fiedler places on this program another of his promised novelties—Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, op 11, No. 1. This will be its first performance in Boston and it is one of the latest of this Roumanian composer's works.

The other numbers comprise Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

HERALD,

FEBRUARY 17, 1912.

MISS GERHARDT IN FINE VOICE

Singing Adds to Pleasure of the Audience at Symphony Rehearsal.

ORCHESTRA IS APPLAUDED

Performance of Mozart's Symphony in G Is Greatly Enjoyed.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral pieces played were Mozart's Symphony in G minor; Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1. Miss Elena Gerhardt, who made her first appearance at these concerts, sang the scena, "My Strength Is Spent," from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" and three songs by Hugo Wolf with orchestral accompaniment: "The Friend," "Secrecy," and "'Tis Spring."

Enesco's rhapsody was played here for the first time. It is one of three based on Roumanian airs. This rhapsody is a light-hearted piece that makes its way by frank tunefulnes, liveliness of pace and plausibly brilliant instrumentation. There is, however, a monotony in tonality, and after the first half of the composition the invention of Enesco flags. There is apparently endless repetition and there is an unwillingness to bring the end. The rhapsody would be more effective if it were shortened, and even then it would not have the distinction of the better Hungarian rhapsodies by Liszt. As it stands, it is better suited to a promenade than to a Symphony concert. The themes themselves are inherently of little interest, but the composer has presented them clothed in holiday and varied attire.

The performance of the Symphony was much enjoyed, and there was hearty applause especially after the Minuet. Mr. Fiedler gave a dramatic reading of Strauss's tone poem with its feverish anguish, its pathetic memories of life about to end, and the sonorous close with the majesty that ennobles the humblest after he knows the one great secret.

Miss Gerhardt's voice was in excellent condition and she sang skilfully and with true expression. The scena from Goetz's opera has not been heard here for many years. The lyrical portion is more significant than the dramatic which precedes, and the beauty of Miss Gerhardt's voice and her sympathetic delivery made a deep impression. The songs by Wolf are better suited to a smaller hall, with the possible exception of "'Tis Spring" and they are more effective with the original accompaniment for piano. The instrumentation of "The Friend" is singularly disagreeable, and the intimacy of "Secrecy" is impaired. Miss Gerhardt's singing of the last named song was admirable in every way.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for March 1 and 2 will be as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont;" Brahms, symphony No. 2; Liszt, piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

JOURNAL-

FEBRUARY 13, 1912.

Maggie Teyte to Give A Recital Tomorrow

The recital of French songs which Maggie Teyte of the Chicago Opera Company is to give in Jordan Hall tomorrow afternoon should be the most interesting musical event of the week. For all those who are interested in modern French music the program will be most attractive.

It contains fourteen numbers. Debussy is represented by his songs "De Greve," "Clair de Lune," "La Chevelure," and "De Soir," "C'est l'extase langoureuse," "Il pleure dans mon coeur," "L'ombre des arbres," "Fantoches" and "Aquarelle, No. 1," and by the aria of Azael from "L'Enfant Prodigue." The other songs will be Duparc's "Extase," Hue's "L'Ane blanc," Reynaldo Hahn's "Les Fontaines," and Duparc's "Le Manoir de Rosemonde."

GLOBE

FEBRUARY 17, 1912

ELENA GERHARDT AT THE SYMPHONY

Rhapsody by Enesco Heard First Time in Boston.

Mr Fiedler Achieves Fine Climax in "Death and Transfiguration."

Miss Elena Gerhardt was soloist at the 16th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Not for some time has singing of such distinction been heard at these concerts. This is not to imply that Miss Gerhardt is heard most profitably to her art or to the pleasure of the hearer in a large hall and with an orchestra. It is true, her art is built upon so sure a foundation of technic and intelligence that this more imposing frame for her singing does not destroy its musical character, but as skillful vocalist and as illuminating colorist and interpreter, Miss Gerhardt sings with a finesse which shows its true and exquisite qualities in a small rather than a large hall, and in songs with piano.

Miss Gerhardt sang the soliloquy from "The Taming of the Shrew," opera by Goetz, third scene of the fourth act, in which Katharine ponders her incorrigible ways toward Petruchio, and determines to have no more of them. It is pleasing music and it arouses curiosity as to the quality of the opera which the ill-fated American opera enterprise conducted by Theodore Thomas brought to performance in English in New York in the 80's.

Yesterday there was occasion particularly to notice in this excerpt the dimensions of Miss Gerhardt's voice and the purity of her tone. It was a demonstration of what perfect control of breath and of resonance from overtone will do to permit a voice not large or robust by nature to yet make itself effective in music of a dramatic nature in a large auditorium and with an orchestra.

Beside the lovliness of quality, particularly of the upper voice, there was again the apt and telling use of color and the emotional aids of variety in attack and inflection of tone and the expressive use of the nuances.

These attributes were the more apparent in the group of songs by Hugo Wolf. There was a deep and strong spirituality in Der Freund. Unfortunately, the eager confidence which the singer wished to infuse into the last line was ruined by a tardily conducted accompaniment.

Wolf rarely wrote a strophied song, or one in which the accompaniment is restrained to a mere harmonic and basic support for the voice, but his Verborgenheit is a song of a fine sincerity and reticence for these qualities. It gave the best opportunity of the afternoon to observe Miss Gerhardt as a mistress of lieder. The upspringing, rhapsodic "Er est's" is too intimate, too resilient, too fleeting in its ecstasy of Spring to be encumbered by an orchestra. Sensitivity and precision of rhythm rather than an orchestral palette of color are its requisites. The singer has been heard in it to better effect with piano. Miss Gerhardt was highly appreciated by her audience, and was recalled many times.

The novelty of the program was the first performance in Boston of Enosco's Rhapsodic Roumaine in A major, op II, No. 1. When played at the promenade concerts in London last Fall, the Telegraph could discover "no trace of inspiration in it," even less than that apparent in the composer's earlier works.

The musical ideas are evolved from Roumanian folk tunes and all promises well for a time. The preluding by clarinet and oboe is pleasantly naive, and the successive episodes which might be a nursery rhyme and a gay waltz are simple but enlivening in melody and their obvious but spirited rhythms. They are scored with evident taste and skill in orchestral color.

Later the composer achieves an imposing and precipitate climax like a headlong locomotive stopped on the verge of a chasm, but bucolic hilarity tends to run riot and the latter pages have less to say. Mr Fiedler permitted himself to conduct with some imagination and elasticity, and made the piece diverting even at the end of a program in which much had gone before.

The other orchestral pieces were Mozart's Symphony in G minor and the "Death and Transfiguration." Both declared the discriminating intelligence and virtuosity of the orchestra, and both offered strange problems in Mr Fiedler's conducting.

He made the apotheosis of the Strauss, those unearthly and transporting measures of the transfiguration, a thing of broad and uplifting emotional sweep. It was for the moment admirable conducting. Shortly before in the symphony, he led the minuet with little suggestion of its elegant and graceful precision, and the last movement had little of the clarity and buoyancy of Mozart. The tone poem was the feature, and the audience appreciated and applauded heartily.

POST,

FEBRUARY 17, 1912

NEW WORK BY SYMPHONY

Enesco's Rhapsody Performed for First Time Here

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Elena Gerhardt was soloist. The orchestral pieces were Mozart's G minor Symphony, Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A major, op. II, No. 1, performed for the first time in Boston.

The Mozart symphony is amazingly dramatic, as one listens to the music and grasps the emotion that lies underneath the Hellenic beauty and serenity of the classic style. There is genuine sequence of moods as well as themes, and the slow movement begins where other slow movements stop.

But what is the use of talking. You might listen forever to Mozart symphony, and you would be far indeed from the tremendous tone-painting of Strauss and his transcendant spiritual power. We cannot be reasonably asked to substitute the music of yesterday for today. We are not to blame if this, the music of Strauss fills and completes us more than the wonderfully beautiful music of Mozart. It is a new voice of tremendous import. Nor need we trouble ourselves about the durability of Strauss' music. It is the grandest music being written today. It stamps the composer as one of the great master-minds of the century. It compels the homage of the listener, and whenever it is placed on a programme it towers clean over everything else that is heard. Tomorrow is tomorrow. We are concerned with today. Mr. Fielder read the tone-poem with the most contagious conviction and enthusiasm, and he was recalled several times on account of this performance.

Miss Gerhardt Well Received

Miss Gerhardt sang three songs of Wolff, which are well known and liked, and sang them admirably. These songs were "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit," "Er Ists," and she also sang a scene from Goetz' opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," which has been rarely heard in this country. It is good music of the better German type, and it shows Katrina less a shrew than she appeared to be. Miss Gerhardt did not give this music the distinction that she gave the Wolff songs, with her admirable declamation and her beautiful singing of sustained passages. The music, however, came in the right place, for if it had followed Strauss' piece it would have perished on the instant. As it was, the music of Goetz provided an amiable moment, and after her performances Miss Gerhardt was well applauded.

Enesco's Rhapsody is a coruscating arrangement of dance tunes of the Roumanian peasantry. It is reasonable to suppose that the composer was present, more than once, at some of the dances in the country, and he has put such an experience down on paper, just about as it saluted his ears. There is too much material in this Rhapsody, and there is little development of the themes. The intention of the composer has been obviously to transcribe as faithfully as possible, in detail and in spirit, what befell at a festival in Roumania.

Of Gypsy Character

There is a gypsy character to most of the themes, some of which are profusely or extravagantly ornamented. The virtue of the thing, and its appeal, is the fact that it smells so strongly of the sod. There is no hyper refinement; there is no devitalizing or polishing up of the original tunes. They fly by in rotation, faster and faster; wilder and wilder, with capricious changes of rhythm, sudden pianissimos and mad bursts of tone, and whirling figures that set off the flight of the main melodies. And the orchestra—this is the only place wherein the composer has given his great modern technic full play—is amazingly sure and clear and brilliant, bristling with all sorts of strange effects. In doing this, Enesco has again served his own purpose, for he has employed his knowledge solely with the means of obtaining a close resemblance to the sounds of the country bands and has succeeded, one is led to believe, in reproducing them with surprising fidelity.

As we have said, the shortcoming of the piece, to the ears of the trained musician, is its superabundance of themes, and the lack of musical evolution of this material. But the piece, as a whole, was rarely entertaining. Not as imaginative or as poetic a fantasy on folk-tunes of Roumania as is Henry F. Gilbert's cruder but more poetic overture on negro melodies, yet a highly effective and agreeable piece for the finale of a concert, and the work of an orchestrator who certainly knows his business.

JOURNAL

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date FEB 11 1912

Miss Marie Therese Brazeau was the guest of Concertmeister Anton Witek of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Witek at a musicale which took place on Friday afternoon at their home, The Ilkley, Boston, Mass.

Fests

Miss Mildred Rounds, who formerly

[139]

JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 17, 1912.

SYMPHONY OFFERS VARIETY PROGRAM

Elena Gerhardt Makes Her Debut as Soloist With the Orchestra.

Talk about variety! There is enough of it in this week's Symphony attractions to satisfy the largest family in Boston. Everyone went away from yesterday's concert pleased with at least one of the five numbers.

For those that still dote on the old music there is the graceful Mozart symphony in G minor, about which they tell the famous Lachner-Liszt story. Liszt was after playing his own colossal transcription of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." "You are a perfect magician," said Lachner to the Weimar hero. "Think of playing literally everything in the second movement and with only ten figers! But I can tell you one thing even you can't play, with all your magicianship." "What's that?" asked Liszt. "The first sixteen measures of Mozart' little G minor symphony, simple as they are." "I think you are right," remarked the greatest of pianists, with a laugh. "I should need a third hand. I should need both my hands for the accompaniment alone, with that viola figure in it."

It is a little gem of a symphony, occupying not more than half an hour. Not for five years has it been on a Symphony program. After the applause for it had ended the soloist of this week's concert, Miss Elena Gerhardt, made her debut with the Symphony Orchestra here, singing the scene, "My Strength is Spent," from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew"—the scene in which Katherine, dumbfounded to hear Petruchio raging over every dish she has put before him, promises to be good. This has not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1894. Later Miss Gerhardt sang three of Hugo Wolf's songs with that rare eloquence which has placed her among the foremost lieder singers of the day.

The second part of the program began with Strauss's marvelously graphic tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," played so well that the orchestra was applauded until it rose, and ended with a jolly novelty, Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine"—real "Pop" music of high order and performed with a virtuoso brilliancy that made the number worth while.

MONITOR,

FEBRUARY 10, 1912

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, presented its fifteenth program at Symphony hall Friday afternoon, interpreting Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Lalo's concerto for violoncello and Converse's new symphonic poem, "Ormazd." The soloist was Heinrich Warnke, of the first 'cello desk of the orchestra. The important number on the program was the symphony, which Mr. Fiedler read in his best manner. But the solo piece was ably performed and calls for sympathetic consideration in a review, even if the instrument which held the center of the platform makes a comparatively ineffectual figure in that situation.

Why should not a player do well when he has to think of only one string? Yes, we will wait for the cellist to perfect the tuning of his A. He comes on the platform, victorious at last in the green-room struggle for a perfect adjustment of tensions. He sits down at the left hand of the conductor, asks the concert-master for a touch of soprano A, makes a sweep of his bow to verify his octave, and is ready to begin. Preparations such as these are of as deep concern to concert enthusiasts as they are to the soloist himself. The listener uninitiated into the ways of an instrument like the cello may think it should have all been done the day before the concert instead of after the ringing of the corridor bell at the close of intermission. But Mr. Warnke means not to miss his tone on so much as one unimportant note in the course of his performance; and the slightest yielding to anybody's impatience might spoil for him his greatest day in the Symphony calendar. And all this bother is to get one string ready to make music. How can much music come from one string anyway?

There are five solo strings in the violin family and four of these belong to the violin itself. The fifth belongs to the cello. It is safe to say that without this fifth solo string the violin family would never have been able to develop the art form known as the string quartet; and if it is safe to say that, it is reasonable to add that without the A string of the violoncello the art form

AMERICAN

FEBRUARY 11, 1912.

ELENA GERHARDT SOLOIST.

Distinguished German Singer to Appear at Symphony Concert.

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer of songs who has appeared twice so successfully in recital in Jordan Hall, will be the soloist at the sixteenth public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. Her first number will be the popular arin from Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew," the first words of which are "My Strength Is Spent." Her second number will consist of three of Hugo Wolf's songs sung with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Ists."

Mr. Fiedler places on this program another of his promised novelties—Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A-Major, Op. 11, No. 1. This will be its first performance in Boston and it is one of the latest of this Roumanian composer's works. The other numbers on the program comprise Mozart's Symphony in G-Minor and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 16, 1912

Since Mme. Samaroff is unable to appear at the Symphony Concerts of March 1 and 2, Mr. Gebhard, the pianist, has been engaged in her stead. He will play Liszt's Concerto in A major—the second, the less familiar, and the more subtle of the pair. Not before has Mr. Gebhard appeared as a full-fledged "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, though some years ago he played at them the exacting pianoforte part in Mr Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." The probabilities are that not for a year will Mme. Samaroff be able to play in public. Under the strain of recent appearances, her heart weakened again.

TRAVELER,

FEBRUARY 10, 1912.

MAGGIE TEYTE'S RECITAL.

In many ways the most interesting musical event of the season will be the recital of French songs in Jordan Hall next Wednesday at 3 P. M. by Maggie Teyte, the principal lyric soprano of the Chicago Opera Company. This will be Miss Teyte's first appearance in Boston. The programme is composed, with one exception, of ultra-modern French songs and is largely given to Debussy. Miss Teyte will have as her accompanist Charles Wark.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, will be the soloist at the 16th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Her first number will be the popular aria from Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew," the first words of which are "My strength is spent." Her second number will consist of three of Hugo Wolf's songs sung with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and Er ists."

Mr. Fiedler places on this programme another of his promised novelties—Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A-major, Op. 11, No. 1 This will be its first performance in Boston. The other numbers on the programme comprise Mozart's Symphony in G-minor and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

MONITOR,

FEBRUARY 3, 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its next concerts on Friday afternoon, Feb. 9, and Saturday evening, Feb. 10. Mr. Warnke, who shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cello section of the orchestra, will be soloist, playing Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra in D minor. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fourth in F minor, a favorite because of its pizzicato scherzo.

JOURNAL-

FEBRUARY 15, 1912.

The appearance of Elena Gerhardt at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening lends unusual interest to this week's program. Miss Gerhardt will sing the aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from Goetz's "The Taming of the Shrew," and three of Hugo Wolf's songs, with orchestral accompaniment, "Der Freunde," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ists." Mr. Fiedler has placed a novelty on the program in Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody in A major. The other numbers will be Mozart's C minor symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date FEB 10 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its concerts on February 22 and 24, aside from having Miss Geraldine Farrar and Alwyn Schroeder as soloists, will include Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Schumann's Second Symphony in C.

From Evening Record

Address Schenectady, N.Y.

Date FEB 6 - 1912

Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played to about 2,000 people in the armory last night and added just about 2,000 times two hours of happiness to the sum of joy possessed by the people of Schenectady. From the quiet of rapt attention that prevailed while the great leader was playing the soft-toned parts on his orchestra and the loud, quick applause at the end of each splendid number it was evident that every one in the big drill sh[illegible] was getting real enjoyment from the fine music. From about 7:30 o'clock people poured into the armory for nearly an hour.

Beethoven's "Leonora" overture made a very beautiful introduction for the Boston Symphony in Schenectady. Though many regretted that no real "symphony" had been put on the program, it only made hearers feel more strongly that the Boston Symphony must come again and play more and, if our luck is good, some of last night's program again. In that "Leonora," which is one of the finest things ever written for that highest medium of musical expression, the orchestra, one found what the Boston Symphony's work meant. Other orchestras may approach the Boston players' work, but no concert ever given in Schenectady was like last night's.

Max Fiedler, the leader, on his first appearance was greeted with polite applause, because he was the leader, but later the applause came because of his wonderfully fascinating leadership of that great orchestra. One really felt that he was playing on a tremendous instrument.

The pianist, Olga Samaroff-Stokowski, played Grieg's concerto in A minor, three movements. It is a very interesting and beautiful composition. It gave the player opportunity to come nearer to the audience in the expressive style that she possesses more than most do. This feeling and charm were especially noticeable in the adagio. Besides being a delight to listen to, the pianist was charming to see, looking like a figure just stepped out of a gorgeous Russian painting, with her pretty dark face and her dress of many colors.

The second part of the program was a feast of Wagner music, four very characteristic selections representing probably the greatest music composition yet attained. "The Meistersingers" prelude came appropriately first. One heard the familiar "prize song" and the numerous "leit motiven" of this prelude, if one was lucky enough to have heard it often enough to recognize these expressive little phrases that mean so much. But in this, and more especially in the compositions heard later, one realized again what the defenders of the once maligned inventor of the "leit motiven" always said, that if one has not had the opportunity or memory to learn these phrases the music is so expressive of magnificent moods and passions that it stirs the imagination and feeling anyway.

The Lohengrin prelude with its "grail" motive singing in on the violins and all through the beautiful composition was a rare delight to hear. The "Tristan and Isolde" prelude and the lovely sad music of the "Liebestod" scene were played, and one wondered if one could stand any more of this wonderful beauty. Then came the "Tannhauser" overture, with such splendid dramatic tone pictures and unbelievably beautiful effects that one knew that the last was best, a splendid ending of a concert that it was one of the real privileges of life to hear.

It would seem as if last night's audience would dispel the impression that Schenectady does not respond to a big offering in music, and it would be safe to predict that if the Boston Symphony orchestra can be brought to this city next year and the impressario will build an additional wing on the armory, Schenectady people will fill it.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

RECORD

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date FEB 11 1912

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19, the public of Philadelphia will make the acquaintance of Anton Witek, concert-master of the Orchestra, in the capacity of soloist. Like Hess, Wendling and Kneisel, the three greatest of his predecessors, Witek is a violin virtuoso of highest rank. His appearances in Boston and New York have aroused a high degree of enthusiasm among the critics and connoisseurs of those cities. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The Symphony will be Beethoven's B-flat No. 4

Estab

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 11 1912

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19, the public of Philadelphia will make the acquaintance of Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, in the capacity of soloist. Like Hess, Wendling and Kneisel, the three greatest of his predecessors, Witek is a violin virtuoso of highest rank. His appearances in Boston and New York have aroused a high degree of enthusiasm among the critics and connoisseurs of those cities. Here he will play the Brahms concerto. The symphony will be Beethoven's in B flat No. 4.

Esta

[140]

TRIBUNE

From

Address New York

Date FEB 12 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts which are to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 22 and Saturday afternoon, February 24, will present as soloists Geraldine Farrar on Thursday evening and Elwin Schroeder at the Saturday afternoon concert. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhäuser" as her first number, and a group of songs, Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme"; Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Mr. Schroeder on Saturday afternoon will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra. The symphony on Thursday evening will be Beethoven's fourth, and on Saturday afternoon Schumann's second in C major.

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, violinist, has been chosen as soloist for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 23. She will play the Saint-Saëns Concerto in B minor. The symphony will be César Franck's in D minor.

Esta

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date FEB 14 19[illegible]

[illegible] the public until Feb. 25.

Symphony Concert.

In the audience at the fourth Symphony concert in Infantry Hall last night were: Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Col. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Rev. and Mrs. Frank W. Crowder, Mr. F. L. Hinckley, Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. Joseph Bridgham, the Misses Bridgham, Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hall Brown, Mr. and Mrs. S. Eugene Jackson, Mrs. William McDonald, Jr., Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Anne Henshaw, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs Walter J. Comstock, Miss Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mrs. F. Ellis Jackson, Miss Georgia Frances Fiske, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Holmes, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. F. W. Allen, Mrs. Richmond Allen, Dr. and Mrs. Edward B. Harvey, Miss Evangeline Larry, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mrs. J. J. Finnigan, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Helen Tyler Grant.

From STANDARD UNION 1912

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

At its fourth concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Feb. 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer as soloist Miss Bessie Bell Collier, who is the foremost of the younger generation of American violinists. Miss Collier is not unknown in Brooklyn, where she has played a number of times with much success, and the opportunity to hear her with orchestra will be welcomed by her many friends and admirers. She will play the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor. Mr. Fiedler has made another of his inimitable programmes which begins with the Mendelssohn overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," after which will come Franck's symphony in D minor. The second part of the programme will comprise the Saint-Saens concerto and Tschaikowsky's "82" overture. If it be true that the final test of great music is difficulty of comprehension at first and increasing admiration for it with repeated hearings, Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor must justly rank among the masterpieces of the times. When it was first played a matter of a dozen years ago, it was pronounced as obscure, unmeaning and formless. In fact, it was difficult for the critics, professional and lay, to find any good qualities in it. To-day this remarkable work has come into its own. For example, Manhattan has had no less than four performances of it during the current season, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played it seven or eight times is various cities since last October. What was at first obscure in the idiom of the great Belgian has now become clear, and recognition is given to the fact that it contains some of the most beautiful melodies in the whole realm of symphonic music. Conductor Max Fiedler has been especially fortunate with this work, his interpretation of it rising to very great heights.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB [illegible]

Esta

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 19, the public of Philadelphia will make the acquaintance of Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, in the capacity of soloist. Like Hess, Wendling and Kneisel, the three greatest of his predecessors, Witek is a violin virtuoso of highest rank. His appearances in Boston and New York have aroused a high degree of enthusiasm among the critics and connoisseurs of those cities. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The symphony will be Beethoven's in B flat No. 4.

From EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date FEB 11 1912

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, a brilliant young native violinist, is to be soloist for the fourth Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 23. She will play the Saint-Saens "Concerto in B Minor." The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D-minor, with which Conductor Fiedler has had brilliant results.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date FEB - 7 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be at Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 13, at 8:15 o'clock, for the fourth concert of the series, and will present as soloist the brilliant English pianist, Katharine Goodson, who is now making her third tour of this country. Miss Goodson was recently soloist with the orchestra in Boston and won her usual success, for of all the women pianists that come to this country none has gained a more loyal following than she.

Here she will play the charming Grieg concerto. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." The seats go on sale at Steinert's Saturday morning.

From PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall will present only one work of novel interest, and that on Thursday evening. It is a Roumanian rhapsody in A major, No. 1, opus 11, by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, who has been favored in the last two years with several performances of his works—notably a suite and a symphony. The rhapsody is one of the latest of his works, and won favorable comment when it was played in Boston.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will then make her only appearance here this season in concert. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser" and four songs with piano accompaniment. Here is Thursday's programme: Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven, symphony in B flat, No. 4; Wagner, Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhaeuser"; Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Songs with piano—Schumann, "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme"; Sinding, "Sylvelin"; Grieg, "Ein Traum"; Enesco, Roumanian rhapsody in A major, opus 11, No. 1.

On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococco Theme, and the orchestra will contribute Schumann's Symphony in C major, No. 2; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

From STAATSZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date

Das dritte Paar der Boston-Symphonie-Konzerte sind für kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. Samstag Nachmittag angekündigt. Die einzige Novität, die Donnerstag gespielt wird, ist die „Rumänische Rhapsodie" von George Enesco op. 11. Der Donnerstag bringt ferner Beethoven's Vierte Symphonie und Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung", wozu Frl. Farrar, deren einziges diesjähriges Konzertauftreten bei dieser Gelegenheit gefeiert wird, Elisabeths Gebet aus dem „Tannhäuser" und Lieder von Schumann, Sinding und Grieg singen wird. Am Samstag dirigirt Herr Fiedler Schumann's Zweite Symphonie, Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel" und Wagner's „Holländer"-Ouverture. Der Solist ist Herr Alwin Schroeder, der bekannte Cellist, welcher Tschaikowsky's „Variationen über ein Rococo-Thema" zum Vortrag bringen

From PRESS
Address New York
Date

Farrar with Boston Orchestra.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 22, and Saturday afternoon, February 24 next, will present as soloists Geraldine Farrar on Thursday evening and Alwin Schroeder on Saturday afternoon. Miss Farrar will sing Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser" and a group of songs—Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Schroeder on Saturday afternoon will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococco Theme for violoncello and orchestra. The symphony on Thursday evening will be Beethoven's Fourth, on Saturday afternoon Schumann's second in C major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From N. Y. Call
Address
Date FEB 18 1912

FRANCK D-MINOR SYMPHONY AND VIOLIN CONCERTO OF SAINT-SAENS CONCERTO FIGURE ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM—LECTURE RECITAL ON ARAB POETRY AND CHANTS.

Cesar Franck's D-minor symphony, always a favorite of New York music lovers, will be read by Max Fielder at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday evening, and the overture to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Tscharkowsky "1812" overture will be other works to be essayed by the band from "down East."

The soloists of the program will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier, who will render Saint-Saens' concerto (in B-minor, No. 3, opus 61) for violin and orches-

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, which are to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 22, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 24, will present as soloists Geraldine Farrar on Thursday evening and Alwin Schroeder at the Saturday afternoon concert. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's prayer, from "Tannhäuser" as her first number, and a group of songs—Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin," and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Mr. Schroeder on Saturday afternoon will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra. The symphony on Thursday evening will be Beethoven's fourth, and on Saturday afternoon Schumann's second in C major.

From WORLD
Address New York
Date

The Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts which are to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 22, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 24, will present as soloists Geraldine Farrar on Thursday evening and Alwin Schroeder at the Saturday afternoon concert. Miss Farrar will sing Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser" as her first number and a group of songs—Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Alwin Schroeder on Saturday afternoon will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra. The symphony on Thursday evening will be Beethoven's Fourth and on Saturday afternoon Schumann's Second in C major.

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 22, and Saturday afternoon, February 24, will present as soloists Geraldine Farrar on Thursday evening and Alwin Schroeder at the Saturday afternoon concert. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's "Prayer" from "Tannhauser" as her first number and a group of songs—Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Mr. Schroeder on Saturday afternoon will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," for violoncello and orchestra. The symphony on Thursday evening will be Beethoven's fourth and on Saturday afternoon Shumann's second in C Major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date FEB 14 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at Parsons's theater, Monday evening, February 26. The program will be divided between Russian music and Wagner. The principal Russian work will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade." The soloist will be the most brilliant of living women violinists, Kathleen Parlow, who will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto. The Wagner selections which bring the concert to a close comprise the Preludes to "Die Meistersingers," and "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" Overture. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's farewell appearance in Hartford as the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Seats go on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store, Thursday morning.

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 11 1912

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, one of the most brilliant of the younger of our native violinists, has been chosen as soloist for the fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 23. She will play the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor. The symphony will be Cesar Franck's in D minor, with which Conductor Fiedler has had such brilliant success.

MISS BESSIE BELL COLLIER, Violiniste.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date FEB 10 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Infantry hall Tuesday evening that famous organization will have one more visit to make this year to Providence and Max Fiedler, who has won so many friends here will have but one more appearance. The last concert is scheduled for Tuesday evening, April 2nd.

The feature of the program that Mr. Fiedles has arranged for Tuesday's concert is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which has not been heard here in several years. This most beautiful and emotional work has rather crowded out the modern symphonies. In the course of a year throughout those parts of the world where orchestras exist, the "Pathetic" unquestionably has more performances than any other symphony—probably any other two symphonies not excluding those of Beethoven.

For a long time it was supected that Tschaikowsky had committed suicide and it used to be said that in the "Pathetic" he consciously foreshadowed his tragic end. This, however, has since been shown to be false. As a matter of fact Tschaikowsky was never in better spirits than when he wrote this work and never had less idea of dying, and as for the name of the symphony itself, that was suggested to him by his brother.

The other orchestral works comprise the ever-favorite "Oberon" overture of Weber and two Wagner selections—Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The soloist will be Katharine Goodson, the eminent English pianist, who is no stranger to Providence, where by her appearances here in the past she has made many friends. She will play the Grieg concerto in A-minor. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Weber, overture to the opera "Oberon;" Tschaikowsky, symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "Pathetic;" Grieg, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin;" Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg;" soloist, Miss Katharine Goodson.

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date FEB 17 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The novelty on the programme of Thursday will be a Rumanian Rhapsody in A major, No. 1, op. 11, by Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer. It is one of the latest of his compositions. The programme will also include the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, No. 4. Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist and will sing Elizabeth's Prayer from Tannhäuser, Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and four songs by Schumann, Grieg, and Sinding, with pianoforte accompaniment. Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Schumann's Symphony in C Major, No. 4; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who will play Tchaikovsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme," for 'cello and orchestra.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date FEB 10 1912

Miss Marie Therese Brazeau was the guest of Concert Master Anton Witek of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Witek at a musicale at their home, "The Ilkley," Boston, Mass., yesterday. She will be their guest again to-morrow at a musicale.

From EVE. POST.
Address New York City.
Date FEB 10 1912

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Society will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 22, and Saturday afternoon, February 24. Geraldine Farrar will sing Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhäuser," Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin," and Grieg's "Ein Traum" on Thursday, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, will be the soloist on Saturday. The Thursday symphony will be Beethoven's Fourth, and on Saturday Schumann's Second in C major.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I. FEB - 7 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony concert which is to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will present as soloist the brilliant English pianist, Katharine Goodson, who is now making her third tour of this country. Miss Goodson was recently soloist with the orchestra in Boston and won her usual success, for of all the women pianists that came to this country none has gained a more loyal following than she. Here she will play the charming Grieg Concerto. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." The seats go on sale at Steinert's Saturday morning.

From EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
Date

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week will present as soloists Geraldine Farrar of the opera on the holiday night of Washington's Birthday, and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist of the band, at the Saturday matinée. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhäuser," as her first number, and a group of songs, Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Mr. Schroeder, on Saturday afternoon, will play Tschaikowky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme" for 'cello and orchestra. The symphony on Thursday evening will be Beethoven's classic fourth, and on Saturday afternoon the romantic second in C major, of Schumann.

Elizabeth Collier, violinist, is the soloist for the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening. She will play the Saint Saens concerto in B minor and the symphony will be that in D minor, by Cesar Franck.

From
Address
Date FEB 14 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Parsons Theater Monday evening, February 26. The program will be divided between Russian music and Wagner. The principal Russian work will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazada." The soloist will be the brilliant violinist Kathleen Paelow, who will play Tschaikowsky's "Concerto." The Wagner selections, which bring the concert to a close, comprise the preludes to "Die Meistersingers" and "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's farewell appearance in Hartford as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seats go on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store tomorrow morning.

From EVENING JOURNAL,
Address New York City.
Date FEB 17 1912

The next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the first Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist, and at the second Alwyn Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra. The "Fourth Symphony" of Beethoven, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Georges Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A will be the chief numbers on Thursday. On Saturday the programme will include the Schumann "Second Symphony," and "Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" tone poem.

[141]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date FEB 18 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony

ALWIN SCHROEDER.
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively, present only one work of novel interest, and that on Thursday evening. This is a Rumanian rhapsody in A major, No. 1, Op. 11, by Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, who has been favored in the last two years with several performances of his works, notably a suite and a symphony. This is one of the latest of his works and created a most favorable impression when it was played in Boston.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will then make her only appearance in New York in concert. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers—Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhäuser" and four songs with pianoforte accompaniment.

The full programme for Thursday evening is a follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser"...Wagner
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration".Strauss
Songs, with pianoforte:
Intermezzo } Schumann
Ihre Stimme }
Sylvelin .....Sinding
Ein Traum.....Grieg
Rumanian Rhapsody in A major, Op. 11, No. 1.....Enesco

On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the admired principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play

BASIL RUYSDAEL.
Metropolitan Opera House.

Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme.

The full programme is as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 2.....Schumann
Variations on a Rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra.....Tschaikowsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Strauss
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date FEB 18 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon respectively, present only one work of novel interest. On Thursday evening a "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A-Major (No. 1 Op. 11) of Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, will be performed. The soloists on Thursday evening will be Geraldine Farrar, who will then make her only appearance in New York this season in concert. Miss Marrar will sing Elizabeth's "Prayer" from "Tannhauser" and four songs, with pianoforte accompaniment. The programme for Thursday will include Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven Symphony in B-flat (No. 4). On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. The programme will include Schumann's Symphony in C-Major (No. 2); Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," for violincello and orchestra; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From TIMES

Address New York

Date

***

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively, present only one work of novel interest, and that on Thursday evening. This is a Roumanian rhapsody in A major No. 1 Op. 11 of Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing two numbers—Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser," and four songs with pianoforte accompaniment. The full programme for Thursday evening is a follows:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss
Songs with Pianoforte—"Intermezzo,"
"Ihre Stimme".....Schumann
"Sylvelin".....Sinding
"Ein Traum".....Grieg
Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, Opus 11, No. 1.....Enesco

On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. The full programme is as follows:

Symphony in C-Major, No. 2.....Schumann
Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello and orchestra.....Tschaikowsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Strauss
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

From HERALD BROOKLYN EDIT

Address New York

Date FEB 18 1912

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

AT its fourth concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have as soloist Miss Bessie Bell Collier, who is the foremost of the younger generation of American violinists. Miss Collier is not unknown in Brooklyn, where she has played several times with much success. She will play the Saint-Saëns Concerto in B minor.

Mr. Fiedler has made another delightful programme which begins with the Mendelssohn "Overture to a Midsummer Night's Dream," after which will come the symphony. The second part of the programme will comprise the Saint-Saëns concerto and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

The symphony will be Caesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which is accounted one of the masterpieces of the present. The Boston Orchestra has played this composition seven or eight times since last October.

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date

MISS FARRAR SOLOIST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with Miss Farrar as soloist for the first concert, and Alwin Schroeder for the second. The programme on Thursday evening will include a Roumanian rhapsody in A major, opus 11, by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, who has been identified considerably with the composers of France. Mr. Fiedler will also present the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. Miss Farrar will sing Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser," and songs with piano accompaniments by Schumann, Sinding and Grieg. Saturday afternoon Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." and the other numbers will be Schumann's second symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

[142]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE PROVIDENCE R.I.

Address PROVIDENCE R.I.

Date FEB 11 1912

MUSICAL NOTES.

Fourth Symphony Concert Tuesday with Katharine Goodson.

The announcement of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, brings to mind that another musical season is waning. Moreover, it brings forcibly to mind that only on Tuesday night and at its last concert in April will the many friends and admirers of Max Fiedler have an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his leadership for, as has already been announced, his engagement ends with the present season and he will return to Germany.

One of his characteristically brilliant programmes has been prepared for Tuesday evening. In the first place the soloist is a great favorite here in Providence, Katharine Goodson, the eminent English pianist. She will play the Grieg Concerto in A-minor, which is one of the most melodious and most grateful works of its kind in musical literature.

Mr. Fiedler has at last yielded to the oft-repeated requests of many of the subscribers of the concerts here and has placed on this programme the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky. This was the greatest and last of the works given to the world by this wonderful Russian. While many of the traditions that surrounded the work for many years have vanished in the revelations made by Tschaikowsky's brother it is still by its inherent nature and by the circumstances surrounding its first performance, one of the most tragic works we have. Almost on the day that he conducted his first performance in St. Petersburg Tschaikowsky became infected with the Asiatic cholera which carried him off a little later. Considerable mystery surrounded his end and for many years it was thought and honestly believed that he had committed suicide and from the unusual nature of his last symphony it was thought that he had consciously foreshadowed his end in this work. Of course, this is not known to be untrue.

Modeste Tschaikowsky in his autobiography of his brother has shown that the composer was in the best of health and spirits when he wrote the symphony; in fact, in better condition that he had been in many years and that he, Modeste, had suggested the title of the work. At any rate, despite this tearing away of the mystery which surrounded it, it still remains one of the most tragic works of musical literature. The rest of the programme is made up of the well-tried favorite, the "Oberon" overture of Weber, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme in its proper order is as follows.

Weber .....Overture to the opera "Oberon"
Tschaikowsky .....Symphony in B-Minor, No. 6 "Pathetic"
Greig .....Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor.
Wagner .....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner .....Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Soloist—Miss Katharine Goodson.

KATHARINE GOODSON.
Brilliant English Pianist, Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Evening.

From NEW

Address PROVIDENCE R.I.

FEB 13 1912

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT FOR TONIGHT

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Infantry hall this evening, at 8:15, Max Fiedler conducting. The soloist will be Katharine Goodson, the eminent pianist. The program is as follows:

Weber. Overture, "Oberon."
Tschaikowsky. Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "Pathetic."
Grieg. Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor.
Wagner. Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude to "The Mastersingers

From

Address PROVIDENCE R.I.

Date FEB 1 1912

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symp
Feature of an Interesting Progra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra its fourth concert of the season in fantry Hall last night, presenting a liant and interesting programme in the chief feature was a superb perf ance of Tschaikowsky's famous thetic" symphony. The assisting was Miss Katharine Goodson, the lish pianist, whose fine playing wa other agreeable feature of the co The order of the programme was a lows:

Overture to the opera "Oberon".....
Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "Pathetic" Op. 74 .....Tscha
i. Adagio; allegro non troppo.
ii. Allegro con grazia.
iii. Allegro, molto vivace.
iv. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in A-minor, for Pianoforte, 16 .....
i. Allegro molto moderato.
ii. Adagio.
iii. Allegro moderato molto e marcato
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .....
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....

The combination of two German posers with a Norseman and a Sla probably not chosen for the bene those who like to trace—or fancy trace—the existence of racial typ music. And for that matter, many not admit that Grieg's music is typ Scandinavian, declaring that his st influenced too much by his German bors. While as for Tschaikowsky Neo-Russians will have none of Leaving those who delight to argue matters to fight it out among selves, it must be admitted that e these composers has an original an tinctive vein, whether or not they be regarded as representative composers. The effect of their pr on the programme was to lend to teresting variety and contrast, whic doubtless just what was intended.

Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, monly known as the "Pathetic," general consent regarded as his g work. It is the climax of his marked and thoroughly individual a work that makes a powerful There is vivid contrast in its defined moods, and the orchestral glows with the most iridescent Nor is it necessary, in order to it, to seek in it the occult me which have been read into the sco is gorgeous tone-painting, del music; and, when played as super it was last night, it is likely to feature of any programme on w appears.

In choosing Grieg's A-minor co for her solo number Miss Goodson a selection well calculated to sho strong points of her playing. Sh an abundance of power—which, way, she does not abuse—a rema clear-cut technic, and a fine se rhythmical and musical proportio fact, she is a very interesting play an artist of no mean proportions concerto went finely, for in addi her own brilliant work she had t vantage of sympathetic and acc adjusted support at the hands Fiedler and his players. She wa warmly applauded.

The other numbers, all familiar upon Symphony programmes a thoroughly enjoyable music, were adequate and satisfactory presen The audience, as usual, was larg appreciative. But one more conc this season's series remains, and t be given on Tuesday evening, Apr

From TIMES

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 17 1912

Date

At its fourth concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, February 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer as soloist Miss Bessie Bell Collier, who is the foremost of the younger generation of American violinists. Miss Collier is not unknown in Brooklyn, where she has played a number of times. She will play the Saint-Saens Concerto in B Minor. Mr. Fiedler has made another of his inimitable programmes, which begins with the Mendelssohn "Overture to a Midsummer Night's Dream," after which will come Franck's Symphony in D minor. The second part of the programme will comprise the Saint-Saens Concerto and Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

FEB 18 1912

Date

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively, present only one work of novel interest, and that on Thursday evening. This is a Roumanian rhapsody in A major, No. 1, Op. 11, of Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, who has been favored in the last two years with several performances of his works, notably a suite and a symphony. This is one of the latest of his works and created most favorable comment when it was played in Boston.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will then make her only appearance in New York in concert. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers—Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser," and four songs, with pianoforte accompaniment. The full programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven, symphony in B flat No. 4; Wagner, Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser"; Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; songs with pianoforte—Schumann, intermezzo, Ihre Stimme; Sinding, Sylvelin; Grieg, Ein Traum; Enesco, Romanian rhapsody in A major, Op. 11, No. 1.

On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the admired principal cellist of the orchestra. He will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The full programme is as follows:

Schumann, symphony in C major, No. 2; Tschaikowsky, "Variations on a Rococo Theme," for violoncello and orchestra; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Wagner, overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 14 1912

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DOES SPLENDID WORK

A brilliant program was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth concert of the season at Infantry hall last evening. A representative audience was present and the numbers rendered were enthusiastically and most deservedly encored.

Miss Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, was given a most cordial reception. Her playing was replete with technique and the artistic appreciation for harmonious embellishment delighted the audience beyond measure, and her playing of Greig's concerto in A-minor, was a real delight. The program follows:

Overture to the opera "Oberon"....Weber
Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "Pathetic," Op. 74 ..... Tsvhaikowsky
i. Adagio; allegronon troppe.
ii. Allegro con grazia.
iii. Allegro, molto vivace.
iv. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in A-minor, for Pianoforte, Op. 16 ..... Greig
i. Allegro molto moderato.
ii. Adagio.
iii. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner

The sixth symphony by Tschaikowsky, has very best composition, known as the "Pathetic," was rendered with musically irridescent coloring. The work of Dr. Max Fiedler and his band of splendid musicians was never better than it was last night. The variety and contrast in the changes of strains held the audience spellbound, and there was a perfect burst of applause at the close of the symphony.

Miss Goodson's superb rendition of Grieg's concerto will be long remembered by all who heard it last evening. Not a sympathetic touch was missing, and the whole dovetailed into a grand ensemble that stamped the pianist as an artist of highest merit.

Mr. Fiedler and his players, always favorites here, emphasized and perhaps surpassed their usual great work, and gathered another laurel to the already large number so justly claimed by the organization of artistic musicians.

One more concert for the closing of the season will be given by the orchestra Tuesday, evening April 2 The success of the former events betokens an unusually large patronage to the final entertainment.

From HERALD
New York
Address
FEB 18 1912
Date

Another feature of the week will be the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give two concerts in Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday night, and a Saturday matinee. At the former, Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan, will be the soloist, singing Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser" and a group of songs by Sinding, Schumann, Grieg and Mr. Richard Strauss. The novelty of the orchestral part of the programme, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, will be a Roumanian rhapsody, op. 11, No. 1, the work of Mr. Georges Enesco, a Roumanian composer.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the organization, will be the soloist, playing Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The orchestra will give Schumann's Second Symphony, Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture and Mr. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY OCHESTRA

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

FOURTH BOSTON CONCERT

Entire Program Will Be Devoted To Tschaikowsky's Works.

Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a Tschaikowsky program at the fourth concert here, in the Lyric, on Wednesday evening, February 21. Tschaikowsky shares with Wagner the distinction of being practically the only composer out of whose works an entire program can be made in which there will be sufficient variety and contrast to hold the interest of the public.

The two principal works on this program will be the "Pathetic" Symphony and the "Nut-Cracker" Ballet Suite. The latter was played here by the orchestra two years ago.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From CRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date FEB 14 1912

BRILLIANT CONCERT B SYMPHONY ORCHESTR

Programme Included Delightfi Selections by Miss Goodson, Pianist.

Infantry Hall was filled again last ev ning as it has been all winter at th concerts by the Boston Symphony Orches tra and the audience was as appreciativ as usual. The programme as arrange by Conductor Max Fiedler was one of th brilliant arrangements which is characteristic of his work and it gave great delight. The numbers were of wide variety, but blended together into a harmonious programme which it was a positive pleasure to hear. The good feeling that is always so obvious between players and hearers at these concerts was manifest in marked degree and the audience rewarded the orchestra and the soloist as they deserved and those upon whom the applause was showered received it with evident appreciation and pleasure.

The symphony, which is always the main feature of these programmes, was last night the "Pathetic" of Tschaikowsky, Mr. Fiedler having yielded to the many requests which he has received from time to time from the music lovers of this city for the presentation of this selection. It holds undisputed place as the best as well as the last work of this great composer. It was played here four years ago by this orchestra, but then Dr. Muck was in charge of the organization, so that it was a new experience to hear it rendered under the direction of Mr. Fiedler, who has through it won his most brilliant success as an interpreter of the works of the great masters of music. It is a symphony of tragic nature and impressive character when rendered by master hands. And it was so rendered last night, for under the leadership of Mr. Fiedler the orchestra brought out all the pathos of the piece.

In admirable contrast to this great work of the Russian composer were the other orchestral numbers, Weber's overture to the opera, "Oberon," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the prelude to the same composer's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." These are all familiar and favorites with most music lovers and they were given last night with that exquisite skill and finish which mark the work of this orchestra.

The soloist was Miss Katherine Goodson, the English pianist, who is making her third tour of the United States and is justly esteemed as one of the most expert players of the piano. She has been heard here before so that her welcome last night was not as to a stranger, but rather as to one whom her hearers were glad to see and hear again after an absence. She chose for her contribution a selection that fitted in admirably with the orchestral numbers, giving a finish to a symmetrical programme. Grieg's concerto for pianoforte in A-minor is ever welcome as one of the most melodious and graceful compositions of its kind in the literature of music. Under her touch all the beauties of the work were brought out and she showed herself the skilled pianist and won plaudits such as are given by a symphony audience only to those who deserve high praise for their accomplishments.

The programme was arranged in the following order:

Overture to the opera "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "Pathetic," Op. 74 .....Tschaikowsky
i. Adagio; allegro non troppo.
ii. Allegro con grazia.
iii. Allegro molto vivace.
iv. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in A-minor for Pianoforte, Op. .....Grieg
i. Allegro molto moderato.
ii. Adagio.
iii. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner

There is but one more of these concerts this season and that one, in early April, will be the last at which Providence people will have the opportunity to hear this orchestra under the direction of Mr. Fiedler. He will go back to Germany followed by the kindly interest of all who have listened to his players in this city.

From EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y. FEB 18 1912
Address
Date

Music Events in Brooklyn.

At its fourth concert in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, February 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer as soloist Miss Bessie Bell Collier, foremost of the younger generation of American violinists. She is not known here, as she has played often and the opportunity to hear her with the orchestra will doubtless be welcomed by her many friends and admirers. She will play Saint-Saens "Concerto in B Minor." Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, has made another inimitable programme, beginning with Mendelssohn's "Overture to a Midsummer Night's Dream," followed by Franck's "Symphony in D Minor." Later comes Saint-Saens' "Concerto" and Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture." If it be true that the final test of great music is difficulty of comprehension at first and increasing admiration for it with repeated hearings, the Franck Symphony must rank among the masterpieces of our time. When it was first played, about a dozen years ago, it was pronounced "obscure, unmeaning and formless." It was difficult for critics, professional or lay, to find good qualities in it. Today this remarkable work has come into its own. Manhattan has had at least four performances of it, this season, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played it seven or eight times since October last. It contains some of the most beautiful melodies in the whole realm of symphonic music. Conductor Fiedler has been especially fortunate with this work, his interpretation of it rising to very great heights.

EVENING GLOBE
From
New York
Address
Date

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Feb. 24) the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, who will ply Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The programme includes also Schumann's C major symphony (No. 2), Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the "Flying Dutchman" overture.

NORTH AMERICAN
From Philadelphia, Pa.
Address
Date FEB 18 1912

Boston Symphony Concert

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will present, as soloist, the concertmaster, Anton Witek. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso.

Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York and other cities, everywhere with success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto.

On Saturday afternoon of this week the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, will appear at the Academy of Music. The assisting artists will be Gertrude Rennyson, soprano, and Miss Cecile Ayres, pianist.

Mr. Damrosch has chosen the following program: Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the same composer's "Ah Perfido," to be sung by Miss Rennyson; Grieg's A minor concerto, to be played by Miss Ayres; Wagner's "Dreams," with violin solo by Mr. Saslavsky, and Isolde's "Liebestod," by Miss Rennyson.

Eleanor [illegible]

From EVENING STAR,
Washington, D. C.
Address
Date FEB 18 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its fourth concert in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, has found it impossible to carry out his original intention of devoting the program to Wagner, as he had announced to do. As Mme. Louise Homer is to be the soloist at the March concert, he thought it would be better to delay the Wagner program until then in order that there might be a singer.

For this month's program he has arranged that Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, will appear as soloist. For fifteen years Mr. Witek has ranked among the foremost violinists of Europe, but because he elected to confine his work largely to orchestras and chamber music he never came to America until he was engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. Since then he has appeared as soloist a number of times, always with great success.

Mr. Witek is a Bohemian and a graduate of the Conservatory of Music in Prague, which is noted for the number of great violinists it has given to the world. For sixteen years before he came to Boston he was concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, having accepted that post when he was twenty-one years old.

He will play the Wieniawski Concerto for violin, in D minor. The symphony will be Schumann's in C major. The final number will be the Rondo of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, Op. 11, No. 1.

From EVE. SUN
New York City,
Address
Date FEB 17 1912

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

From a German portrait.

GERALDINE FARRAR.

PRESS
From Philadelphia, Pa.
Address
Date FEB 18 1912

The eighteenth pair of symphony concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, under the direction of Carl Pohlig, present a program made up largely of novelties, with the father of all the classical schools, Bach, represented by his familiar and delightful Suite in D Major, and concluding with a Wagner march, his "Allegiance March," written in honor of the King of Bavaria. It is a lively and inspiring march and is a fitting close for a concert which presents as its main points of interest the first hearing in Philadelphia of Henry Hadley's Third Symphony, which has been given by both the Boston Symphony and the Chicago Orchestra and which would have been given by the Philadelphia Orchestra last year but for the inability of the composer to deliver the score in time.

The other novelty on the program is the prelude to the third act of Wolf-Ferrari's "The Jewels of the Madonna," which will be the first hearing of this beautiful piece of music at the hands of a great symphony orchestra and apart from the distractions of the Opera House, the selections being arranged as follows:—

1. John Sebastian Bach.....Suite, D Major
2. Henry Hadley.....Symphony No. 3, Op. 60 (First time) (In Manuscript)
3. Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari...Prelude to Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" (First time at these concerts)
4. Richard Wagner.....Huldigungs March

* * *

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, will present as soloist its concert master, who is one of the most distinguished of the violinists now before the public. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso and his standing was among the highest.

Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York and a number of other cities, and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms' Concerto. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, Brahms' Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

* * *

Mary Garden and Mme. Saltzman-Stevens, who will sing at the Metropolitan Opera House this week; Katharine Goodson, who will give a piano recital at Witherspoon Hall, Tuesday; Walter Damrosch, who will conduct the New York Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon at the Academy, and Anton Witek, concert master and soloist of the Boston symphony concert, at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening.

[143]

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 18 1912

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will present as soloist its concertmeister, who is one of the most distinguished of the great violinists now before the public. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concertmeister of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and his standing was among the highest. Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York and a number of other cities, and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony

ANTON WITEK
With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

in B flat, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

* * *

E. Wiele[illegible] series of

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 18 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will present as soloist its concert-master, who is one of the most distinguished of the violinists now before the public. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and his standing was among the highest. Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York and a number of other cities and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra, the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From TIMES

Address HARTFORD, CONN.

Date FEB 17 1912

[illegible]son.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third and last appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be at Parsons's theater Monday, February 26. This concert will afford the last opportunity to hear the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction and will also serve to introduce the most fascinating woman violinist of the present time in the person of Kathleen Parlow. Miss Parlow is but 20 years of age, and has received everywhere honors accorded only the greatest artists of the world.

Mr. Fiedler, whose term of three years as leader of the Boston orchestra, closes with the present season, has many admirers among Hartford music lovers who will regret his departure. For their enjoyment Mr. Fiedler will present one of the most popular programs yet offered, opening with the brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazidi," by Rimey-Korsakoff, and closing with three familiar works of Wagner, the preludes to "Meistersingers" and "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Miss Parlow will give the solo in Tchaikowsky's violin concerto. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the world

From JOURNAL

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date FEB 11 1912

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening brings as soloist Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who is now making her third tour of America. Miss Goodson is no stranger to Providence, having played here before. She has chosen for the work she is to play Grieg's Concerto in A-minor. This has been called one of the most melodious and graceful compositions of its kind in the literature of music.

In response to the requests of many of the subscribers of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme as the principal work Tschaikowsky's Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, best known as the "Pathetic." It was last played here by the orchestra during Dr. Muck's engagement.

Of modern symphonies the "Pathetic" of Tschaikowsky is unquestionably the most popular, and the chances are that if it were possible to follow the concerts of all the orchestras in the world in the course of a season it would be found that the "Pathetic" now has more performances than any other symphony, not even excluding those of Beethoven. It was the great Russian's last gift to the world, and while a great many of the tragic traditions that once surrounded it have vanished in the light of history, the fact that shortly after he conducted it at its first performance Tschaikowsky died of cholera will always give to this work a peculiar interest. The character of the work itself, especially the last movement, was such as to make people once think that he consciously foreshadowed his death, which was soon to come to him, because for a number of years it was believed that Tschaikowsky committed suicide. At the clearing up, though, of the mystery concerning his death this theory naturally fell to the ground, and we now know that while he was writing the symphony he was in the best of spirits and the title of the symphony itself was suggested by his brother.

The other three orchestral numbers are the well-tried favorite "Oberon," overture of Weber; the, prelude to "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme in its proper form is as follows:

Weber, Overture to the Opera "Oberon;" Tschaikowsky, Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "Pathetic;" Grieg, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

* * *

Hans Schneider will discuss the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Manning Hall on Tuesday at 4 p. m. Mr. Schneider will be assisted by Miss Annie E. R. Whalen, who will play the concerto by Grieg. It is probable that Prof. H. C. Macdougall of Wellesley will lecture on the final symphony programme in April.

Katharine Goodson.
Piano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 17

Boston Symphony Concert

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy of Music next Monday evening Anton Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, will be presented for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing the Brahms Concerto. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a year ago. During his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concertmeister of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, however, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York, and other cities, with marked success. The orchestra's numbers on Monday evening will be the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B-flat, the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 20 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in an Enjoyable Concert at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler at the Academy of Music last evening when the attractive program which had been arranged for the occasion comprised Beethoven's bright and beautiful symphony in B flat, number 4, as its central feature. Report has it that this work was composed as an expression of the great man's happiness at what promised to be the fortunate outcome of the most serious of his several love affairs and the sentiment of joyous serenity with which it is animated and suffused very well supports this pretty story.

If the fourth is not one of the most interesting and impressive of the immortal nine, it is distinguished by a grace and charm which are peculiarly its own, while the infrequency with which it has been performed of recent years invests it with a freshness which some of the others lack. It was admirably played, with fine nicety of balance, lucidity of statement and refinement of expression, and with that perfect precision of movement and beauty of tone by which to such a high degree the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are constantly characterized. Other things on the program which were no less ably and brilliantly done, were Mozart's sparkling overture to the "Marriage of Figaro;" the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

The assisting artist was Mr. Anton Witek, the Concertmeister, who played Brahm's noble concerto with splendid breadth and strength, with a technique which was easily equal to its by no means inconsiderable difficulties and with just that dignity and fervor and sincerity of sentiment which the adequate interpretation of this spiritually and intellectually exalted music so imperatively demands. He was much and deservedly applauded.

From EVENING TELEGRAPH,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 17 1912

OPERA and CONCERT

A Plenitude of Orchestra Concerts—Also Many Recitals—The Second Week of Opera.

THE fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, will present as soloist the orchestra's concert-master, Anton Witek. He has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason he never visited America until he came as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. However, during his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso. Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston, New York and other cities. Here he will play the Brahm's concerto. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B-flat, Brahms' concerto for violin and orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date FEB 17 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its fourth concert in the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, has found it impossible to carry out his original intention of devoting this particular program to Wagner. As Mme. Louise Homer is to be the soloist at the March concert, he thought it would be better to delay the Wagner program until that time, in order that there might be a singer.

For this month's program he has arranged that Anton Witek, the distinguished concert master of the orchestra, will appear as soloist. Since he has been with the orchestra he has appeared as soloist a number of times, always with very great success. For sixteen years before he came to Boston Mr. Witek was concert master of the celebrated Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, having accepted that post when he was 21 years old. Here he will play the Wieniawski concerto for violin, in D minor.

The symphony will be Schumann's in C major, the slow movement of which is said to be the most beautiful music of its kind that has ever been written. The final numbers will be the brilliant Rondo of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody in A major, Op. 11, No. 1.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the world

From RECORD

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date FEB 18 1912

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will present as soloist its concertmaster, Anton Witek, who is one of the most distinguished of the violinists now before the public. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came here as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his 16 years' occupancy of the post of concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and his standing was among the highest. Since coming to America he has played with the Orchestra in Boston, New York and a number of other cities, and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The program that Conductor Max Fiedler has arranged is conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B-flat, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ANTON WITEK.

* * *

Elena Gerhardt, who is to be heard in a recital program with Paula Hegner at the piano, at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday afternoon, has a voice that is said to be a full, beautiful-toned soprano. Every emotion and every variety of tone coloring demanded by the master composers are said to be met by her, and her technical poise is declared perfect, a vocal adjustment so secure that the singer may forget production entirely in the knowledge that her technique is all sufficient.

In a recently-published appreciation of the art of this great Lieder singer a writer says: "Her success is regarded as all the more remarkable because of her nationality. German singers, as a class, move us by their sincerity and dramatic poetical powers. Rarely do they please us by their voices or tone production. Miss Gerhardt is one of the exceptions who possesses all-voice, method and the intellectual faculties to present Lieder singing in its most exalted style."

Gerhardt's program for the Academy recital is as follows:

Maedchen-Schwermut .....
In 's Freie .....
Der Nussbaum .....Robert Schumann
Die Kartenlegerin .....
Ich grolle nicht .....
Fruehlingsnacht .....Johann Brahms
Six "Zigeunerlieder" .....
He Zigeuner
Hochgeturmte Rimafut
Lieber Gott, du weisst
Brauner Burche
Kommt Dir manchmal in den Sinn
Roeslein drei .....Franz Liszt
Die drei Zigeuner .....
Ueber allen Gipfeln .....
Lied vom Winde .....Hugo Wolf
In dem Schatten meiner Locken ....
Gesang Weylas .....Richard Strauss
Staendchen .....
Heimliche Aufforderung .....

* * *

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 17 19

TSCHAIKOWSKY PROGRAM

Fourth Boston Concert At The Lyric February 21.

A program devoted entirely to [illegible] sic by Tschaikowsky, the greatest Russian composers, lends particular interest to the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, February 21.

The four works that he has [illegible] on the program are Tschaikowsky masterpieces in their several forms. The symphony will be the sixth in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." The other work of large dimensions will be the "Nut-Cracker" suite. The first number will be the Elegie from the "Serenade," for strings, op. [illegible]. The final number will be the stirring "1812" overture.

[144]

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 18 1912

The fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening will present as soloist its concertmeister, who is one of the most distinguished of the great violinists now before the public. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concertmeister of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and his standing was among the highest. Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York and a number of other cities, and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony

ANTON WITEK
With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

in B Flat, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

* * *

S. Wesley Sco[illegible] announces a series of

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 18 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will present as soloist its concert-master, who is one of the most distinguished of the violinists now before the public. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and his standing was among the highest. Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York and a number of other cities and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra, the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From TIMES

Address HARTFORD, Conn.

Date FEB 17 1912

were arranged by Gus Dunning and Mason.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third and last appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be at Parsons's theater Monday, February 26. This concert will afford the last opportunity to hear the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction and will also serve to introduce the most fascinating woman violinist of the present time in the person of Kathleen Parlow. Miss Parlow is but 20 years of age, and has received everywhere honors accorded only the greatest artists of the world.

Mr. Fiedler, whose term of three years as leader of the Boston orchestra, closes with the present season, has many admirers among Hartford music lovers who will regret his departure. For their enjoyment Mr. Fiedler will present one of the most popular programs yet offered, opening with the brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazidi," by Rimey-Korsakoff, and closing with three familiar works of Wagner, the preludes to "Meistersingers" and "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Miss Parlow will give the solo in Tchaikowsky's violin concerto. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the world

From JOURNAL

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date FEB 11 1912

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening brings as soloist Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who is now making her third tour of America. Miss Goodson is no stranger to Providence, having played here before. She has chosen for the work she is to play Grieg's Concerto in A-minor. This has been called one of the most melodious and graceful compositions of its kind in the literature of music.

In response to the requests of many of the subscribers of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme as the principal work Tschaikowsky's Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, best known as the "Pathetic." It was last played here by the orchestra during Dr. Muck's engagement.

Of modern symphonies the "Pathetic" of Tschaikowsky is unquestionably the most popular, and the chances are that if it were possible to follow the concerts of all the orchestras in the world in the course of a season it would be found that the "Pathetic" now has more performances than any other symphony, not even excluding those of Beethoven. It was the great Russian's last gift to the world, and while a great many of the tragic traditions that once surrounded it have vanished in the light of history, the fact that shortly after he conducted it at its first performance Tschaikowsky died of cholera will always give to this work a peculiar interest. The character of the work itself, especially the last movement, was such as to make people once think that he consciously foreshadowed his death, which was soon to come to him, because for a number of years it was believed that Tschaikowsky committed suicide. At the clearing up, though, of the mystery concerning his death this theory naturally fell to the ground, and we now know that while he was writing the symphony he was in the best of spirits and the title of the symphony itself was suggested by his brother.

The other three orchestral numbers are the well-tried favorite "Oberon," overture of Weber; the, prelude to "Lohengrin" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme in its proper form is as follows:

Weber, Overture to the Opera "Oberon;" Tschaikowsky, Symphony in B-minor, No. 6, "Pathetic;" Grieg, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

* * *

Hans Schneider will discuss the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Manning Hall on Tuesday at 4 p. m. Mr. Schneider will be assisted by Miss Annie E. R. Whalen, who will play the concerto by Grieg. It is probable that Prof. H. C. Macdougall of Wellesley will lecture on the final symphony programme in April.

Katharine Goodson.
Piano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 17

Boston Symphony Concert

At the fourth Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy of Music next Monday evening Anton Witek, concert-meister of the orchestra, will be presented for the first time in Philadelphia as a soloist, playing the Brahms Concerto. Mr. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came over as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a year ago. During his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concertmeister of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, however, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston and New York, and other cities, with marked success. The orchestra's numbers on Monday evening will be the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B-flat, the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 20 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Heard in an Enjoyable Concert at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler at the Academy of Music last evening when the attractive program which had been arranged for the occasion comprised Beethoven's bright and beautiful symphony in B flat, number 4, as its central feature. Report has it that this work was composed as an expression of the great man's happiness at what promised to be the fortunate outcome of the most serious of his several love affairs and the sentiment of joyous serenity with which it is animated and suffused very well supports this pretty story.

If the fourth is not one of the most interesting and impressive of the immortal nine, it is distinguished by a grace and charm which are peculiarly its own, while the infrequency with which it has been performed of recent years invests it with a freshness which some of the others lack. It was admirably played, with fine nicety of balance, lucidity of statement and refinement of expression, and with that perfect precision of movement and beauty of tone by which to such a high degree the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are constantly characterized. Other things on the program which were no less ably and brilliantly done, were Mozart's sparkling overture to the "Marriage of Figaro;" the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

The assisting artist was Mr. Anton Witek, the Concertmeister, who played Brahm's noble concerto with splendid breadth and strength, with a technique which was easily equal to its by no means inconsiderable difficulties and with just that dignity and fervor and sincerity of sentiment which the adequate interpretation of this spiritually and intellectually exalted music so imperatively demands. He was much and deservedly applauded.

From EVENING TELEGRAPH,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 17 1912

OPERA and CONCERT

A Plenitude of Orchestra Concerts—Also Many Recitals—The Second Week of Opera.

THE fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, will present as soloist the orchestra's concert-master, Anton Witek. He has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason he never visited America until he came as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. However, during his sixteen years' occupancy of the post of concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso. Since coming to America he has played with the orchestra in Boston, New York and other cities. Here he will play the Brahm's concerto. The program that Mr. Fiedler has arranged is eminently conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, Brahms' concerto for violin and orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its fourth concert in the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, has found it impossible to carry out his original intention of devoting this particular program to Wagner. As Mme. Louise Homer is to be the soloist at the March concert, he thought it would be better to delay the Wagner program until that time, in order that there might be a singer.

For this month's program he has arranged that Anton Witek, the distinguished concert master of the orchestra, will appear as soloist. Since he has been with the orchestra he has appeared as soloist a number of times, always with very great success. For sixteen years before he came to Boston Mr. Witek was concert master of the celebrated Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, having accepted that post when he was 21 years old. Here he will play the Wieniawski concerto for violin, in D minor.

The symphony will be Schumann's in C major, the slow movement of which is said to be the most beautiful music of its kind that has ever been written. The final numbers will be the brilliant Rondo of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody in A major, Op. 11, No. 1.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the world

From RECORD

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date FEB 18 1912

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will present as soloist its concertmaster, Anton Witek, who is one of the most distinguished of the violinists now before the public. Witek has elected to devote the greater part of his career to orchestral work, and for that reason alone he never visited America until he came here as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago. During, however, his 16 years' occupancy of the post of concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, he had many opportunities to tour Europe as a virtuoso, and his standing was among the highest. Since coming to America he has played with the Orchestra in Boston, New York and a number of other cities, and everywhere with extraordinary success. Here he will play the Brahms Concerto. The program that Conductor Max Fiedler has arranged is conservative. It comprises the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B-flat, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ANTON WITEK.

* * *

Elena Gerhardt, who is to be heard in a recital program with Paula Hegner at the piano, at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday afternoon, has a voice that is said to be a full, beautiful-toned soprano. Every emotion and every variety of tone coloring demanded by the master composers are said to be met by her, and her technical poise is declared perfect, a vocal adjustment so secure that the singer may forget production entirely in the knowledge that her technique is all sufficient.

In a recently-published appreciation of the art of this great Lieder singer a writer says: "Her success is regarded as all the more remarkable because of her nationality. German singers, as a class, move us by their sincerity and dramatic poetical powers. Rarely do they please us by their voices or tone production. Miss Gerhardt is one of the exceptions who possesses all-voice, method and the intellectual faculties to present Lieder singing in its most exalted style."

Gerhardt's program for the Academy recital is as follows:

Maedchen-Schwermut .....
In 's Freie .....
Der Nussbaum .....
Die Kartenlegerin .....Robert Schumann
Ich grolle nicht .....
Fruehlingsnacht .....
Six "Zigeunerlieder" .....Johann Brahms
He Zigeuner
Hochgetuernte Rimafluth
Lieber Gott, du weiss
Brauner Burche
Kommt Dir manchmal in den Sinn
Roeslein drei
Die drei Zigeuner .....Franz Liszt
Ueber allen Gipfeln .....
Lied vom Winde .....
In dem Schatten meiner Locken .....Hugo Wolf
Gesang Weylas .....Richard Strauss
Staendchen .....
Heimliche Aufforderung .....

* * *

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

TSCHAIKOWSKY PROGRAM

Fourth Boston Concert At The Lyric February 21.

A program devoted entirely to music by Tschaikowsky, the greatest of Russian composers, lends particular interest to the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, February 21.

The four works that he has [illegible]

On the program are Tschaikowsky's masterpieces in their several forms. The symphony will be the sixth in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." The other work of large dimensions will be the "Nut-Cracker" suite. The first number will be the Elegie from the "Serenade," for strings, op. The final number will be the stirring "1812" overture.

[144]

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 20 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY, WITEK SOLOIST

PROGRAM.

Mozart.....Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60
Brahms.....Concerto in D major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77. (Cadenza by Joachim).
Soloist—Anton Witek.
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner.....Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Conductor.....Max Fiedler

For the fourth of the series of Academy concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Manager Fiedler had arranged the most delightful program of the season, and he received an ovation following each number, which was so marked after the playing of the Symphony, Beethoven's No. 4, in B flat major, that he requested the orchestra to stand and share the applause with him. His concertmeister, Anton Witek, was also most happy in his choice of a Concerto, playing Brahms' D major, and with so much skill that he was recalled half a dozen times.

Mr. Fiedler is recognized as a hard worker, but he even surpassed his reputation in this respect, the program giving him the opportunity, for it demands all the skill and energy that a conductor can command to bring out the force and musical finesse that the Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner compositions demand.

Mr. Fiedler's Spirited Work.

But hard work and Mr. Fiedler are synonymous, as has been previously demonstrated, and as was emphasized last evening. The Boston Orchestra always shows hard work and careful study, but there was an unusual effort in every direction in the interpretation of this varied program. And this was evident to the very end, with no relinquishing of effort following the Symphony, as is too frequently the case, but the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" were given with all the spirit and fire at Mr. Fiedler's command.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the Beethoven Symphony was masterly and the playing was tremendously effective. It was really a treat to hear this wonderful work so admirably presented, an opportunity too rare of late, which fact was shown by the tremendous enthusiasm at its conclusion. Every phrase sang in its true value in the first movement. He gave the Allegro with unusual lightness and elasticity, and in the finale the tone of the Boston strings has never sounded richer or more incisive, in spite of the fact that the concertmeister was absent, as the soloist.

Mr. Witek gave a masterly exhibition of violin playing in the exacting Brahms Concerto, with evidences of having conquered all its difficulties of double-stopping, execution of arpeggios, and technical playing, which calls out all the reserve force of a master of the instrument, of which Mr. Witek is one of a very few.

The fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on March 18, with Mme. Louise Homer as the soloist.

From EVENING STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A program devoted entirely to music by Tschaikowsky, the greatest of Russian composers and one of the great musical geniuses of the last century, lends particular interest and distinction to the fourth Boston symphony concert, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 21. The four works that he has placed on the program are Tschaikowsky's masterpieces in their several forms. The symphony will be the Sixth in B Minor, best known as the Pathetic. Unquestionably this is the most popular symphonic work now in the repertory of modern orchestras, not even excepting the symphonies of Beethoven.

From

Address

Date FEB 17 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third and last appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Parsons Theater Monday evening, February 26. This concert will afford the last opportunity to hear the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction and will also serve to introduce the most fascinating woman violinist of the present time in the person of Kathleen Parlow. Miss Parlow is but 20 years of age, and has received everywhere honors accorded only the greatest artists of the world.

Mr. Fiedler, whose term of three years as leader of the Boston orchestra, closes with the present season, has many admirers among Hartford music lovers, who will regret his departure. For their enjoyment Mr. Fiedler will present one of the most popular programs yet offered, opening with the brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazidi," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and closing with three familiar works of Wagner, the preludes to "Meistersingers" and "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Miss Parlow will give the solo in Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 20 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Anton Witek, Concertmeister, Heard as Soloist.

PROGRAMME.

1. Mozart, Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro."
2. Beethoven, The Fourth Symphony.
3. Brahms, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Anton Witek, Soloist.
4. Wagner, (a) Prelude to "Lohengrin"; (b) Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

A crowded house, as usual, greeted the fourth concert in the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last evening. Anton Witek, the distinguished concertmeister of the organization, was the soloist in the Brahms concerto. Mr. Witek, who took his place only last year at the first desk of the violins with the Boston players, is an artist of the highest standing in his profession, and last night enhanced the reputation earned in the course of sixteen years as concertmeister with the Berlin Philharmonic and in towns here and abroad.

Mr. Witek, not the most studiously graceful of players, is a scholar of the utmost seriousness of intent, and he spared no pains to set forth the inner meaning of the score rather than exploit his own technique. The cadenza was delivered with fluent authority, the slow movement was played with a large, free, singing amplitude of tone, and the assembled difficulties of the final allegro the soloist surmounted with a seeming ease that bespoke his mastery of the exacting instrument and the elusive but nobly performed composition. He was many times recalled, but the well-known and proper ruling against encores was laudably enforced again by Conductor Fiedler.

The concerto had its niche in a programme of appropriate components, and of distinctly conservative temper. The dizzy presto of the Mozart overture was most admirably accomplished by the first violins—no music is better calculated to disclose the concordant unanimity of this wonderful division of this orchestra.

A dignified and wholly satisfying reading of the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven followed, in which, for all the precision of the baton and the bow, the musicians never lost sight of the pervasive sunny humor of the allegros, or the melting tenderness of the Adagio. The nearest aproach to "modern instances" of romantic feeling and of tone-color more defiant of the classical conventions, was offered in the excerpts from Wagner that concluded a singularly fine and finely played programme, which elicited the unstinted enthusiasm of all who were so fortunate as to hear it.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the last two years many of the subscribers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts have been asking Conductor Max Fiedler to give a program devoted exclusively to Tschaikowsky's music. Such a program he has arranged for the fourth concert, in the Lyric next Wednesday evening.

It is on the "Pathetic" symphony that Mr. Fiedler has built the program of this concert.

The second orchestral work will be the charming "Nut-Cracker" suite, which he also has done here. The other two numbers will be the Elegie from "The Serenade," Op. 48, and the stirring "1812" Overture.

From

Address

Date

— Im gestrigen Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters erregte Geraldine Farrar durch ihre Toilette Sensation. Wie ein Paradiesvogel, in einem Kleide mo-dernsten Schnittes, das eine Symphonie — Manche behaupten auch Kakophonie — der Farben Grün, Gelb, Roth und Weiß war, mit einem ganz eigenartigen federgeschmückten Turban auf dem Kopf, der bis über die Ohren ging, trat sie auf, um das Gebet der Elisabeth aus dem „Tannhäuser" als erstes zu singen. Das Publikum beäugte natürlich mehr die Toilette der Farrar, als daß es ihrem Gesange Aufmerksamkeit schenkte.

From STANDARD UNION

Address BROOKLYN

Date MAR 3 - 1912

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 22. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more real friends and admirers in this city than this modest, unassuming musician, who has achieved such brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 2, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

COMFORTABLE PIECES COMFORTABLY PLAYED

Beethoven, Brahms, Berlioz and Liszt, with Mr. Gebhard for the Pianist—The New Gospel of Brahms—Old Overtures and Their Modern Spirit—The Tempered Liszt of Mr. Gebhard's Playing

PERHAPS it is easiest and truest to call the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon a comfortable concert. Three of the pieces on the programme were familiar by many repetitions from Mr. Gericke's even to Mr. Fiedler's time—Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Berlioz's to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Brahms's sacred symphony in D major. Everyone who frequents the concerts for the sake of the music at them and almost everyone who merely hears it must have known approximately how all three would sound and how much or how little they were agreeable and stirring to hear. There was no need, moreover, of a very long memory to anticipate how Mr. Fiedler would conduct in them. Of old he has played the overture to "Egmont" with the vivid contrasts and the big voice that he sought and gained yesterday; of old he has made Berlioz's overture sound with its romantic grandiloquence and color-energy; of old he has made Brahms's symphony as emotional of voice and as varied of instrumental tint and detail as he and his men could make it. Yet again, the cautious auditor may always applaud safely and wisely these classic pieces and these established names. The fourth number of the programme was neither familiar nor unfamiliar. It was the second of Liszt's pianoforte concertos—the concerto in A that leads a much enduring and much transmogrified melody through all sorts of musical and pianistic adventures. It is played less often than the hackneyed first concerto in E-flat; it is, or it seems, in contrast quite as interesting and characteristic; while, if it is not always prudent to applaud Liszt's symphonic poems, it is becoming to clap his pianoforte pieces. Mr. Gebhard, appearing for the first time in his own right as "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, played the piano part. He played it well as became so able and diligent a pianist. Yet he was not troubling to the judgment or especially exciting. Again, applause could be safely hearty.

Mr. Fiedler's Brahms has been and was yesterday the Brahms of our generation of conductors. They are content, as some of their predecessors were, merely to reveal the substance and the structure—and sometimes the tricks of manner and the devices of workmanship in the music—in the daylight of clear and exact exposition. They would give the music emotional accent and vivid color—a living spirit and a changeful surface as well as large and sometimes complex substance and sound and shrewdly ordered form. Mr. Fiedler and the rest take this second symphony robustly, energetically, with plentiful accent and high instrumental color, and the quotations of authorities in the programme look rather mocked than when they dwelt upon the serenity of the music. The present generation will have none of a serene Brahms in his symphonies and so for the time the authorities seem, as they often do, quite out of immediate date. At the least to some of us, this emotionalized and colorful Brahms is much more interesting to hear than was the Brahms of the old dry exposition. Then he seemed to practise the exact science and not the expressive art of music; whereas on many of his pages there were signs in plenty, when eyes were not clouded and response dulled by that hateful thing "the tradition," that he wrote with deep feeling and that he could have when he chose an ear and a hand for conductors, when they "emotionalize" his music, as the old pedantic "Brahmsites" scornfully say, are only re-animating its spirit, and when they reveal its instrumental warmth and variety and give different timbres their adorning or expressive place, they are justly opening and coloring it.

Of course it is easy to overdo the reanimation, and perhaps Mr. Fiedler, like Mr. Stock before him last December, when he made the last movement sound almost tumultuous in its vigor and exuberant and in its high spirits. As the conductors will have it, not a "calmly serene," but a very lusty-spirited Brahms wrote it. Yet with all Mr. Fiedler's zest of pace an accent, he opened the music to the little thrusts of the wood-winds into it, to the Mozartian filagree in the flute, for example, that now and then plays for it; to the piquant little rustles of the strings, before they break into exuberance again. Brahms so played is quickening to hear, and Mr. Fiedler was nearly as happy, in the new vein, with the scherzo and the slow movement. There were grace of accent and tone, a touch of poetry in the playing of the minuet, and the trios had their little bite, as of an unusually alert and playful Brahms. Perhaps Mr. Feidler "emotionalized" the climax of the slow song quite as much as it required, but he did keep the frequent play of tonal light in the wood-winds and the horns over tonal shadow in the strings. Here is Brahms tone-picturing with the poetry of light and shade almost Rembrandt-wise. There is high pleasure in it. After all, the composer was a man—and not a formula.

TRAVELER

MARCH 2, 1912.

GEBHARDT PLAYS LISZT CONCERTO WITH SYMPHONY

BY FRANK BERTWALL.

Mr. Fiedler's fulfilment of the promise of his programme for the 17th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra provided one of the best concerts of the season. The Beethoven "Egmont" overture proved a most interesting opening selection, and was splendidly interpreted.

Heinrich Gebhardt was given a fine reception when he came out to play Liszt's second concerto for the pianoforte, and was recalled and recalled at its close by the most enthusiastic audience. The artist was at his best and afforded once more a striking proof of the advance he is making in his art.

Brahms' second symphony was so finely rendered as to strengthen the belief of those who maintain that this is the composer's best symphony, while those holding opposite views felt the ground slipping from under their feet.

The Berlioz "Cellinni" overture supplied a brilliant closing. Next week Miss Maud Powell, violinist, will be the soloist, playing the Sibelius concerto, D minor, op. 47. Weingartner's Symphony No. 3, E-major, op. 49, will be heard here for the first time. The programme also calls for Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

POST,

MARCH 3,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The last concert of the year in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this evening at 8 o'clock. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, who has made so favorable an impression here this winter, has kindly volunteered to give her services for this very worthy cause. It will be the last opportunity to hear Miss Gerhardt in Boston this year and she will sing two groups of songs.

While Wagner, generally speaking, is the most potent name to draw the public to Symphony Hall and as the last concert was devoted entirely to his works. Mr. Fiedler decided to turn to something else this time and has chosen Tschaikowsky, who in the favor of the public, runs Wagner a close second.

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "Pathetic".....Tschaikowsky
Songs with orchestra:
Stehe Still.....Wagner
Traume.....Wagner
Schmerzen.....Wagner
Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet, "Nut-Cracker".....Tschaikowsky
Songs with pianoforte:
Provencalisches Lied.....Schumann
Mondnacht.....Schumann
Die Soldatenbraut.....Schumann
Ich grolle nicht.....Schumann
Fruhlings nacht.....Schumann
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Eighteenth Symphony Program

The novelty which Mr. Fiedler places on the 18th Symphony programme to be [redacted] afternoon and Saturday evening is the most recent symphonic work from the pen of Felix Weingartner, his third symphony in E-major, Op. 49. This work has been known as the "Viennese" symphony because in the last movement the composer has used a number of strains from popular Strauss waltzes in contrapuntal effect with the principal themes. It had its first performance in Vienna in November, 1910, and a few weeks ago was played in New York by the Philharmonic Society of that city.

For the first time in several years Maud Powell, the admired violinist, will appear as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Powell will play again Sibelius' D-minor Concerto, Op. 47. Miss Powell played this at her last appearance here, which was the first performance of the work in Boston, and made such a profound sensation that she was requested to play it again this year. The final number on the program will be Smetana's Overture, "The Sold Bride."

EVENING STAR

From:

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 20. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 3 - 1912

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more real friends and admirers in this city than this modest, unassuming musician who has achieved such brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

[145]

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date MAR 3 1912

MAX FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 22. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. The soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 3 - 1912

Final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his engagement expires. Karl Muck is to return next year. The soloist will be Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 3 - 1912

The final concert of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more real friends and admirers in this city than this modest, unassuming musician who has achieved such brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 3 - 1912

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more real friends and admirers in this city than this modest, unassuming musician, who has achieved such brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metroplitan Opera Company.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date MAR 3 - 191

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon respectively, March 21 and 23. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's last appearances as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has arranged a special programme to mark his farewell.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date MAR 3 - 1912

Last of Boston Symphony Concerts.

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 21 and 23 next. They will mark Max Fiedler's last appearances in New York as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Fiedler has arranged a special farewell programme.

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively, March 21 and 23. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's last appearances as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has arranged a special programme to mark his farewell.

Date NEW YORK STAATS-Z MAR 3 - 1912

Die letzten diesjährigen Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 21. resp. am Nachmittag des 23. d. Mts. statt. Es sind die letzten Konzerte, die Herr Fiedler, der mit Ende dieser Spielzeit von Boston scheidet, hier leiten wird. Am Donnerstag ist Frau Homer vom Metropolitan die Solistin. Für den Samstag Nachmittag hat Herr Fiedler ein spezielles Abschiedsprogramm zusammengestellt.

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date MAR 2

MME. HOMER, SOLOIST.

Mr. Fiedler's last appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will occur Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 21 and 23. Mme. Homer will be the soloist on Thursday evening, and Saturday afternoon there will be a special programme to mark the farewell of the conductor.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 24. 1912

THE MENDELSSOHN CHOIR

A REMARKABLE AND A UNIQUE CHORUS

The First Visit to Boston Next Week of the Best Reputed Choral Society in America—Dr. Vogt, the Conductor, Who Has Made It What It Is—Beginnings, Progress and Achievement—The Unusual Constitution of the Choir—Its Festivals in Toronto and the City's Pride in It

ON Thursday of next week for the first time within long recollection a choral society will pay a visit to Boston. Two hundred and twenty-five strong and with each member so loyal and so eager that he or she will pay travelling expenses, the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto will journey hither, after two concerts earlier in the week in New York. With it will come also the Chicago Orchestra, as we in Boston heard it with surprise and admiration last December. Dr. Vogt, who has brought the choir to the highest place among choral organizations in America, will conduct in its numbers, accompanied and unaccompanied. In the purely orchestral pieces Mr. Stock will lead his own men, as he did last December, with large and clear ability to notable result. Elsewhere in this paper the chosen programme is printed. It ranges from the early Italian choral music of Lotti, through the Sanctus that is the climax of Bach's mightiest mass, through fragments of Berlioz's "Te Deum" and Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem," and through less exacting pieces, to the choral finale that ends and crowns Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The programme is long and diversified, because it must be if the choir is to prove its great reputation before a new public. For such ends that same programme could hardly be more exacting, and even the celebrated festival choruses in England, which the Mendelssohn Choir more resembles than it does choral bodies in the United States, might hesitate over it. In turn the orchestral pieces between whiles bid fair to prove the abilities of the Chicago Orchestra and Mr. Stock, as we in Boston are at last, after long ignorance, coming to know them.

In the United States, the Mendelssohn Choir first proved its quality five years ago, when it visited New York with the Pittsburg Orchestra and almost unheralded ventured a concert similar to that which it will undertake here. The audience listened with surprise and admiration; the reviewers wrote no less wonderingly and admiringly next day. They had heard choral singing that seemed a revelation of its possibilities. Three years ago the Mendelssohn Choir undertook three concerts in Chicago to like result. Seven thousand listeners heard and applauded the tonal unity, the rhythmical life, the dynamic range of its singing, and understood the abilities of the conductor and the work and discipline of the singers that had achieved such results. Then, as now, there were massive sonorities and delicate refinements of tone, precision, unanimity, clear enunciation, a remarkable range in vocal dynamics, a remarkable sensitiveness to musical and emotional content and to the expression of them. The singing of the choir stirred equally by its concentrated power and its endless elasticities. By common consent the Mendelssohn Choir is unique and unexcelled in its kind on this side of the Atlantic. By expert English testimony it bears comparison with the choruses of the English festivals that are the largest British achievement in executive music. No wonder that the choir, now in the fulness of its powers and its reputation, would prove both in Boston as it has in New York and Chicago. It owes both to the abilities of its conductor, to the disciplined work and loyalty of its singers, to the unique organization into which they are constituted and to the encouragement that their own city has steadily and increasingly given them. Here, then, follows some account of these things.

The Conductor, Dr. Vogt

Augustus Stephen Vogt was born in a little village near Berlin, in Western Ontario, the son of an organ builder of more than local reputation. Showing a special aptitude for music at a very early age, before he was twelve years old he was organist of the Lutheran church near his home and in a few years took a more responsible position in the neighboring city of St. Thomas. Subsequently he proceeded to Boston, spending two years under the best masters in that city and then, in 1883, to Leipsic where he studied for nearly four years at the Royal Conservatory under such eminent teachers as Reinicke and Jadassohn. In Leipsic he had the reputation, well remembered by an English fellow student, of always being on hand whenever any new work was to be performed, any new subject under discussion or any new idea broached. Nothing is more characteristic of A. S. Vogt than this—that in all his doings he has been continually and consistently eager to find out the new, to adapt the good and to sum up in his work the best of all things that would tend toward the accomplishment of his ideals of perfection. Along with all these he has the capacity for taking infinite pains, neglecting no trifle which will contribute to that same end.

The inspiration which led ultimately to the inception and development of the Mendelssohn Choir Dr. Vogt found in Leipsic. While studying in that city he was a frequent attendant at the services in the famous Thomaskirche, the choir of which with a history of centuries, has a list of famous cantors that includes such names as Bach and Hiller. The young Vogt was so impressed with the remarkable unaccompanied singing of this choir and also that of the Cathedral Choir of Berlin, at one time under Mendelssohn's direction, that he became convinced that there was much in the claim of the sixteenth century English composer, William Byrde, "that there is not any musicke of instruments, whatsoever, compared to that which is made of voices, when ye voices are good, and ye same well sorted and ordered." These ideas, which for some time germinated in his mind, bore their first fruition, when, on his return to Canada in 1888, he became director of the leading Baptist choir of Toronto and in less than two years had trained this body of singers to a degree of efficiency that made it known throughout Canada.

The Choir Itself

In 1894 was founded the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, and for three seasons, with his models before him, Dr. Vogt proceeded to put his theories into practice. Originally the mission of the choir was to develop the art of singing unaccompanied motets and part-songs with refinement and eloquence of expression, and its success in this direction left far in the rear all previous attempts of local societies, excellent though they were. Then came a suspension of active work for three years, due to the pressure of Dr. Vogt's professional duties, but in 1900 the society was reorganized under a very complete constitution with special conditions as to membership and with wider aims.

Under this constitution the sole management and direction of the affairs of the society, both financial and administrative, is in the hands of an executive committee of sixteen members, elected annually from the chorus, together with the conductor, who is an ex-officio member of the committee. The object of the society is to maintain a chorus for the practice and performance of high-class sacred and secular music. At the close of each season the chorus disbands automatically and all former members are required to apply for re-admission to the choir and to pass the same vocal and other musical tests as are prescribed for new applicants. In this way the quality of the chorus is maintained at the highest possible excellence. The membership of the chorus is maintained at about 230 voices in the proportion, approximately, of one-third of the total number as sopranos, one-fourth as basses, one-fifth as tenors and somewhat more than one-fifth as altos. The voice test includes details as to quality, intonation and blending characteristics and also as to the musical intelligence of the singer and efficiency as a sight-reader.

The Advance

The logic of circumstances and the force of public opinion influenced the society to enlarge its field of operations and year by year the choir has increased its repertory so as to include the great choral compositions of the best masters, with and without accompaniment. In 1902 it entered into association with one of the large American orchestras and in 1908 began that happy alliance which still exists; the coöperation with the Thomas Orchestra under its distinguished conductor, Mr. Stock. From a single concert in 1901 the choir has extended its scope and influence until it now gives annually, during the month of February, five concerts in Toronto on the scale of a musical festival. The programmes are comprehensive and eclectic. Two weeks ago in Toronto were sung Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life" the "Te Deum" of Berlioz, and Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" in their entirety, for chorus and orchestra; Grieg's "At the Cloister Gate," the Sanctus from Bach's B minor Mass, the Choral Epilogue from Elgar's "Caractacus" and the Choral Finale from Wagner's "Meistersinger"; and for unaccompanied voices motets, choruses and part-songs by Gounod, Lotti, Brockway, Bullard, Bantock and Van der Stucken. Some of these pices, or excerpts from them, will be sung at the concert here on Thursday.

The first concert outside of Toronto took place in Buffalo in 1905 and the reception extended and the enthusiasm aroused has resulted in the visit to Buffalo becoming almost an annual event. Then in 1907 two concerts were given in Carnegie Hall, New York, with the result that the eminent critics of that city were almost unanimous in their praise and admiration of the singing of the choir. In 1909 the management of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra invited the choir to Chicago and, as their guests, to give three concerts in Orchestra Hall. Again a new standard in choral music was set up that evinced the warm indorsement of the musicians and musical critics in the Western metropolis. In 1910 a similar trip was made to Cleveland.

The Reward

The choir has never had to struggle with material or financial adversity, for public appreciation of Dr. Vogt's labors has been from the first both prompt and generous. The five Toronto performances have practically become subscription concerts, the entire capacity of a hall holding 3200 persons being subscribed for weeks in advance.

And all that has been accomplished by the Mendelssohn Choir is due to the genius of one man—its conductor. Possessing high artistic ideals and an exceptional capacity for directing and [illegible] chorus, Dr. Vogt unites with [illegible] consummate tact, sound business instinct, untiring perseverance without ostentation. To his artistic ideals and his ability for direction may be attributed the enlistment under his banner of a chorus of voluntary singers which at the same time includes many prominent musicians; to his tact, the fact that he is able to retain their loyalty from season to season; to his business capacity, the summoning to his aid committees of hard-working, clear-sighted men, and to his energy and perseverance the attainment of a high standard of perfection in the performances of the choir.

POST. MARCH 2, 1912

GEBHARD WINS RARE APPLAUSE

Soloist With Symphony Displays Virtuosity

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 17th of the season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Beethoven's Egmont overture, Brahms' 2d Symphony, Liszt's A major piano concerto, Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini. Heinrich Gebhard was the soloist.

He gave a truly brilliant performance of the concerto which remains one of the most interesting works for piano and orchestra in existence. This concerto is, in fact, a remarkable portrait of the composer himself, courtier, philosopher, sentimentalist and cynic. The music is amorous or languishing, or there is heard the light mockery or the insolent laughter that must have gone, in Liszt's lifetime, with a Mephistophelean grimace.

And how far was Liszt ahead of his time! His concertos, even the more generally popular one in E flat, were madness when they appeared. They are modern, and they are stirring, today. The A major concerto is an engrossing work for both music-lover and virtuoso, and orchestrally Liszt says things unheard of in his day, things which perhaps he himself had only heard in some strange dream. The piece smacks of the Orient, and in the Arabian Nights there is nothing more singular to relate than the swooning, incense-ridden introduction, the impossible kaleidscopic transformation of the themes.

Plays as a Master

Mr. Gebhard played the piece with rare authority and elan. From the moment when, after a languorous love-scene, Don Juan sets off after new prizes, when the pianist, following an insolent cadenza, mounts his instrument as though it were a fiery steed, to do battle with the formidable orchestral array, the piano was supreme and overwhelming.

Mr. Gebhard did more than play a modern concerto with musicianship and adequate technical apparatus. He played with the spirit of one who re-created the music, felt its fibre, thought the composer's thought, and dreamed his dream of conquest. He took with confidence a tempo that would have been the destruction of one less well prepared, and it was evident that the pace, far from being an attempt at self-glorification, was irresistible for him. Surely, for the performer, the walls must reel at this moment as they reeled when Mephisto fiddled for the dance in the tavern!

Won the Plaudits

At the first freer treatment of certain passages might not have been out of place, but it is one thing to play by one's self with a delicate and seductive rubato; it is another to feel sufficiently at home with an orchestra to play, for instance, the shimmering scales near the beginning as though casting spells about the wonderful song of the horn. Owing to Mr. Gebhard's treatment, the rhapsody—for such it is—cohered at every joint. And it glittered and cavorted gallantly. There was the excitement felt alike by audience and performer. Mr. Gebhard was long and deservedly applauded.

The remainder of the programme does not call for extended comment. The beautiful symphony of Brahms was read with much appreciation by Mr. Fiedler, and what is the use of talking about great music? Moreover, whether the music be by Beethoven or Berlioz, it is a fresh pleasure to hear it played by the Boston Symphony.

[146]

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date

MAX FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Mus c on Friday evening, March 22. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. The soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 3 - 1912

Estab

Final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his engagement expires. Karl Muck is to return next year. The soloist will be Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

The final concert of the year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more real friends and admirers in this city than this modest, unassuming musician who has achieved such brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 3 - 1912

The final concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more real friends and admirers in this city than this modest, unassuming musician, who has achieved such brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metroplitan Opera Company.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date MAR 3 - 191

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon respectively, March 21 and 23. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's last appearances as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has arranged a special programme to mark his farewell.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date MAR 3 - 1912

Last of Boston Symphony Concerts.

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 21 and 23 next. They will mark Max Fiedler's last appearances in New York as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Fiedler has arranged a special farewell programme.

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, respectively, March 21 and 23. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's last appearances as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has arranged a special programme to mark his farewell.

Date NEW YORK STAATS-Z MAR 3 - 1912

Die letzten diesjährigen Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 21. resp. am Nachmittag des 23. d. Mts. statt. Es sind die letzten Konzerte, die Herr Fiedler, der mit Ende dieser Spielzeit von Boston scheidet, hier leiten wird. Am Donnerstag ist Frau Homer vom Metropolitan die Solistin. Für den Samstag Nachmittag hat Herr Fiedler ein spezielles Abschiedsprogramm zusammengestellt.

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date MAR

MME. HOMER, SOLOIST.

Mr. Fiedler's last appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will occur Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 21 and 23. Mme. Homer will be the soloist on Thursday evening, and Saturday afternoon there will be a special programme to mark the farewell of the conductor.

Esta

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 24. 1912

THE MENDELSSOHN CHOIR

A REMARKABLE AND A UNIQUE CHORUS

The First Visit to Boston Next Week of the Best Reputed Choral Society in America—Dr. Vogt, the Conductor, Who Has Made It What It Is—Beginnings, Progress and Achievement—The Unusual Constitution of the Choir—Its Festivals in Toronto and the City's Pride in It

ON Thursday of next week for the first time within long recollection a choral society will pay a visit to Boston. Two hundred and twenty-five strong and with each member so loyal and so eager that he or she will pay travelling expenses, the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto will journey hither, after two concerts earlier in the week in New York. With it will come also the Chicago Orchestra, as we in Boston heard it with surprise and admiration last December. Dr. Vogt, who has brought the choir to the highest place among choral organizations in America, will conduct in its numbers, accompanied and unaccompanied. In the purely orchestral pieces Mr. Stock will lead his own men, as he did last December, with large and clear ability to notable result. Elsewhere in this paper the chosen programme is printed. It ranges from the early Italian choral music of Lotti, through the Sanctus that is the climax of Bach's mightiest mass, through fragments of Berlioz's "Te Deum" and Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem," and through less exacting pieces, to the choral finale that ends and crowns Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The programme is long and diversified, because it must be if the choir is to prove its great reputation before a new public. For such ends that same programme could hardly be more exacting, and even the celebrated festival choruses in England, which the Mendelssohn Choir more resembles than it does choral bodies in the United States, might hesitate over it. In turn the orchestral pieces between whiles bid fair to prove the abilities of the Chicago Orchestra and Mr. Stock, as we in Boston are at last, after long ignorance, coming to know them.

In the United States, the Mendelssohn Choir first proved its quality five years ago, when it visited New York with the Pittsburg Orchestra and almost unheralded ventured a concert similar to that which it will undertake here. The audience listened with surprise and admiration; the reviewers wrote no less wonderingly and admiringly next day. They had heard choral singing that seemed a revelation of its possibilities. Three years ago the Mendelssohn Choir undertook three concerts in Chicago to like result. Seven thousand listeners heard and applauded the tonal unity, the rhythmical life, the dynamic range of its singing, and understood the abilities of the conductor and the work and discipline of the singers that had achieved such results. Then, as now, there were massive sonorities and delicate refinements of tone, precision, unanimity, clear enunciation, a remarkable range in vocal dynamics, a remarkable sensitiveness to musical and emotional content and to the expression of them. The singing of the choir stirred equally by its concentrated power and its endless elasticities. By common consent the Mendelssohn Choir is unique and unexcelled in its kind on this side of the Atlantic. By expert English testimony it bears comparison with the choruses of the English festivals that are the largest British achievement in executive music. No wonder that the choir, now in the fulness of its powers and its reputation, would prove both in Boston as it has in New York and Chicago. It owes both to the abilities of its conductor, to the disciplined work and loyalty of its singers, to the unique organization into which they are constituted and to the encouragement that their own city has steadily and increasingly given them. Here, then, follows some account of these things.

The Conductor, Dr. Vogt

Augustus Stephen Vogt was born in a little village near Berlin, in Western Ontario, the son of an organ builder of more than local reputation. Showing a special aptitude for music at a very early age, before he was twelve years old he was organist of the Lutheran church near his home and in a few years took a more responsible position in the neighboring city of St. Thomas. Subsequently he proceeded to Boston, spending two years under the best masters in that city and then, in 1885, to Leipsic where he studied for nearly four years at the Royal Conservatory under such eminent teachers as Reinicke and Jadassohn. In Leipsic he had the reputation, well remembered by an English fellow student, of always being on hand whenever any new work was to be performed, any new subject under discussion or any new idea broached. Nothing is more characteristic of A. S. Vogt than this—that in all his doings he has been continually and consistently eager to find out the new, to adapt the good and to sum up in his work the best of all things that would tend toward the accomplishment of his ideals of perfection. Along with all these he has the capacity for taking infinite pains, neglecting no trifle which will contribute to that same end.

The inspiration which led ultimately to the inception and development of the Mendelssohn Choir Dr. Vogt found in Leipsic. While studying in that city he was a frequent attendant at the services in the famous Thomaskirche, the choir of which with a history of centuries, has a list of famous cantors that includes such names as Bach and Hiller. The young Vogt was so impressed with the remarkable unaccompanied singing of this choir and also that of the Cathedral Choir of Berlin, at one time under Mendelssohn's direction, that he became convinced that there was much in the claim of the sixteenth century English composer, William Byrde, "that there is not any musicke of instruments, whatsoever, compared to that which is made of voices, when ye voices are good, and ye same well sorted and ordered." These ideas, which for some time germinated in his mind, bore their first fruition, when, on his return to Canada in 1888, he became director of the leading Baptist choir of Toronto and in less than two years had trained this body of singers to a degree of efficiency that made it known throughout Canada.

The Choir Itself

In 1894 was founded the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, and for three seasons, with his models before him, Dr. Vogt proceeded to put his theories into practice. Originally the mission of the choir was to develop the art of singing unaccompanied motets and part-songs with refinement and eloquence of expression, and its success in this direction left far in the rear all previous attempts of local societies, excellent though they were. Then came a suspension of active work for three years, due to the pressure of Dr. Vogt's professional duties, but in 1900 the society was reorganized under a very complete constitution with special conditions as to membership and with wider aims.

Under this constitution the sole management and direction of the affairs of the society, both financial and administrative, is in the hands of an executive committee of sixteen members, elected annually from the chorus, together with the conductor, who is an ex-officio member of the committee. The object of the society is to maintain a chorus for the practice and performance of high-class sacred and secular music. At the close of each season the chorus disbands automatically and all former members are required to apply for re-admission to the choir and to pass the same vocal and other musical tests as are prescribed for new applicants. In this way the quality of the chorus is maintained at the highest possible excellence. The membership of the chorus is maintained at about 230 voices in the proportion, approximately, of one-third of the total number as sopranos, one-fourth as basses, one-fifth as tenors and somewhat more than one-fifth as altos. The voice test includes details as to quality, intonation and blending characteristics and also as to the musical intelligence of the singer and efficiency as a sight-reader.

The Advance

The logic of circumstances and the force of public opinion influenced the society to enlarge its field of operations and year by year the choir has increased its repertory so as to include the great choral compositions of the best masters, with and without accompaniment. In 1902 it entered into association with one of the large American orchestras and in 1908 began that happy alliance which still exists: the coöperation with the Thomas Orchestra under its distinguished conductor, Mr. Stock. From a single concert in 1901 the choir has extended its scope and influence until it now gives annually, during the month of February, five concerts in Toronto on the scale of a musical festival. The programmes are comprehensive and eclectic. Two weeks ago in Toronto were sung Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life" the "Te Deum" of Berlioz, and Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" in their entirety, for chorus and orchestra; Grieg's "At the Cloister Gate," the Sanctus from Bach's B minor Mass, the Choral Epilogue from Elgar's "Caractacus" and the Choral Finale from Wagner's "Meistersinger"; and for unaccompanied voices motets, choruses and part-songs by Gounod, Lotti, Brockway, Bullard, Bantock and Van der Stucken. Some of these pices, or excerpts from them, will be sung at the concert here on Thursday.

The first concert outside of Toronto took place in Buffalo in 1905 and the reception extended and the enthusiasm aroused has resulted in the visit to Buffalo becoming almost an annual event. Then in 1907 two concerts were given in Carnegie Hall, New York, with the result that the eminent critics of that city were almost unanimous in their praise and admiration of the singing of the choir. In 1909 the management of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra invited the choir to Chicago and, as their guests, to give three concerts in Orchestra Hall. Again a new standard in choral music was set up that evinced the warm indorsement of the musicians and musical critics in the Western metropolis. In 1910 a similar trip was made to Cleveland.

The Reward

The choir has never had to struggle with material or financial adversity, for public appreciation of Dr. Vogt's labors has been from the first both prompt and generous. The five Toronto performances have practically become subscription concerts, the entire capacity of a hall holding 3200 persons being subscribed for weeks in advance.

And all that has been accomplished by the Mendelssohn Choir is due to the genius of one man—its conductor. Possessing high artistic ideals and an exceptional capacity for directing and instructing a chorus, Dr. Vogt unites with these qualities consummate tact, sound business instinct, untiring perseverance without ostentation. To his artistic ideals and his ability for direction may be attributed the enlistment under his banner of a chorus of voluntary singers which at the same time includes many prominent musicians; to his tact, the fact that he is able to retain their loyalty from season to season; to his business capacity, the summoning to his aid committees of hard-working, clear-sighted men, and to his energy and perseverance the attainment of a high standard of perfection in the performances of the choir.

POST. MARCH 2, 1912

GEBHARD WINS RARE APPLAUSE

Soloist With Symphony Displays Virtuosity

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 17th of the season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Beethoven's Egmont overture, Brahms' 2d Symphony, Listz's A major piano concerto, Berlioz' Overture to Benvenuto Cellini. Heinrich Gebhard was the soloist.

He gave a truly brilliant performance of the concerto which remains one of the most interesting works for piano and orchestra in existence. This concerto is, in fact, a remarkable portrait of the composer himself, courtier, philosopher, sentimentalist and cynic. The music is amorous or languishing, or there is heard the light mockery or the insolent laughter that must have gone, in Liszt's lifetime, with a Mephistophelean grimace.

And how far was Liszt ahead of his time! His concertos, even the more generally popular one in E flat, were madness when they appeared. They are modern, and they are stirring, today. The A major concerto is an engrossing work for both music-lover and virtuoso, and orchestrally Liszt says things unheard of in his day, things which perhaps he himself had only heard in some strange dream. The piece smacks of the Orient, and in the Arabian Nights there is nothing more singular to relate than the swooning, incense-ridden introduction, the impossible kaleidscopic transformation of the themes.

Plays as a Master

Mr. Gebhard played the piece with rare authority and elan. From the moment when, after a languorous love-scene, Don Juan sets off after new prizes, when the pianist, following an insolent cadenza, mounts his instrument as though it were a fiery steed, to do battle with the formidable orchestral array, the piano was supreme and overwhelming.

Mr. Gebhard did more than play a modern concerto with musicianship and adequate technical apparatus. He played with the spirit of one who re-created the music, felt its fibre, thought the composer's thought, and dreamed his dream of conquest. He took with confidence a tempo that would have been the destruction of one less well prepared, and it was evident that the pace, far from being an attempt at self-glorification, was irresistible for him. Surely, for the performer, the walls must reel at this moment as they reeled when Mephisto fiddled for the dance in the tavern!

Won the Plaudits

At the first freer treatment of certain passages might not have been out of place, but it is one thing to play by one's self with a delicate and seductive rubato; it is another to feel sufficiently at home with an orchestra to play, for instance, the shimmering scales near the beginning as though casting spells about the wonderful song of the horn. Owing to Mr. Gebhard's treatment, the rhapsody—for such it is—cohered at every joint. And it glittered and cavorted gallantly. There was the excitement felt alike by audience and performer. Mr. Gebhard was long and deservedly applauded.

The remainder of the programme does not call for extended comment. The beautiful symphony of Brahms was read with much appreciation by Mr. Fiedler, and whta is the use of talking about great music? Moreover, whether the music be by Beethoven or Berlioz, it is a fresh pleasure to hear it played by the Boston Symphony.

[146]

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 2, 1912

CLASSICAL PROGRAMME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. GEBHARDT A VERY SUCCESSFUL SOLOIST

Piano Playing Was Brilliant to the Highest Degree, There Being No Shading for the Orchestra.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—"Egmont" overture.
Brahms—Symphony in D major, No. 2.
Liszt—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in A major.
Soloist—Mr. Heinrich Gebhardt.
Berlioz—"Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

A classical programme, for Liszt's A major concerto is almost to be ranked with classical concertos, and Brahms' second symphony is as definite a classic as any of the immortal nine of Beethoven. Even Berlioz, the radical, seems conservative in these days of Strauss, Reger, Debussy & Co. Therefore there was nothing cryptic or neurotic in the entire list, and there was a good deal that was melodic and pleasing.

One can imagine that the note of triumph in the "Egmont" overture lost nothing in the reading by Mr. Fiedler. He is a conductor who frequently exults. From the moment that the second flautist laid down his flute and took up the piccolo, matters were very fiery. The final shrieks on this imp of the orchestra clearly announced that the Dutch had taken Holland.

But the solemn chief theme, and the tender subordinate theme, in the body of the work, were also very impressive and properly contrasted. It is not the Egmont of history that Goethe and Beethoven have pictured; it is a very different person from the vacillating party described by Motley; but Art is not necessarily bound to limit itself to historical accuracy, and the idealized Egmont makes a very noble tone-poem. Only the introduction was played a little too slow; otherwise the reading was ideal.

We begin to believe that modern symphonists take refuge in heavy scoring and in prolixity simply because they are unable to achieve clear ideas, sweet melodies and sane development, such as Brahms gives in his noble works. There are themes in this symphony in D major that are as melodic as those of Schubert and sometimes as simple as folk-songs. The scoring is also simple, almost neutral-tinted when compared with the mighty scores of the present. Yet the whole work is so unstrained, the development of figures (it is brimful of that) is so interesting, there is so much that is healthy and beautiful in the treatment of themes, that the symphony out-weighs all of its intensely ambitious successors.

Mr. Fiedler omitted the repeat of the exposition of the first movement, for which we were sorry, since Brahms is complex enough in his figure development to require two hearings of his themes before they are transmuted "into something rich and strange." The horn-playing in the coda of this movement deserves favorable mention.

In the third movement we found the contrasts rather too vivid for such a pastoral picture, although some "brusquerie" is undoubtedly necessary in the second theme. But it was made almost heroic in its force. The finale was beautifully read and the symphony was very heartily applauded. If we could only induce a few of the radicals of the present to study it!

Liszt's concerto in A may not be as exciting to the multitude as the rhapsodical one in E-flat, but it is the more perfect work of the two. The concerto-form is the freest expression of the sonata shape anyway, and in the E-flat concerto Liszt overthrew what was left of it and made a species of piano fantasie. In this concerto in A he holds a little more clearly to form and, while giving a sufficient contrast of moods, still builds symmetrically and develops logically.

We do not believe in forcing everybody to write in the set forms, but they ought not to be overthrown without some evident need, or some palpable gain. Radicals would have us believe that no great emotion can be expressed, no true abandon attained, unless all form is thrown to the winds. A programme such as this of yesterday afternoon teaches us differently.

Mr. Gebhardt was welcomed cordially when he made his appearance. He was applauded still more vehemently when he had completed his task, and he deserved the recognition. His work in Boston is well known to all. As pianist, composer and teacher, he has advanced steadily, by conscientious work and by keen intelligence. His piano-playing on this occasion was brilliant in the highest degree. There was elasticity and abandon in all of his work. There was a fiery power that fitted this concerto perfectly. The chord and double-octave work was magnificent, balancing easily against the full power of the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler was not obliged to temper the wind (or the strings either) to the shorn lamb, for here the soloist was a lion.

Mr. Gebhardt also brought out the contrasts very well. In this concerto this is especially important, for the spirit of the conventional three movements of the concerto is there, only they are melted into a single movement, and if not well contrasted the auditor loses the proper impression.

Mr. Gebhardt has never played so brilliantly in Boston. If he lived in Berlin instead of in the Hub, Bostonians would realize how fine an artist he is. But as it was he won a real triumph, arousing great enthusiasm and winning many recalls.

Benvenuto Cellini's overture brought the enjoyable concert to a fortissimo end. If this music does not do him injustice Benny must have been the noisiest fellow in Rome. We understand, however, that none of the brass instrument players are permanently injured and that the instruments are still intact.

JOURNAL-

MARCH 2, 1912.

BOSTON SOLOIST IS LEADING FEATURE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

For the first time this season a Boston soloist, not a member of the orchestra itself, is this week appearing at the Symphony concerts. No better choice could have been made than that of Heinrich Gebhard, as artistic a pianist as America can boast of, who has been a resident here since, at the age of 10, he came over from Germany. This is his sixth appearance as a Symphony soloist—an honor highly prized in the musical world—and never has he played more brilliantly than he did at the matinee yesterday in the gorgeous tone poem known as the Liszt concerto in A major, No. 2.

It is a classic program that the orchestra presents this week, on the eve of its all-Tschaikowsky pension fund concert, with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the second Brahms symphony and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture added to the Liszt number.

Symphony Pension Concert Sunday Night

The last concert of the year in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday night. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, will sing three Wagner songs with orchestra, "Stehe Still," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," and five Schumann songs, "Provencalisches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Die Soldatenbraut," "Ich grolle nicht" and "Fruhlingsnacht," with piano.

While Wagner, generally speaking, is the most potent name to draw the public to Symphony Hall and as the last concert was devoted entirely to his works, Mr. Fiedler decided to turn to something else this time and has chosen Tschaikowsky, who, in the favor of the public, runs Wagner a close second. The three works he will play are the "Pathetic" Symphony, the charming "Nut-Cracker" suite and the final number will be the "1812" overture, in which the great organ of Symphony Hall will be used.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

HARTFORD
FEB 26 1912

Symphony Concert Tonight.

It is expected that the Parsons Theater will be filled tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears for the third and last time this season. Max Fiedler will make his last bow to his admirers as conductor of the organization, which he has led for four years, and Kathleen Parlow, the violin virtuoso, will appear as soloist. The indications are for a brilliant event and the management desires to thank the Hartford public for its appreciation and support. Patrons are asked to arrive promptly in order that the performance may begin at 8:15. Tickets for the gallery may be bought at J. M. Gallup & Co.'s music store during the day and at the theater after 7:30 o'clock.

NORTH AMERICAN
From Philadelphia, Pa.
Address
Date
FEB 25

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, during his stay here visited the Sternberg School of Music, spending considerable time in listening to the playing of several pupils, among whom were Dorothy Goldsmith and Robert Armbruster. He expressed himself greatly impressed by the methods and results of the school, and complimented the pupils heartily. Mr. von Sternberg was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler for luncheon.

EVENING SUN,
From
New York City.
Address
MAR 1 1912
Date

The season's last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 21 and 23 respectively. These will be Conductor Max Fiedler's final appearances at the head of the Boston band. The star of the evening concert will be Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera. For the Saturday matinée there will be a special programme to mark Mr. Fiedler's farewell.

MARCH 2, 1912.

GEBHARD PLAYS LISZT CONCERTO

Is Soloist at the 17th Public Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Heinrich Gebhard was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms
Concerto in A major, No. 2.....Liszt
Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

Von Buelow used to say that the program of a Symphony concert should include a work by one of the three "B's" and he meant by them, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. Inasmuch as he was an admirer of Berlioz, and even enjoyed conducting the overture to "The Corsair," he might have spoken of four "B's." Then there is Bruckner, Buelow himself composed music to "Julius Caesar," symphonic poems, "The Singer's Curse" and "Nirwana," a "Funerale" which has been played here at a Symphony concert, and other pieces—labored and boresome. He was not noted for his modesty, this strangely gifted and tortured man, but he did not include himself among the necessary "B's."

A conductor, at a loss in program making, might arrange a series of concerts with respect to the alphabet as far as possible. "A" would not present obstacles, and there are symphonies—one good one by Kalinnikoff—under "K." "I" and "X," "Y," "Z" might be less tractable.

Yesterday we heard the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Berlioz, three "B's" who are well contrasted. The overture of Berlioz might have been played with more elegance in the allegro passages, but the pace precluded it. It was a pleasure to heard the incidental oboe solo. The performance of the symphony was heartily applauded and that of the third movement, one of the happiest inspirations of Brahms, deserved this applause.

A Viennese musician once said that whenever he heard anyone of Brahms's four symphonies he was inclined to prefer it to the other three; but he was a passionate Brahmsite. The second has a freshness and a spontaneity that are perhaps not found in the others, though the third presses it hard in these respects; but there is a rugged grandeur in the first that puts it above the others.

And to think that when this second symphony was first played in Boston one of the leading critics then found the music perplexing and declared, when he was apparently sober and clothed in his right mind, that he could conceive of Sterndale Bennett writing a better symphony! That was 33 years ago. In 1945 some student in the Brown Room at the Public Library will doubtless be amused by opinions expressed by us all of works first heard in 1912. Some of us will not then be disturbed by his laughter or by quotations ornamented with exclamation marks of contempt or wonder.

Mr. Gebhard gave a very musical performance of Liszt's second concerto, which, lacking the circus pomp and dash of the first, is not so greatly enjoyed by a miscellaneous audience; but it is the more poetic and the more sensuous work. Mr. Gebhard's performance was distinguished first of all by fine tonal gradations and by genuine tonal beauty. He has evidently labored hard to acquire a rich tone and variety in degrees of force and his labor has been fully rewarded. His performance was also distinguished by clarity in expression, a sense of proportion, and a realization of the spirit of the composition. The performance was eminently satisfactory and the pianist was deservedly recalled several times.

The program of the concerts of March 8th and 9th will be as follows: Weingartner, Symphony No. 3, E major, op. 49 (first time in Boston); Sibelius, concerto for violin, D minor, op. 47 (Maud Powell, violinist), and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

FARRAR AND BOSTONIANS, CARUSO AND "THE RING"

10,000 Hear Music on a Holiday—Wagner Cycle Ends in a Blaze of Glory—Verdi Opera and Beethoven Symphony Share a Windy Night.

Over sidewalks littered with great shovelfulls of smashed plate glass store windows and around blocks of streets roped off to guard the Lilliputian wayfarer from the skysigns of Brobdingnag flopping bent and broken at the housetops in yesterday's big blow, 10,000 New Yorkers made their way to the halls of song on a windy Washington's Birthday and got themselves safe home again last night.

At the opera matinée the first sold-out "Ring" cycle in years ended with Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," well sung and beautifully attended. And all through the four hours of tragedy within doors coming events cast shadows without on the Gay White Way in the shape of a line of standees that stretched and grew and shivered in the breeze from 2 o'clock till 8. After hundreds if not thousands had been turned away, Caruso and the "Celeste Aida" shared the holiday night crowds with no less a star than Geraldine Farrar, who was singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to another house sold out at Carnegie Hall.

In the teeth of a gale, as it seemed, that offered real wind effects such as Richard Strauss never dreamed of, Miss Farrar misjudged the intimate acoustics of the hushed symphony chamber. She sang at the top of her voice that proper air of dying pianissimos, "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Taunhäuser." Perhaps it was as well that she did so. For the moment the by no means inconsiderable power of the prima donna drowned the echoes of the hurricane.

A woman gasped as the singer appeared, "But why the fan?" An ostrich fan found rest after waving a friendly salute to a topknot of green parrokeet's plumes on a pink plush scarf wound around the pretty head. A green and pink fish-tail train interlaced mermaid-fashion over the petticoats of white satin and beneath aprons of green-tufted white lace, came to grief inthe progress of the wearer through many recalls. On the fifth reappearance the divided hobble ripped and parted at points. Miss Farrar grabbed the stringing remnants neatly in one hand as she trailed three times more across the stage before her admirers let her go. She later sang a group of songs with piano by Schumann, Sinding and Grieg. But it seemed a pity to let an orchestra, and above all the Boston orchestra, travel 250 miles to sit silent in its own concert with a star who appears ten times oftener in New York.

The finest symphony audience that this town turns out made Max Fiedler and the Boston men stand up to be counted after a performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony, one of the master's few utterances of unaffected joy. A more transparent and smiling triad of allegro episodes would be hard to find. They fairly topped the pretty chatter of Mozart's overture to "Figaro." And the Beethoven adagio was as heartily applauded as the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration," wherein the gray and soon departing leader "touched the stars" with his gradations of unison of mounting tone.

The new "Rumanian Rhapsody" of George Enesco was a European novelty of simple folk tunes from the nearer East. It sparkled crimson as the cherry in the glass.

"THE NIBELUNG'S RING."

PUTNAM GRISWOLD.

GLOBE-

MARCH 2, 1912.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Heinrich Gebhard Again Heard as Soloist.

Plays Liszt's Second Concerto in A for Pianoforte.

The program of the 17th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Brahms' second symphony, Liszt's second concerto for pianoforte, Heinrich Gebhard, soloist, and Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," numbers all more or less familiar and not calling for extended comment.

Mr Fiedler's reading of "Egmont" is habitually one of strong dramatic accentuation and of contrast, as it was again yesterday. The playing of the symphony was notable chiefly for the euphony and virtuosity of the orchestra, a beauty and sonority of tone and faultless taste in style that gave significance to certain well-written pages, and partially robbed others of their power to induce weariness and the folding of hands. Even the playing of this orchestra cannot wholly dispel or transform the tedium of much of this music.

There is communicative enlargement upon the material of the first movement; the suave theme of the 'celli is grateful; there are agreeable pages in the second movement, but who can combat the heaviness of the third, or the sound and fury of the last, a vast deal of noise for the publication of the commonplace?

Nor did Liszt's concerto afford the comfort one could wish after weathering the symphony. It would have been a pleasure to have heard Mr Gebhard in a work that would have given freer expression to the peculiar poetic qualities of tone and interpretation, in which he is expert. He played with brilliance and the abandon of a rhetorical improvisation in so far as he could, with a reading of the accompaniment that was exemplary for its rigidity, disagreement of rhythm and general innocence of distinction. At times in the cadenza Mr Gebhard was inclined to force tone, an extraordinary thing for him, but in the few opportunities for lyrical feeling his accustomed sensitivity to tonal beauty and fine proportion of phrase asserted itself.

Liszt wrote much music which he did not publish. This concerto might have been suppressed without injury to his rank as a composer. It would be well if there were greater resemblance even to the E flat concerto than the reminiscent theme. There are few measures of worthy musical thought and they are obscured amid pompous processions and frenetic flights that are the veriest bombast, passages in which the pianist is made to sweep glissandos up and down the keyboard with all the aplomb with which Orpheus may have swept his lyre at the gates of hell, but with less moving music, passages also which even outdo the Brahms of the last movement.

Mr Gebhard's technical skill, his dignity and thoughtfulness of manner and the distinguishing touches of superiority which he is able to impart to a musical performance did not go unappreciated, and he was recalled by cordial applause.

Next week the orchestra will play Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," the Sibelius concerto for violin and orchestra, opus 47, with Maud Powell as soloist, and the third symphony, E major, of Mr Weingartner, a piece played for the first time in America Dec 28, 1911, by the Philharmonic Society at a concert in New York.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 1, 1912

THE PARAGON OF CHORUSES

THE MENDELSSOHN CHOIR AND ITS VIRTUES.

Its Rare Beauty and Command of Tone —Its Technical Perfections—Its Range of Emotional Expression—The Manifold Proofs of These Qualities—Conductor and Singers—A Choir, in Short, of Virtuosi —The Share of the Chicago Orchestra.

IN our musical generation, Boston has heard no such choral singing as that of the Mendelssohn Choir in Symphony Hall, last evening, and applauded no choral conductor of such ability as its leader, Dr. Vogt. For two hours and a half it held an audience that filled every corner of the great room, interested, intent, receptive and rewarding. Its programme traversed almost the whole range of choral music from a motet of Lotti for the early Italian vocal contrapuntists to light pieces by the contemporary Brockway and Von Storch. It touched the classics, ancient and modern, of choral music in the Sanctus of Bach's mass in B minor; in the "Judex Crederis" of Berlioz's "Te Deum," in the "Libera Me" of Verdi's Requiem. It entered opera with the choral and the acclamation of Sachs from the final scene in Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"; it skirted folk-song in Bantock's somewhat sophisticated arrangement of "Annie Laurie" and it dramatized the grave harmonies of Gounod in his setting of the psalm of the waters of Babylon. The chorus sang some of these pieces without accompaniment; and when an accompaniment was necessary, sixty-odd members of the Thomas Orchestra of Chicago played it. With Mr. Stock himself leading they also played Georg Schumann's overture, "Liebesfrühling," an orchestral version of Wagner's "Träume," the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser," and a "Symphonic Waltz" by the conductor himself.

The Orchestra

Two months ago the orchestra and the conductor proved their remarkable and their exciting quality in a concert of their own that first revealed them to Boston. In the concert of last evening they bore inevitably a secondary part, but there was fresh occasion to feel and to admire the incisiveness, the warmth and the elasticity of the string tone, the rich songfulness of the woodwinds, the glowing voices of the horns, the firm and mellow brass, and the mingled euphony and animation of the whole band. Again, too, there was reason to admire the re-creating zest of Mr. Stock's conducting, the justice of his spirited pace, his skill in transition, his feeling for the sensuous, the songful, the expressive, and the euphonious qualities of tone, his sense of orchestral balance, and his alert and sympathetic response to the composer's design and mood. A larger body of strings would have served him and the Venusberg music better; and he could not quite attain the sensual bite and clatter of the Bacchanale, but he ordered the decline of the revel in long curves of gradually diminishing tone that were full of dying sensuous beauty and excitement. "Träume," which after all was a simple sketch for "Tristan," hardly bore, even with the glowing horns that were like the voice of a glorified Brangäne, the inflation of orchestral dress. But Mr. Stock's own waltz, with its long-breathed phrases, its variable intermezzi, its piquant harmonies and its warm instrumental coloring, was good to hear. Moreover, George Schumann's overture is quite too happy an orchestral jeu d'esprit for the Symphony Concerts longer to overlook. Sentimental charm, the highest of musical spirits, a lightsome gayety, all clothed in bright instrumental colors, all moving to clear rhythms and brilliant harmonies, shine in it. Long ago Chicago discovered the pleasure, the fun of it.

The Choir

There on the stage, banked solidly across it in a rising rectangle—the women in front and the men behind—sat the choir, 230 strong. It is the just musical pride and glory of the Toronto that first gathered and then fostered it, until it rose to its present unmatched place in the choruses of America and perhaps of Europe itself. It is easy to doubt whether Siegfried Ochs's noted choir in Berlin excels it. Those that have heard celebrated English choruses, which admittedly outrank those of the Continent, were quick to say last evening that the Mendelssohn Choir outstripped them. As to choral singing in its present estate in Boston and in New York, in opera house and concert-room both, the Torontans were like a revelation of what it might, could, and, above all, should be. The reasons for this superiority are not far to seek. The Canadians of Toronto have seemingly inherited the British aptitude for choral singing, the British quality of voice, especially in men, that undoubtedly suits it. Each year, moreover, the Mendelssohn Choir is automatically dissolved, reëxamined, reconstituted. Thus no spent or unfit voices linger in it. Again these Britons—or these Canadians—love their choral singing for its own sake. They are unremitting in attendance at rehearsals; diligent in practice; readily submissive to discipline; tireless and ambitious until they have gained the end that they and their conductor seek. Of such was the Mendelssohn Choir in its earliest days. Now, with its unique reputation established, with its unique prestige to maintain, it has become the more passionate—and with true British staying-power—in the pursuit of perfection. It owes its attainments and the standards and the spirit that have made them possible, most of all to its conductor, Dr. Vogt.

The Conductor

Dr. Vogt himself is a short, stoutish, smooth-faced, gray-haired man of early middle age. He comes unobtrusively to his place before his choir; he acknowledges applause for it and him modestly and unaffectedly. His conducting is as quiet as Theodore Thomas's was. He makes no strenuous or extravagant motions of body; he does not write the contours of the music upon the air; he is not endlessly signalling to chorus and orchestra. His beat is clean and clear; his few signals plain; his swelling or diminishing of tone unforced, his "leading" of a particular part in the choral web less command than persuasion. Plainly, it is in rehearsal that he brings his choir to understanding and fulfilment of his purposes until he can depend securely upon them, so that in the concert-room he has but to hint (as Mr. Weingartner likes to say) at what he would have them do and what they are fully prepared to accomplish. Plainly, too, Dr. Vogt is a man of communicating energy, of quick and expansive sensibility, of firm control, who disciplines himself as he disciplines his choir, who holds himself no less rigorously to his standards than he would have it keep to them. He is not careless or insensitive to the share of an orchestra in his choral music; he can coördinate it well with his choir; but he is plainly not so responsive to orchestral tone design and accomplishment generally he is to choral. In him are the mysteries and the undefinable powers of a conductor of the first rank—unmistakable in their results—but they are limited to choral music as they have been applied and cultivated in it.

The Wondrous Tone

As a choral conductor, Dr. Vogt has an extraordinarily sensitive ear for quality of tone. The individual singer would be fortunate could she attain to such loveliness of tone as came last evening, especially in higher passages, out of the soprano throats of the choir. The individual tenor would be as fortunate could he match the exquisite tone of these Torontan tenors. With both men and women, it was choral tone sublimated to a shimmering beauty as of translucent air. The basses were of a mellow and pulsing richness without a trace of roughness. The contralto tone was deep and luscious to the ear. Dr. Vogt is as sensitive to the blending and the balancing of this tone. He keeps it and the singers keep it with him in a perfect and caressing euphony. There are no rough edges, no loose jointures in it. It flows endlessly. The Motet of Lotti is vocal counterpoint, and the conductor and the singers interwove the strands of tone with a transparent clearness and a flawless elasticity. The intertwining vocal arabasques wrote themselves on the air.

Again, Dr. Vogt and the singers almost perfectly command varying intensities, varying styles, as it were, of tone. They lifted Bach's Sanctus in spirals that ascended to finer and more ethereal beauty. They gave the choral and the acclamation of "Die Meistersinger," their square-toed sturdiness, their rich magnificence and magniloquence of sound. The "Judex Crederis" was often a mighty proclamation in striding tone. Like Gounod's sober and ominous motet, it suddenly became cathedral-like. A little hymn of Grieg's to the Virgin Mother, the women suffused with a tone of exquisite and aerated beauty and gentleness. To it ensued the "Libera Me" of Verdi's Requiem, music now of sombre foreboding, now of piercing entreaty, again of pious and half-assured petition. It is music that has at each turn of the text, its appropriate and poignant beauty. It must be sung with a songfulness that is the more song because of the feeling that touches it. As the choristers were as one with their tones to beauty, so were they as one in emotional and impartial response to it. And, a little further on-ward, the choir was singing Brockway's happy setting of one of Shakspeare's lightly-fancied and frolicsome songs—the "Hey Nonino" of "As You Like It"—with a tune that distilled its gayly fantastic charm. Or the men's choir were trolling out a cavalier tune—of Bullard—in a fashion that made it eloquent and spirited music. Or the whole choir was achieving in firm and surging climax, the large pomp of Edgar's apostrophe to Britain.. Now whether the singers be one or two hundred, a beautiful tone, an expressive tone, a varied tone, is the sum and the substance, the beginning and the end of musical impairment. No choir, no choral conductor, has so mastered these secrets or gone so far in high and various attainment in them as Dr. Vogt and these Torontans.

The Song

It seems almost pedagogical, before these higher achievements of the Mendelssohn Choir, to rehearse the technical skill of the choristers and their conductor—their fidelity to the true pitch, their decisiveness of attack, their precision of utterance, their separate and collective command of vocal technique, their sense of pace and rhythm. It was as though each individual singer had been schooled in these essentials by a precisely similar method, until the whole choir had fused and assimilated them. These were the foundations from which arose the unfailing beauty, the unflagging expressiveness, the perfect fitness of the tone with which the choir sang, whatever the musical style, whatever the emotional contents of the particular piece. From this foundation arose the perfect clarity and suppleness of the interwoven choral voices, no matter whether Lotti's or Bach's or Wagner's was the contrapuntal web. With such resources, the choir could attain to the felicity of rhythmic variation and adroit transition that distinguished some of their singing, to its superlative beauty of rounded phrase, to its just and sometimes exquisite variation of the quality and weight and volume of its tone, to the light or deep and always beautiful flow of its sustained song. Its fullest tones were steadily sonorous but never merely loud, it could sing in half-voice as not too many individual singers can; its softest tones were of gossamer delicacy and suavity. It could be as fleet as light itself. In fine, it was as though the 230 were but one mind in him—or may be her—were the spirit and the purpose of the conductor. Even the unsexed tone of Lotti and of Bach was within these powers. Here was a chorus lyrical, songful in the fullest and the finest sense of both words.

The Expression

Like unanimity and a unique sensitiveness equally distinguished the singing of the choir on its expressive, its poetizing, its dramatizing side. We count it no small achievement of a string quartet when the four players have fused themselves into a common understanding of their music and a common emotional and impassioned response to it. Here two hundred and more have been so trained—trained until with a common accord they feel, denote and differentiate the style of their several pieces, the mood and the spirit that inform and underlie them, the atmosphere that surrounds them. Lotti's motet went in its vocal purity, but also in its mood of aspiring song. The large affirmation of Berlioz's fragment strode in the choir's tones and also the large entreaty of it. The might and the majesty of faith marched in the singing of Bach's Sanctus, like the sound of many and great voices. The choruses from "Die Meistersinger" had their voice of operatic pomp and their voice of sturdy song by all the folk. The tones of the singers haloed Grieg's hymn. And then in the lighter pieces there were pretty sentimental simplicity, bright fancy, silvery tone-picturing, frolicsome gayety—and all equally perfect. A single singer might not be more sensitive to each mood, to each atmosphere and to the due impartment of both. And even there the choir did not stop. At a hint from the conductor, it individualized a phrase, colored it, varied a rhythm, shaded a climax as though it were a single voice. Most choruses stop short with large effects. They sing in mass and not in detail. The Mendelssohn Choir goes on to the smallest perfections, to the minutest of details. It actually knows and achieves subtleties. The two hundred are as one and that one is their conductor. There are such orchestras of virtuosi. Here is the chorus of them.

H. T. P.

POST,

FEBRUARY 25, 1912

MISS ELENA GERHARDT,
Who is to be a soloist at the Pension Fund Concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Gerhardt to Appear in Pension Fund Programme Next Sunday Evening

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night, March 3. At the first concert, early in the season, the orchestra had the assistance of Madame Schumann-Heink, and the concert was most successful from every point of view. For this concert a singer as distinguished in her line as Madame Schumann-Heink is in hers, Elena Gerhardt, has generously offered her services, which offer has been gladly accepted by the committee in charge.

Few singers have come to Boston, and in such a short time won so large a public as Miss Gerhardt. Heralded as one of the greatest lieder singers in the world it turned out that the reports which preceded her coming had not been exaggerated, for Miss Gerhardt in her recitals and at her appearance with the Symphony Orchestra exhibited traits and qualities of singing rarely found in the younger generations of artists.

It is still impossible to make final announcement regarding the programme, for Mr. Fiedler has been away with the orchestra during the past week on the fourth Southern trip. This announcement, however, will be made very shortly.

For the general public—that part of it which is not in regular attendance at the Symphony concerts—this concert will gain added interest because it will be the last time a special concert will be given by the orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler.

HERALD,

FEBRUARY 25, 1912.

SYMPHONY BENEFIT

Program of Concert of March 3 Announced by Mr. Fiedler.

Mr. Fiedler yesterday afternoon sent over the completed program of the concert to be given in Symphony Hall, the evening of March 3, in aid of the Symphony Orchestra. The soloist, already announced, will be Miss Elena Gerhardt. The orchestral numbers will all be by Tschaikowsky. The first part of the program will consist of the Pathetic Symphony. After the intermission Miss Gerhardt will sing three Wagner's songs, "Stehe Still," "Traeume," "Schmerzen," with orchestra. The "Nutcracker Suite" will follow; then Miss Gerhardt will sing five of Schumann's songs with piano accompaniment, "Zwinzicalishches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Der Soldatenbraut," "Ich Grolle Nicht," "Fruehlingsnacht." The final number will be the "1812" overture with

From EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

Address

Date

FIEDLER'S PERSONALITY IN GREAT PROGRAM

Est: All-Tschaikowski Evening Brings Satisfaction To Lovers Of The Slav Composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler conducting, presented an all-Tschaikowski program at the Lyric last night. This was the fourth concert of the series and marked the last but one of the appearances of the present director. Mr. Fiedler's geniality on former occasions has won for him many adherents, and last evening he again had reason to feel that he has warm admirers among our local public. There was a floral token of appreciation handed him after the performance of the principal work of the evening.

Tschaikowski may be classed among the inspired composers, for if we summarize his composition efforts we find little of the pedantic and trite, but instead become aware of the tremendous power of expression, the human feeling and the sweeping realism which was possessed by this pen. The "Elegia" from the serenade for stringed orchestra is an example of the wonderful poetic faculty of this Slavic writer, and here, with the simplest means at hand, there is attained effect after effect, which prove that with inspiration as a basis for a tone structure there need be no resorting to the coloring instruments, such as the wood-wind and the brasses, for the expressing of ideas. In this instance Tschaikowski displays a command of instrumentation and secures all that is desired in coloring this elegical thought by using string tone alone.

The B minor symphony, No. 6, Opus 74, which is called "Pathetic," is a work of noble contour throughout. Mr. Fiedler read this score in an individual manner. The first movement gave the director the opportunities in which he glories, and in consequence it was no surprise to hear more than the alloted sentiment instilled in certain melodic episodes. Again the temperamental tendencies of Mr. Fiedler, which have often been commented upon in the performances of other works by various composers, made the second and third parts of this symphony take on more vigor than ordinarily. All in all, this interpretation was satisfying, but there may be those who prefer less sentimentalizing and expect rather to have the emotional contrasts and the depth of this symphony exploited with more telling conviction. The orchestral balance was not well adjusted throughout, nor was there always precision of attack. Certain entrances of the solo instruments, too, showed plainly that the "Sousaesque actions" of this baton do not carry full meaning to the musicians, although they may look pretty to the audience.

Mr. Fiedler doubtless is entranced with what he is hearing and lets his stick forget its mission—that is, to anticipate the beat and assert the measure—therefore this assuming of rhythmical poses may be entirely an unconscious matter with him. It unfortunately results in a less well-ordered ensemble than has heretofore been the rule with this organization. The delightful "Nutcracker Suite," with its characteristic dances, its quaint tone painting, its graceful melodies, all in happy vein, put the listeners in a chortling frame of mind. After each movement one could hear "ahs!" of contentment. The celesta, with its soft, gentle clang, appealed, and the player of this unusual orchestral instrument came in for a share of applause. These movements were charmingly played with enthusiasm that betokened personal enjoyment.

The overture "1812" formed a rousing close to this program, and its bluster and blare, which is meant to describe French and Russian strife, made its noisy effect upon the hearers.

F. C. B.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 21 and 23, respectively. This will be Conductor Max Fiedler's final appearances as the head of the Boston Orchestra. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company. For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler will arrange a special programme to mark his farewell.

[148]

TIGHT BINDING

EVENING GLOBE
New York
ess ..... FEB 28 1912

Choral Singing of Rare Merit From Toronto

The Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago in Notable Concert—Other Music Yesterday.

TO-DAY.

Carnegie Hall—8.15 P. M., concert by the Mendelssohn Choir and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Carnegie Lyceum—8.15 P. M., song recital by Ludwig Hess, tenor.

Metropolitan Opera House—8.15 P. M., "Tosca."

Waldorf-Astoria—3 P. M., concert for the benefit of the Diet Kitchen.

TO-MORROW.

Carnegie Hall—8.15 P. M., concert of the Philharmonic Society.

Metropolitan Opera House—8.15 P. M., "Le Donne Curiose."

The Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto came down from the north a few years ago and showed us what choral singing can be. Now it is with us again, and last night, in conjunction with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, gave the first of two concerts in Carnegie Hall. To praise the Mendelssohn Choir is about as easy or about as difficult, whichever way you happen to look at the matter, as to praise the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It does things as a matter of course that few other choirs do at all. Its technique—you can't go all through the wearisome list of attack, precision, unanimity, and the rest of it—is not only brilliant and secure, but as if second nature, and the choir is no less remarkable for the foundation qualities of the freshness and vigor of its voices and the balance of the several parts.

With an instrument of such native quality and such splendid training to play upon, it is no wonder that Dr. A. S. Vogt, the forceful conductor of the choir, can achieve remarkable results of interpretation, and Dr. Vogt is not only a masterful conductor but a masterly one. He can command his chorus like a field marshal, but he commands them in the interest of the musical message he wishes to impart. The result of the performances under his direction is the high musical pleasure one seldom experiences save from the best orchestras under the guidance of great conductors.

The programme of this concert was no doubt planned primarily to show the chorus to advantage. It was heard in two motets—a "Crucifixus" by Lotti and Gounod's setting of Psalm cxxxvii.—the "Judex crederis" from Berlioz's "Te Deum," "Lo! Now an Angel Calleth," from Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova"; the "Sanctus," from Bach's B minor Mass; a group of modern a cappella songs (including Granville Bantock's arrangement of "Annie Laurie"), and some pieces by Elgar.

The Theodore Thomas Orchestra, besides playing accompaniments under the direction of Dr. Vogt, contributed to the programme under the direction of its conductor, Mr. Stock, Georg Schumann's "Liebesfrühling" overture, Theodore Thomas's concert arrangement of Wagner's "Träume," the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," and Mr. Stock's "Symphonic Waltz." An orchestra trailing its length along the front of a stage with a large chorus as background is not heard to advantage, and yet the fine qualities this particular orchestra revealed at its concert here earlier in the season were often noticeable yesterday. In particular the performance of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale, which Mr. Stock took at a quicker tempo than is customary, was of remarkable effectiveness. The audience was large and enthusiastic

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 19, 1912

Rarely does the Symphony Orchestra, at ome or abroad, devote a whole concert to e music of one composer, and hitherto e "Wagner Concerts" for the Pension und have been the nearest approach to ch a thoroughly "unified" programme. n its present trip, however, and probably r the first time in its existence, it will ve an "all-Tschaikowsky" concert—in altimore on Wednesday. The chosen eces are the Pathetic Symphony, the utcracker Suite, the overture "1812" and Elegy for strings from the Serenade.

The second of the two annual concerts the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension und has been appointed for Sunday, ening, March 3 at Symphony Hall. The rogramme and the assisting soloists will speedily announced.

HERALD, FEBRUARY 28, 1912.

ELENA GERHARDT

Soloist at Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund Concert Next Sunday Evening.

GERHARDT TO SING AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Will Appear with Symphony Orchestra Next Sunday Evening.

Elena Gerhardt's last appearance of the season will be at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening when she will give her services. Miss Gerhardt will sing three Wagner songs with orchestra and five Schumann songs with piano. The orchestral numbers will be devoted entirely to Tschaikowsky; the "Pathetic" symphony, the "Nut Cracker" suite and the "1812" overture. This will be Mr. Fiedler's last appearance at a concert outside of the regular Symphony concerts.

POST,
FEBRUARY 25, 1912

Pension Fund Concert

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night, March 3. Elena Gerhardt has generously offered her services.

For the general public—that part of it which is not in regular attendance at the Symphony concerts—this concert will gain added interest because it will be the last time that a special concert will be given by the orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. He has many friends and admirers in Boston who are not regular attendants at the Symphony concerts, and they will undoubtedly take advantage of this opportunity to testify to their friendship for him as well as their friendship for the orchestra.

Mendelssohn Choir

The principal musical event of the coming week, and in its way the most interesting concert that Boston has had in a number of years, will be that given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening by the famous Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago. The Mendelssohn Choir is in the enviable position of being the possessor of a very large surplus from the concerts which it has given in Toronto and surrounding cities in the last few years. Although the choir has never visited this city its fame has preceded it, and everybody interested directly or indirectly in choral music seems anxious to hear what is generally conceded to be the most wonderful chorus on this continent if not in the world.

Moreover, the excellent impression made in—December by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago is bearing fruit in the decided desire of the musical public to hear it again. The programme is one of a wide range of music extending from Lotti and Bach to such modern composers as Wagner and Bantock. The choir and orchestra will have the assistance of Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano.

Symphony Concert

Madame Olga Samaroff was to have been the soloist at the 17th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra. Unfortunately Madame Samaroff was taken ill in Milwaukee a fortnight ago and has been compelled to cancel all her engagements for the remainder of the season. In her place Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has engaged as soloist Mr. Heinrich Gebhard of this city, who is one of the most admired of Boston pianists.

Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on this programme. It is as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Symphony in D-Major, No. 2.....Brahms
Concerto in A-Major for piano and orchestra .....Liszt
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini,".....Berlioz

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 26, 1912

The Pension-Fund Programme

THE "Tschaikowsky concert" that the Symphony Orchestra undertook in Baltimore last week went well. Tschaikowsky's music, next to Wagner's, probably interests the variegated public of the Pension Fund concerts beyond that of any other composer. Accordingly, it is a "Tschaikowsky programme" that Mr. Fiedler and the Symphony Orchestra will play next Sunday evening. The three pieces that the average concert-goer associates most readily with the composer make it: The Pathetic Symphony, the suite of dances from the "Nut-Cracker" ballet and the overture, "1812." Between them, Miss Gerhardt will sing her songs out of Wagner and Schumann.

Mr. Paur Succeeds Dr. Muck

A week ago Emil Paur was "under official consideration" as the successor of Dr. Muck in the conductorship of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Now he is "officially designated" for the post and congratulatory telegrams are falling on his doorstep. The coincidence is singular and the resuscitation of Mr. Paur more singular still. Dr. Muck, who long conducted at the Royal Opera, comes again to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, who conducted with that orchestra for five years, between 1893 and 1898, succeeds Dr. Muck in that opera house. From Boston Mr. Paur, as orchestral conductor, passed to New York and the Philharmonic Society and to Pittsburgh and its orchestra. He did not add to his reputation in either post, and with the Pittsburgh orchestra he distinctly lost in prestige until the orchestra became extinct. Of late he has been living in Berlin in relative retirement, jobless except for occasional appearances as a chance conductor or pianist. Now he suddenly emerges as the conducter-designate of an important opera house. He has had his operatic experience early and late, in German opera houses, at the Metropolitan and at Covent Garden.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau TRIBUNE
From ..... PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Address .....
Date ..... FEB 18 1912

In the audience at the fourth Symphony concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday were: Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Col. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Rev. and Mrs. Frank W. Crowder, Mr. F. L. Hinckley, Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. Joseph Bridgham, the Misses Bridgham, Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hall Brown, Mr. and Mrs. S. Eugene Jackson, Mrs. William McDonald, Jr., Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Anne Henshaw, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs Walter J. Comstock, Miss Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mrs. F. Ellis Jackson, Miss Georgia Frances Fiske, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Holmes, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. F. W. Allen, Mrs. Richmond Allen, Dr. and Mrs. Edward B. Harvey, Miss Evangeline Larry, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mrs. J. J. Finnigan, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Mrs. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Helen [illegible]

From TIMES
Address New York
Date FEB 23 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Rhapsody by Enesco Played—Miss Farrar Soloist.

Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening a programme made up, with one exception, of familiar things, in a manner that they have made happily familiar to their New York public. The exception was a Roumanian Rhapsody by Georges Enesco, the young Roumanian composer, whose symphony and orchestral suite have made him known here as a composer of originality with something individual to express. His Rhapsody is of much less consequence as a musical composition than the symphony, or even the suite. It is unpretentious, being little more than a succession of lively and characteristic folk tunes of Roumania, with little or no attempt at development. These are good tunes, and Enesco has presented them in brilliant and taking instrumental guise, and in accomplishing this he has apparently done all that he attempted to do.

The overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," played with immense vivacity and crispness, and at a very rapid tempo, began the concert. The symphony was Beethoven's fourth, and of this the performance was highly finished and very effective; more than effective, because it gave much the inner spirit of the work. Richard Strauss's tone poem "Tod und Verklärung" was also played. Mr. Fiedler gave a highly elaborated performance of it that laid bare the structure of the work and the phases of emotion the composer sought to express in it.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. She sang Elisabeth's prayer from the last act of "Tannhäuser" in a fashion that won her much applause from the audience; and then songs with piano accompaniment by Schumann, Sinding, and

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date

MISS FARRAR SOLIST.

Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist to-night at the Boston Symphony concert; Bessie Bell Collier, a pupil of Franz Kneisel, will play to-morrow night with this organization in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon Alwin Schroeder, the venerable 'cellist, who stands at the head of 'cello soloists, will appear with the organization of which he is leading 'cellist.

This will be the last but one appearance of Max Fiedler with the Boston Symphony orchestra, as next season will mark the return of Dr. Muck, who will come at the munificent salary of $28,000 for the season. The place left vacant by Dr. Muck's return to America will be filled by Emil Paur, formerly conductor of the Boston, the Philharmonic and the Pittsburg orchestras of this country.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 21 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES.

Concertmeister Witek Is Soloist at the Fourth Concert of the Season.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra has acquired so strong a hold upon the music-loving and social sets of Washington as to obviate the necessity of engaging international celebrities as solo artists was shown at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, where many patrons who were unable to secure seats stood through a long but admirably presented program, which included Schumann's second symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Richard Strauss' captivating "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody."

The soloist for the concert was Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the orchestra, who, while a sincere and gifted artist, has not the reputation for virtuosity enjoyed by the other musicians who have appeared with the Boston Symphony earlier in the season. His reading of Wienawski's concerto in D minor, with orchestral accompaniment, was most gratifying, and served to impress upon the public the splendid talents of the organization's first violin. His tone was full and rich in color.

The third movement of the symphony was greeted with great enthusiasm. It is in the adagio of this symphony that all admirers of Schumann (and who is not?) take a peculiar pleasure in recognizing the historic "melancholy bassoon" which seems to reflect so intimately a period in the composer's own life.

It was just two years ago that the Boston Symphony played Strauss' controversial work, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," here, and its repetition yesterday afternoon was the most interesting feature of the program. The speculation among critics and contemporaries as to just what the composer has depicted in his music does not mar in any degree the pleasure which the auditor derives from the brilliant quips and cranks and melodic wiles of this rare rogue of harmony. It is music which makes one laugh and thrill at the same time. Herr Max Fiedler's reading of the score yesterday afternoon was particularly felicitous.

The Mozart overture and the Enesco rhapsody opened and closed the program.

[149]

TIGHT BINDING

EVENING GLOBE

New York

ess ..... FEB 28 1912

Choral Singing of Rare Merit From Toronto

The Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago in Notable Concert—Other Music Yesterday.

TO-DAY.

Carnegie Hall—8.15 P. M., concert by the Mendelssohn Choir and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Carnegie Lyceum—8.15 P. M., song recital by Ludwig Hess, tenor.

Metropolitan Opera House—8.15 P. M., "Tosca."

Waldorf-Astoria—3 P. M., concert for the benefit of the Diet Kitchen.

TO-MORROW.

Carnegie Hall—8.15 P. M., concert of the Philharmonic Society.

Metropolitan Opera House—8.15 P. M., "Le Donne Curiose."

The Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto came down from the north a few years ago and showed us what choral singing can be. Now it is with us again, and last night, in conjunction with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, gave the first of two concerts in Carnegie Hall. To praise the Mendelssohn Choir is about as easy or about as difficult, whichever way you happen to look at the matter, as to praise the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It does things as a matter of course that few other choirs do at all. Its technique—you can go all through the wearisome list of attack, precision, unanimity, and the rest of it—is not only brilliant and secure, but as if second nature, and the choir is no less remarkable for the foundation qualities of the freshness and vigor of its voices and the balance of the several parts.

With an instrument of such native quality and such splendid training to play upon, it is no wonder that Dr. A. S. Vogt, the forceful conductor of the choir, can achieve remarkable results of interpretation, and Dr. Vogt is not only a masterful conductor but a masterly one. He can command his chorus like a field marshal, but he commands them in the interest of the musical message he wishes to impart. The result of the performances under his direction is the high musical pleasure one seldom experiences save from the best orchestras under the guidance of great conductors.

The programme of this concert was no doubt planned primarily to show the chorus to advantage. It was heard in two motets—a "Crucifixus" by Lotti and Gounod's setting of Psalm cxxxvii.—the "Judex crederis" from Berlioz's "Te Deum," "Lo! Now an Angel Calleth," from Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova"; the "Sanctus," from Bach's B minor Mass; a group of modern a cappella songs (including Granville Bantock's arrangement of "Annie Laurie"), and some pieces by Elgar.

The Theodore Thomas Orchestra, besides playing accompaniments under the direction of Dr. Vogt, contributed to the programme under the direction of its conductor, Mr. Stock, Georg Schumann's "Liebesfrühling" overture, Theodore Thomas's concert arrangement of Wagner's "Träume," the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," and Mr. Stock's "Symphonic Waltz." An orchestra trailing its length along the front of a stage with a large chorus as background is not heard to advantage, and yet the fine qualities this particular orchestra revealed at its concert here earlier in the season were often noticeable yesterday. In particular the performance of the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale, which Mr. Stock took at a quicker tempo than is customary, was of remarkable effectiveness. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 19, 1912

Rarely does the Symphony Orchestra, at me or abroad, devote a whole concert to e music of one composer, and hitherto e "Wagner Concerts" for the Pension und have been the nearest approach to ch a thoroughly "unified" programme. n its present trip, however, and probably r the first time in its existence, it will ve an "all-Tschaikowsky" concert—in ltimore on Wednesday. The chosen ces are the Pathetic Symphony, the tcracker Suite, the overture "1812" and Elegy for strings from the Serenade.

The second of the two annual concerts the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension nd has been appointed for Sunday, ening, March 3 at Symphony Hall. The ogramme and the assisting soloists will speedily announced.

HERALD, FEBRUARY 28, 1912.

ELENA GERHARDT

Soloist at Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund Concert Next Sunday Evening.

GERHARDT TO SING AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Will Appear with Symphony Orchestra Next Sunday Evening.

Elena Gerhardt's last appearance of the season will be at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening when she will give her services. Miss Gerhardt will sing three Wagner songs with orchestra and five Schumann songs with piano. The orchestral numbers will be devoted entirely to Tschaikowsky; the "Pathetic" symphony, the "Nut Cracker" suite and the "1812" overture. This will be Mr. Fiedler's last appearance at a concert outside of the regular Symphony concerts.

POST, FEBRUARY 25, 1912

Pension Fund Concert

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night, March 3. Elena Gerhardt has generously offered her services.

For the general public—that part of it which is not in regular attendance at the Symphony concerts—this concert will gain added interest because it will be the last time that a special concert will be given by the orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. He has many friends and admirers in Boston who are not regular attendants at the Symphony concerts, and they will undoubtedly take advantage of this opportunity to testify to their friendship for him as well as their friendship for the orchestra.

Mendelssohn Choir

The principal musical event of the coming week, and in its way the most interesting concert that Boston has had in a number of years, will be that given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening by the famous Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago. The Mendelssohn Choir is in the enviable position of being the possessor of a very large surplus from the concerts which it has given in Toronto and surrounding cities in the last few years. Although the choir has never visited this city its fame has preceded it, and everybody interested directly or indirectly in choral music seems anxious to hear what is generally conceded to be the most wonderful chorus on this continent if not in the world.

Moreover, the excellent impression made in December by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago is bearing fruit in the decided desire of the musical public to hear it again. The programme is one of a wide range of music extending from Lotti and Bach to such modern composers as Wagner and Bantock. The choir and orchestra will have the assistance of Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano.

Symphony Concert

Madame Olga Samaroff was to have been the soloist at the 17th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra. Unfortunately Madame Samaroff was taken ill in Milwaukee a fortnight ago and has been compelled to cancel all her engagements for the remainder of the season. In her place Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has engaged as soloist Mr. Heinrich Gebhard of this city, who is one of the most admired of Boston pianists.

Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on this programme. It is as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Symphony in D-Major, No. 2.....Brahms
Concerto in A-Major for piano and orchestra .....Liszt
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini,".....Berlioz

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 26, 1912

The Pension-Fund Programme

THE "Tschaikowsky concert" that the Symphony Orchestra undertook in Baltimore last week went well. Tschaikowsky's music, next to Wagner's, probably interests the variegated public of the Pension Fund concerts beyond that of any other composer. Accordingly, it is a "Tschaikowsky programme" that Mr. Fiedler and the Symphony Orchestra will play next Sunday evening. The three pieces that the average concert-goer associates most readily with the composer make it: The Pathetic Symphony, the suite of dances from the "Nut-Cracker" ballet and the overture, "1812." Between them, Miss Gerhardt will sing her songs out of Wagner and Schumann.

Mr. Paur Succeeds Dr. Muck

A week ago Emil Paur was "under official consideration" as the successor of Dr. Muck in the conductorship of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Now he is "officially designated" for the post and congratulatory telegrams are falling on his doorstep. The coincidence is singular and the resuscitation of Mr. Paur more singular still. Dr. Muck, who long conducted at the Royal Opera, comes again to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, who conducted with that orchestra for five years, between 1893 and 1898, succeeds Dr. Muck in that opera house. From Boston Mr. Paur, as orchestral conductor, passed to New York and the Philharmonic Society and to Pittsburgh and its orchestra. He did not add to his reputation in either post, and with the Pittsburgh orchestra he distinctly lost in prestige until the orchestra became extinct. Of late he has been living in Berlin in relative retirement, jobless except for occasional appearances as a chance conductor or pianist. Now he suddenly emerges as the conductor-designate of an important opera house. He has had his operatic experience early and late, in German opera houses, at the Metropolitan and at Covent Garden.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

From .....

Address ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date ..... FEB 18 1912

Symphony Concert.

In the audience at the fourth Symphony concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday were: Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Col. H. Martin Brown, Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Miss Durfee, Rev. and Mrs. Frank W. Crowder, Mr. F. L. Hinckley, Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. Joseph Bridgham, the Misses Bridgham, Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hall Brown, Mr. and Mrs. S. Eugene Jackson, Mrs. William McDonald, Jr., Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Anne Henshaw, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clarke, Mrs Walter J. Comstock, Miss Comstock, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mrs. F. Ellis Jackson, Miss Georgia Frances Fiske, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Holmes, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. F. W. Allen, Mrs. Richmond Allen, Dr. and Mrs. Edward B. Harvey, Miss Evangeline Larry, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mrs. J. J. Finnigan, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Mrs. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Helen [illegible]

Esta

From TIMES

Address New York

Date FEB 2 3 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Rhapsody by Enesco Played—Miss Farrar Soloist.

Mr. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening a programme made up, with one exception, of familiar things, in a manner that they have made happily familiar to their New York public. The exception was a Roumanian Rhapsody by Georges Enesco, the young Roumanian composer, whose symphony and orchestral suite have made him known here as a composer of originality with something individual to express. His Rhapsody is of much less consequence as a musical composition than the symphony, or even the suite. It is unpretentious, being little more than a succession of lively and characteristic folk tunes of Roumania, with little or no attempt at development. These are good tunes, and Enesco has presented them in a brilliant and taking instrumental guise, and in accomplishing this he has apparently done all that he attempted to do.

The overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," played with immense vivacity and crispness, and at a very rapid tempo, began the concert. The symphony was Beethoven's fourth, and of this the performance was highly finished and very effective; more than effective, because it gave much the inner spirit of the work. Richard Strauss's tone poem "Tod und Verklärung" was also played. Mr. Fiedler gave a highly elaborated performance of it that laid bare the structure of the work and the phases of emotion the composer sought to express in it.

Miss Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. She sang Elisabeth's prayer from the last act of "Tannhäuser" in a fashion that won her much applause from the audience; and then songs with piano accompaniment by Schumann, Sinding, and

Esta

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date .....

MISS FARRAR SOLIST.

Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist to-night at the Boston Symphony concert; Bessie Bell Collier, a pupil of Franz Kneisel, will play to-morrow night with this organization in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon Alwin Schroeder, the venerable 'cellist, who stands at the head of 'cello soloists, will appear with the organization of which he is leading 'cellist.

This will be the last but one appearance of Max Fiedler with the Boston Symphony orchestra, as next season will mark the return of Dr. Muck, who will come at the munificent salary of $28,000 for the season. The place left vacant by Dr. Muck's return to America will be filled by Emil Paur, formerly conductor of the Boston, the Philharmonic and the Pittsburg orchestras of this country.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES.

Concertmeister Witek Is Soloist at the Fourth Concert of the Season.

Esta 8

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra has acquired so strong a hold upon the music-loving and social sets of Washington as to obviate the necessity of engaging international celebrities as solo artists was shown at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, where many patrons who were unable to secure seats stood through a long but admirably presented program, which included Schumann's second symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Richard Strauss' captivating "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody."

The soloist for the concert was Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the orchestra, who, while a sincere and gifted artist, has not the reputation for virtuosity enjoyed by the other musicians who have appeared with the Boston Symphony earlier in the season. His reading of Wienawski's concerto in D minor, with orchestral accompaniment, was most gratifying, and served to impress upon the public the splendid talents of the organization's first violin. His tone was full and rich in color.

The third movement of the symphony was greeted with great enthusiasm. It is in the adagio of this symphony that all admirers of Schumann (and who is not?) take a peculiar pleasure in recognizing the historic "melancholy bassoon" which seems to reflect so intimately a period in the composer's own life.

It was just two years ago that the Boston Symphony played Strauss' controversial work, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," here, and its repetition yesterday afternoon was the most interesting feature of the program. The speculation among critics and contemporaries as to just what the composer has depicted in his music does not mar in any degree the pleasure which the auditor derives from the brilliant quips and cranks and melodic wiles of this rare rogue of harmony. It is music which makes one laugh and thrill at the same time. Herr Max Fiedler's reading of the score yesterday afternoon was particularly felicitous.

The Mozart overture and the Enesco rhapsody opened and closed the program.

[149]

PRESS.

From

New York

Address

Date

Estab

FARRAR INTRODUCES PRAYER SONG WITH WAVE OF BIG FAN

Soprano Dispels Sacred Atmosphere of Symphony Concert with Startling Sartorial Display.

If Gaby Deslys, in one of her most fantastic costumes, had slid into view at the concert given last night in Carnegie Hall by that dignified musical association known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra the effect hardly would have been more startling than the strange picture Geraldine Farrar presented when she stepped on the concert stage to assume her duties as soloist of the evening.

It is not in the province of this writer to describe the peculiarly eccentric creation which the American prima donna had put on for the occasion, to give the correct sartorial terms for her magenta turban, with its aggressive and perky plume of light blue; to unravel in technical parlance the mysteries of the complicated train which wiggled along the floor behind her like a lizard's tail.

No wonder, though, that many of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's subscribers gasped; that others smiled. No wonder, too, that folk looked at one another in amazement when the strange apparition from the world theatrical thus projected into the serious artistic atmosphere of a symphony concert, unfolded an expansive fan of ostrich feathers and prefaced Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser" by waving it gently to and fro. What an extraordinary introduction to a religious plaint which Miss Farrar ended with eyes closed as if in the ecstasy of spiritual exhaltation!

There was much applause, of course, though the soprano ended almost every phrase with the stressful exhalation of breath favored among Gallic prima donnas, though she failed to give even a suggestion of artistic sincerity. But the manifestations of approval were divided, and several of her recalls were due to a small band of admirers, not to the unanimous demands of the audience.

Perhaps Miss Farrar felt that she had not sounded the temperament of the crowd at her first appearance, for she adopted other tactics when she returned to sing with piano accompaniments, provided by Arthur Rosenstein, Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." But the artificial reserve she assumed proved to be quite as theatrical in its effect as the calculated mannerisms displayed earlier. She was most successful in the last number, a song that does not require more than superficial treatment.

As for the orchestra under Max Fiedler, it made a brave struggle to hold its own against the pulchritudinous persuasions of the prima donna. Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," were capitally played, though greater dynamic balance and clarity of exposition would have improved the effect of the last-named work, and tumultuous applause greeted the musicians when they stood up at Fiedler's command to share honors with their conductor.

The programme closed long after the time at which evening concerts end with a Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, No. 1, Opus 11, by Enesco—charming music, daintily, cleverly and spicily orchestrated, but light in taxture and designed to give passing entertainment rather than lasting pleasure. M. S.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 20 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Anton Witek, Concertmeister, Plays the Difficult Brahms Concerto in D Major

The fourth and next to the last of the season's concerts in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Academy of Music last night, with Max Fiedler conducting and Anton Witek, the concertmeister, as soloist. The audience was large and in view of the counter attraction at the Metropolitan emphasized the hold which the New England organization has gained in this city.

The program was severely classical, almost to the point of austerity, comprising Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Brahm's Concerto in D Major, and Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Thus all the masters represented were of the German school and there were no novelties, unless the Brahms Concerto could be so considered because of the infrequency of its rendition. Nor is the Fourth Symphony often heard, its appeal being less of a popular nature than the remaining eight by Beethoven. Mr. Fiedler last evening interpreted it with a warmth and richness in coloring, however, which brought out its finest qualities in strong relief, especially in the adagio movement and finale.

In offering the Brahms work, Mr. Witek did something few virtuoso violinists in the country care to undertake. Even Joachim, to whom the concerto was dedicated, found difficulty in its intricate passages, double stopping, florid running and almost ceaseless arpeggios. Mr. Witek proved his mastery, however, and played the famous solo cadenza which was written into the work by Joachim himself with fluency and expression. Five times the audience recalled him to acknowledge its applause in appreciation of his effort.

There was a noticeable warmth to the greeting extended throughout the evening to Mr. Fiedler, due to his approaching retirement as conductor, when Karl Muck will resume his former leadership after the interruption due to his residence abroad.

From

Address HARTFORD, CONN.

Date FEB 27 1912

OVATION FOR MAX FIEDLER

NOTABLE TRIBUTE AT CLOSE OF HIS LAST CONCERT HERE.

Brilliant Program and Splendidly Effective Playing.

WHAT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS GIVEN HERE.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have felt assured of Hartford's appreciation of his splendid work in the reception that was accorded him at the Parsons Theater last evening. He was applauded when he made his first appearance, a huge floral wreath was given to him at the close of the first number on the program and there was a tremendous tribute of applause for him when the concert was over. It was his last concert, for the present anyway, in Hartford and the many friends and admirers he has made in the four years in which he has been conducting the Symphony concerts here, could hardly do enough to show their regard.

The program was brilliant in make-up and the playing was splendidly effective. Of course the weather affected the strings somewhat, but every measure of every number seemed to be played with particular enthusiasm and the splendid vehemence and power of the conductor was displayed at its best advantage. For the first time at any Boston Symphony concert here (if memory serves) there was no symphony played, but Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," was given at the top of the program—a splendidly melodic series of tone-pictures, gorgeous in Eastern color, fascinating in strange rhythms, powerful in climaxes, brilliant in every attribute of brilliance that belongs so completely to the music of the modern Russian school. The playing was of superb quality and Mr. Fiedler insisted that all the players should rise to share with him the enthusiastic applause that followed the last movement of the suite.

Miss Kathleen Parlow was the soloist, playing the Tschaikowsky Concerto in D minor. This is the same number that was played by Mischa Elman with the Boston Orchestra here in January, 1910. Miss Parlow showed, in her very first measures, the fineness of her violin's tone, her splendid sense of rhythm and of melodic values. The playing was simple and unaffected, but it had plenty of power and great flexibility and was expressive always. In her brilliantly played cadenza the player was handicapped by strings that felt the dampness in the air, but throughout the work the playing was of most admirable tonal texture, full of life and sentiment and never marred by sentimentality. Miss Parlow received a cordial welcome to Hartford—and fully deserved it.

In the earlier concerts of the present season the absence of Wagner from the programs was marked by many; last evening's list made up that deficiency, there being three Wagner numbers played. First came the wonderful "Meistersinger" prelude—think of it, this great work the overture to a genuine comic opera!—rich in melody, tonally tremendous. And the playing was of the kind that the lover of Wagner's music always appreciates; it was virile, brilliant, powerful and always expressive. Then the beauties of the "Lohengrin" prelude were unfolded and the climax in power of tone was of tremendous effectiveness. It was reached by progressions that were commented on as being mathematical in accuracy but the splendor of the melodies was not dimmed for an instant. And finally came "Tannhaueser" in its brilliant tonal contrasts of good and evil. There is nothing new to say for the overture except, possibly, that Mr. Fiedler played it (as he played every number) as if it were absolutely new in all its glories and beauties.

During the four years of Mr. Fiedler's leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given twelve concerts in Hartford, at which fifty-two compositions by twenty-two composers have been played. Four of the eleven symphonies were Beethoven's; the Seventh, given twice, the Fifth and the Third. Two Tschaikowsky symphonies have been on the program, the Fifth and Sixth, better known as the "Pathetique." The composers of the other six symphonies which were played during this period were Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, Rachmaninoff and Cesar Franck—surely these names represent contrasting schools of composition.

Soloists in contrast also have had place on the programs. There were four pianists, Gabrilowitsch, Rachmaninoff, Busoni and Bauer; four violinists, Hess, Elman, Witek and Parlow; two singers, Mesdames Kirkby-Lunn and Berta Morena, and two 'cellists, Warnke and Schroeder. With the exception of two Beethoven numbers these artists have rendered nineteenth century music.

The prominent place in that part of the programs which is neither the symphony nor the solo has been given to Wagner. The overture to "The Meistersingers," the prelude to "Tannhaeuser," and "The Ride of the Valkyries" have been played twice each. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the Love Death from "Tristan" and "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" have been given once each. These with two Wagnerian solos for the voice, make twelve compositions by Wagner out of the total of fifty-two. There have been in all seven Beethoven compositions and five by Tschaikowsky.

Mr. Fiedler has not neglected to give us some of the most modern works; Strauss was played three times, DeBussy twice and Rachmaninoff not only had his second symphony performed, but he played his own piano concerto with the orchestra. The contrasts between the works of the modern composers and, say, the "Oberon" overture or "Die Freischutz" are wonderful; some music lovers prefer all of the modern music, some prefer examples of every school—and those of the latter class have been carefully supplied with music to their tastes in the splendid programs Mr. Fiedler has arranged for performance here.

Hartford will welcome next season the great Boston Symphony Orchestra under its famous conductor who returns to America after an absence of four years, but Hartford will not forget Max Fiedler, who has played so wonderfully here.

GLOBE-

FEBRUARY 25, 1912.

Famed Toronto Choir and Thomas Orchestra.

The concert to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening, Feb 29, by the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, assisted by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, and Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, is promised to be a revelation to lovers of choral music in this city. All accounts agree that this chorus of 225 voices has, under the skilful and devoted training of Dr A. S. Vogt, reached a point of virtuosity in singing, the like of which can be found only in Berlin, where Siegfried Ochs has accomplished similar wonders with the Philharmonic Chorus of that city. Indeed, many connoisseurs who have heard both choruses are inclined to believe that in finesse and polish the Toronto Choir excels the famous chorus of Berlin.

The choir, with the Chicago orchestra, give their first of the four out-of-town concerts in Buffalo on Monday evening, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings they give concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, and on Thursday evening will be heard in Boston. Although the prospects are that they will be greeted everywhere by "sold-out" houses, the journey to the East is not made for gain, because the expense of bringing 225 singers and an orchestra of 75 so far is enormous.

However, the Toronto choir is in the enviable position of having a large surplus, the result of its successful concerts in Toronto and neighboring cities during the last few years, and the purpose of the trip East is not merely to show us how they sing, but to give the singers a reward for the long and tiring season of preparatory work they have undergone.

Mr Stock and his Thomas Orchestra will again be welcome. The fine inspiration of both conductor and men in the "Don Juan" at their concert earlier in the season is not forgotten. Some slight changes have been made in the published program. The program in its revised and final form is as follows:

Overture, Liebesfruhling, op 28. Georg Schumann
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

(a) Motet, Crucifixus (Lotti), (b) motet, Psalm 137 (Gounod), Mendelssohn choir; (c) Judex Crederis from Te Deum (Berlioz), Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

(a) Traume, a study to Tristan and Isolde (Wagner), arranged for concert performance by Theodore Thomas; (b) Bacchanale from Tannhauser (Wagner), Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Sanctus from B-Minor Mass.....Bach
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

(Intermission.)

(a) Ave Maris Stella (Grieg), Mendelssohn Choir; (b) Libera Me, from Manzoni requiem (Verdi), for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, Miss Florence Hinkle, Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Night Witchery (Von Storch); Nottingham Hunt (Bullard), men's voices of the Mendelssohn Choir.

Symphonic Waltz, op 8.....Stock
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

(a) Scottish Folk Song, arranged by Granville Bantock; (b) Hey Nonino, double chorus, op 24 (Howard Brockway), Mendelssohn Choir; (c) Awake and choral finale, Die Meistersinger (Wagner), Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Concert Next Sunday Evening.

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra, will take place in Symphony Hall, next Sunday night. For this concert Elena Gerhardt has generously offered her services, which offer has been gladly accepted by the committee in charge. Few singers have come to Boston and in such a short time won so large a public as Miss Gerhardt.

Heralded as one of the greatest lieder singers in the world it turned out that the reports which preceded her coming had not been exaggerated, for Miss Gerhardt in her recitals and at her appearance with the Symphony Orchestra exhibited traits and qualities of singing rarely found in the younger generations of artists.

It is still impossible to make final announcement regarding the program for Mr Fiedler has been away with the orchestra during the past week on the fourth Southern trip. This announcement, however, will be made very shortly.

This concert will gain added interest because it will be the last time a special concert will be given by the orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. He has many friends and admirers in Boston who are not regular attendants at the Symphony concerts and they will undoubtedly take advantage of this opportunity to testify to their friendship for him as well as their friendship for the orchestra.

[150]

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

Miss Katharine Goodson will be the soloist at the sixth Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening. She will play Saint-Saens concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor, No. 2. The program is as follows: Weber, overture, "Eu... Schumann, symphony in ... minor, No. 2; Saint-Saens, con... minor, No. 2; Wagner, ... Love Death" from "... Isolde."

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme Olga Samaroff, who was to have been the soloist at the 17th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, was taken ill in Milwaukee a fortnight ago, and has been compelled to cancel all her engagements for the remainder of the season. In her place, Mr C. A. Ellis has engaged as soloist Mr Heinrich Gebhard of this city, who is one of the most admired of Boston pianists.

Mr Fiedler's program will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Egmont"; Brahms, Symphony in D Major, No. 2; Liszt, Concerto in A Major, for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

EVENING SUN

From

Baltimore, Md.

Address

Date

CHORUSES BY FIEDLER

Two Numbers Of Boston Orchestra's Conductor On Woman's Philharmonic Program For Tomorrow.

Among the numbers to be given at the concert of the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, in the Academy Concert Hall, tomorrow night, will be two choruses by Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These are "May Night" and Elfins," both of which were written for the chorus; Victor Saar, winner of the Kaiser prize at the Baltimore Sængerfest, is another well known musician who has recently dedicated a composition to the chorus, the work being an arrangement of Schubert's "Ave Maria" for chorus, piano and violin.

The soloists tomorrow night will be Mrs. Cora Barker Janney, the prominent Baltimore contralto; W. Kraft, violinst; A. Hedley, cellist, and M. Hess, player of the French horn, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will include, besides the choruses, Von Fielitz's "Fair Jessie," for contralto; two pieces by Wieniawski, for violin; Davidoff's "Am Springbrunnen," for cello, and in the "Elfenreigen," by Alfred Fauth, the chorus will have the assistance of all three instruments with a piano accompaniment. Mlle. Else Busch, Russian pianist, instructor at the Misses Carters' School, Catonsville, will be the pianist, and Joseph Pache will conduct.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau ... PHILA., PA.

From

Address

Date FEB 20 1912

Estab

WITEK AS SOLOIST

His Playing the Feature of the Boston Symphony Concert.

As the central figure in an extremely beautiful concert given at the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Anton Witek scored a pronounced success and added another laurel to his crown as a virtuoso. He was heard in the solo part of Brahms' Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra, an exquisite work, written for Josef Joachim, and dedicated to him by the composer as a mark of personal friendship.

The thought in this beautiful concerto passes from grave to gay, from the seriousness, almost sadness, of the adagio to the lightness of the closing allegro, and as played last evening included the elaborate cadenza added by the original performer. Witek gave a masterly rendering, broad in interpretation, subtle in phrasing, which brought him thunders of applause at the end of each part and won him many recalls at the conclusion of his performance. His rendering is that of the true artist, free from mannerisms, yet individual and convincing. What made this number doubly enjoyable was the efficient playing of the orchestra, the work of which in this concerto, as, indeed, in all other numbers on the program, left nothing to be desired.

The program itself covered a wide range, despite the fact that it contained but five numbers. Opening with the sprightly overture to Mozart's "Marriage de Figaro," it continued with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and ended with two Wagnerian overtures, those to "The Flying Dutchman" and the beautiful prelude to "Lohengrin."

With such a well-trained and accomplished organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Max Fiedler, it is difficult to differentiate in regard to the excellency of the various selections; all were rendered in the most finished fashion and personal taste regarding the esteem in which the hearer holds the different compositions is about the only criterion of judgment. The Beethoven playing could hardly be improved upon, and the Wagnerian selections were given in a way that must have pleased the most pronounced Wagnerian in the audience. Altogether, it was a beautiful concert, a treat which the music-lovers present will long remember.

TRIBUNE
From
New York
Address
Date

"RING" ENDS IN GLORY

"Gotterdammerung" Given Before Huge Audience.

The special cycle of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" came to an end yesterday in a veritable blaze of glory with a performance of "Götterdämmerung," which for brilliancy perhaps surpassed any similar performance for several years. First honors fell to Mme. Olive Fremstad, whose Brünnhilde was an impersonation both dramatically and vocally long to be remembered—the descent upon the New York stage of a veritable avatar. Mr. Burrian's Siegfried, Mr. Griswold's Hagen, Mr. Weil's Gunther, and Miss Fornia's Gutrune were all worthy companions, and Alfred Hertz led the orchestra with fine authority and feeling for the score. The audience was a huge one and brought a healthful feeling that even in New York the public is not quite yet oblivious to the work of art itself.

In the evening Verdi's "Aida" made a change in the artistic if not the physical atmosphere, the audience being equalled only by the capacity of the house. Of course, the reason was the appearance of Mr. Caruso as Radames, who, in good voice, delighted pit, gallery and rail. Miss Destinn was the Aida and Mme. Matzenauer the Amneris. A good word should be said for the Amonasro of Mr. Gilly, showing that his voice is fast regaining the smoothness and brilliancy it possessed last year. Mr. Toscanini conducted.

While "Aida" was in progress at the Opera, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving its fourth New York performance of the season in Carnegie Hall, the hall being sold out, as all Boston Orchestra concerts are nowadays. The orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler's direction, gave a most scholarly reading of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and a magnificently brilliant one of Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." The other orchestra numbers were the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody in A major.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Geraldine Farrar, who appeared upon the stage looking like the Statue of Liberty out for a walk. Her dress was red, white and blue, and over her fair head waved triumphantly the feathers of a red flamingo. Miss Farrar was evidently determined that the audience should not forget that she knew it was Washington's Birthday. But loudly as her colors proclaimed her patriotism, more loudly still did she declaim Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser," so loudly, indeed, that the angels in the seventh heaven must have awakened from their sleep. Then after a while she sang to pianoforte accompaniment three songs by Schumann, Sinding and Grieg.

AMERICAN
From
New York
Address
Date

STRAUSS'S WORK IS FINELY RENDERED

Boston Symphony in Best Form and Max Fiedler Loudly Applauded.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

For the seventh time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra earned laurels for itself at Carnegie Hall last night by the fine way in which it played a most varied and exacting programme.

The works performed ranged from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" overture to a "Roumanian Rhapsoldy" (in A major) by Georges Enesco. Between these two extremes came the fourth symphony (in B flat major) of Beethoven, and the strange tone-poem which Strauss named "Tod und Verklaerung" otherwise "Death and Transfiguration."

Here was a scheme to test the most able players. And yet so perfect was the art of the Bostonians that they succeeded in their work at every point.

The performance of the symphony was full of life and strength, a fact which did not stay the men who played it from giving it the most careful shading.

But, on the whole, the triumph of the concert was the interpretation by Max Fiedler and the orchestra of the "Death and Transfigration" music. Rarely, if ever, have we come nearer than we did last night to understanding all the meaning of the work which Strauss composed to describe the mysteries of the unseen Borderland.

Without the programme notes, indeed, we might not know the full intention of its inventor. Yet Death spoke very plainly in the opening passages (for the second violins and violas) at this performance of the tone-poem, and, even to the uninstructed layman, the so-called "Childhood" motive, preceding the tempestuous "Fever" motive and the wild struggle between Death and Life, was at least suggested by music; while the "Transfiguration" episodes were still more clear.

The soloist last night was Geraldine Farrar. She sang "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhaeuser," and several lieder. As usual at these rare Bostonian functions, every seat in the great hall was filled.

And we all have them), his farewell appearance at the next concert will be received with sorrow. What a terrible calamity it would be if the next were the last concert ever to be heard in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

J. N. H.

EVENING STAR
From Baltimore, Md.
Address
FEB 22 1912
Date

HARMONIC WEALTH THRILS AUDIENCE

Vast Crowd Hears Boston Orchestra in Tschaikowsky Program.

Tschaikowsky knew, and by means of the fourth dimension and the transposition of spirit bodies his thoughts and meanings passed to a mighty audience at the Lyric last night. When Mr. Max Fiedler bore it at the fourth current local Boston Symphony Orchestra concert by the magic carpet to his palace of dreams it was to stand abashed in the presence of one, who, though earthly then, still had learned the language uninterpreted enough to be called master. Master he was, and seer, too, in so far as it is given man to pierce the veil of the obscure.

Two things Tschaikowsky has demonstrated by prima facie evidence. If each of last night's auditors will look his Gorgon's head of a soul in the face he will perceive the truth of them. One is that there is an infinite something music has been trying to tell from time immemorial, and which will eventually be told. The other that it is possible to dance, even dance arrayed solely in Nature's glorious apparel, and still not incur eternal damnation. All the great Russian's music is indicative of the riddle of the universe, and the "Nutcracker" ballet music is a key to the divine dance. Those who went to last night's all-Tschaikowsky concert, asking only a wreath of harmonic sound, steeped themselves to the last degree ere they journeyed into the night again. Yielding themselvs to fancy's current, they drifted, fairylike, to sylvan shores, breathed tropical airs, inhaled rich odors from gorgeous foliage and quaffed nectars which wrapped one in the soft embrace of ideality. Truly there was no dearth of atmosphere there. Others, wearied of their wandering through dim and somber castle halls, with tapers, tapestries and great mosaics, winding in and out of labyrinths of splendor, sank exhausted upon some friendly bench and dreamed of wonders unrecorded.

Great opportunities are afforded by concerts of one composer's compositions to study this place in history and his moods and methods. In a recent article Tschaikowsky's place in the realm was discussed, and about that no change of opinion can have taken place in this short time. One fears only that, great as is one's desire to see him throned in state, there may be disqualifications. Tschaikowsky was moody—always moody. Consequently, he thought in circles, instead of straight lines. With his impressionism he was something like Cesar Franck. He created figures of harmonic speech, then dwelt lovingly on them. Repeating here and there, time and again, reiterating them, turning them around like an artisan does a bit of ceramic of which he is proud, so that it may be seen at all points. This result is the effect of individual devices almost, rather than that of a theme developed at length—a set of consecutive periods, instead of a continuous entirety.

Consider the opening of the Elegia from his Serenade for stringed instruments, opus 4. The minor seventh chord in the third inversion with which it begins and the consequent passage of simple part-writing in contrary motion, produces an irresistible attraction for him, and he plays it over and over again, giving himself up to enjoyment of it. Again, see the same thing in the tragic last movement of the sixth symphony in B minor. In his manner of handling the orchestra, his moodiness is once more strikingly apparent. Deep, heavy, cloying color effects at times, he produces with the woodwind and string divisions, pitching them in the lower part of their compass. Recall the adagio introduction to the Pathetic symphony. Then the brass and high woodwinds he makes produce dramatic moments in connection with the other instruments, which make one forget one's name, where one is or anything about one's self. The climax to that symphony is one of the most awe-inspiring in existence. One's throat contracts so one cannot get breath. You grow cold. Almost you feel the blood leave your face, your hair stands on end and a chill spreads over you as death lays its icy hand upon your flesh! You suspect now, with Hamlet, there may be something to fear in that bourne from which no traveler ever returns. One of the most brilliant strokes of genius in the whole symphony is the transition to B major for the restatement of the second theme in the first movement. Students should ponder over this as a notable example of modulation which becomes subservient to purpose and a most dramatic one at that.

It seemed that Mr. Fiedler did not make the movement in five-four time quite as delicate and appealing as it might have been (it has the power to bring tears to the eyes of a rock), but this can easily be overlooked in the recognition of the telling points he made. In the third movement of the symphony, for instance, he arose to the occasion with real and meaning rhythms, such as are seldom heard, and there was clarity in the parts, too.

Unique in many ways is the "Nutcracker" Suite. It contains odd effects which say something, and which Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra showed to advantage. The celesta is a rarely beautiful graduated-toned instrument of percussion with wide orchestral possibilities which should be taken note of by composers.

With the patriotic overture, 1812, in E flat major, the concert was brought to a stupendous close. This composition commemorates Russia's repulse of Napoleon in the year 1812, and besides its musical worth, is well characterized by a remark heard on the way home: "Possibly it may not be considered legitimate music, but if there was ever anything written that could stimulate one's fighting qualities that is it!"

Mr. Fiedler proved enormous musicianship by his work last night; and no matter what shortcomings he may have

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
FEB 20 1912

ATTRACTIVE PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner Music Was Interpreted

ANTON WITEK, SOLOIST

Plays the Unaccompanied Cadenza, Work Written for Josef Joachim

CONSERVATISM in its best sense, undisturbed by any factors that might entitle it also to be called "reactionary," characterized the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Academy of Music last evening. Conductor Fiedler, moreover, had attractively arranged his program along the lines of musical development.

This progression began with Mozart and ended with Wagner, with Beethoven and Brahms as intermediaries. Strict chronology would have placed Brahms at the end, but in the history of musical conceptions this composer is justly regarded as the logical successor of Beethoven, with Wagner, when Brahms failed to understand, representing a still later artistic expansion.

Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Orchestra, was heard for the first time in the capacity of soloist. He offered the Brahms' concerto for violin in D major, a dignified and beautiful work involving few demands for a meretricious exhibition of mere virtuosity.

The work was written for Josef Joachim, and Mr. Witek introduced last evening the unaccompanied cadenza furnished by the great violinist after the code of the first movement. The romanza of the adagio was interpreted with a rare poetic eloquence, while the finale, with its technical exactions, finely demonstrated the brilliancy and matured assurance of this proficient performer.

There is little of the sensational in the playing of Mr. Witek, but a sincere regard for elevating and substantial musical dignity, not unadorned by some high temperamental and sympathetic qualifications, is satisfyingly apparent in his musicianship.

The symphony was the fourth of Beethoven, a happy, gracious, contented work, recalling in spirit the second symphony by this composer more than some of his subsequent achievements in this field. The lovely adagio was given with subtle, elusive, but still potent charm, while Mr. Fiedler's entire reading was marked by a sound, scholarly perception of classical values.

The sparkling overture to Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" opened the concert, while the concluding selections were the spiritualized prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the richly dramatic overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander," the nearest approach to what is called "program music" of anything submitted during the evening.

From EAGLE
Address
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 24 1912
Date

THE BOSTON PHILHARMONIC.

Strong Programme Well Given at Academy, With Miss Collier Violinist.

Of the popularity of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Brooklyn, there is never any doubt, and the fourth of the series, given at the opera house, Academy of Music, last evening, attested, by the large attendance, the loyalty of music-loving Brooklynites. Neither the Lenten season nor the lateness of the season, which has been filled with interesting musical events, prevented every seat being taken, in boxes, orchestra and the very top on the opera house. The programme contained two quite familiar numbers, viz, Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812," the former played at the beginning, as a colorful and delicate introduction, and the latter as a grand piece with which to wind up the evening with flourish and a display of dynamics. Under the baton of Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, both of these effects were, in turn, produced by the instrumentalists in highly finished performances. In the "1812" overture especially delightful in their tone was the introduction of the "Marseillaise," first boldly, then fainter and fainter as the Slavic theme, beginning as a mere suggestion, grew in power, indicating the overthrow of the Napoleonic hosts, closing with the hymn of victory. The lightsome, optimistic, perhaps fatalistic, quality of the Russian temperament was brought out in the lighter passages, and altogether the number was given with an elasticity that probably no other orchestra could so successfully accomplish.

A soloist is a strong and desirable feature in these concerts, and no mistake was made in bringing to Brooklyn, from Boston, Miss Bessie Bell Collier, as the assisting violinist. With the orchestra Miss Collier played the Saint-Saens "Concerto in B minor," No. 3, op 61. Conspicuous, besides her perfect technique, was the crystal purity of her tone, even in passages prestissimo and fortissimo. With absolute ease she gave strength and resonance to the lower strings, almost equal to a 'cello, and this by a slender young woman, who scarcely seemed able to give so masterfully a great composition. At al ltimes her performance stood out clearly against the work of the orchestra, yet blending with it in effect on the audience. In fact, in one of the movements Mr. Fiedler or his men scarcely supported Miss Collier with the required force. The musicianship of the violinist came out beautifully in the way she phrased and nuanced and perhaps yet more in the varied and delicate coloring with which she lighted the frequent motive repetitions.

Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D Minor" was, from the standpoint of strictly orchestral work, the important number on the programme. When first produced in 1889 in Paris it was termed "mathematical," but it is distinctly melodic, the phrasing for the greater part brief, and it is filled with changing moods. If there is, beside the silver, melodic thread that winds its devious way through the four movements, a distinct character to the symphony, it is pretty device of the composer in using one instrument, or two or three, in duet or trio, to give a melody against the figuration work of the orchestral choirs. Sometimes it is a sad song and sometimes a merry that these individualists sing. A beautiful instance of these effects was in the scherzo in the second, the "allegretto" movement, when the double-basses kept throbbing time against the playful high notes on the first violins. In all of these changes of mood Mr. Fiedler did splendid work, giving just the right accents in the most obscure, and to most conductors, puzzling, passages, which, for one place, came in the "Andantino" movement, while, in the last, the "Allegro," movement, he easily swept the orchestra to powerful uplift and led them down at the finish to paths of peace and joy.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address
New York
FEB 25 1912
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAMME

Strauss' "Tyl Eulenspiegel," Max Fiedler Conducting, Is One of the Features.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in an attractive programme. The symphony was Schumann's Second, which was interpreted with poetic delicacy. Strauss' "Tyl Eulenspiegel," one of the most skillful and picturesque of his compositions in this semi-dramatic vein, showed Mr. Max Fiedler in a welcome phase of his abilities—that is to say, as a conductor of the works of Richard Strauss.

Alwin Schroeder played in his deft and scholarly way the Tschaikowsky Variations, on a rococo theme, for violoncello and orchestra. He was recalled over and again. This was a tribute to his long-established popularity and to his sterling workmanship on this particular occasion.

[151]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date

MUSICAL COMMENT

Kubelik and Bachaus in Concert.

The Boston Orchestra—Other Prospective Visitors—Wagner Redivivus—Opera in the Olden Time

Though Mr. Fiedler and his excellent musicians from Boston seemed rather more considerate of New York's symphony lovers than usual last week, in so far as they did not indulge excessively in vain repetitions, it can scarcely be said that the solo performers were felt to be greatly needed. Miss Farrar we have with us always at the opera, and of her talents as a singer of songs we, in the latitude and longitude of New York, do not think quite so highly as those who are under the spell of Melrose, Mass. Also, while we retain our old admiration for Alwin Schroeder, we cannot wax enthusiastic over Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme. But perhaps these are trifling things compared with the beautiful euphony and the comforting sanity of the Beethoven and Schumann symphonies (the former's in B flat, the latter's in C major), and the dash and brilliancy of two compositions by Richard Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." We had had Beethoven's fourth symphony twice before, from Mr. Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society (and beautifully played, too), but it is not often heard, and a repetition in the same season by the Boston musicians was more tolerable than it would have been from any other band. As for Strauss's musical delineation of a man in the agonies of mortal dissolution, though we may not like the subject, we must recognise that it contains many flashes of his inspiration when it was at its freshest; and "Till Eulenspiegel" is still unmatched as a symphonic humoresque, even if we refuse to believe that Strauss meant one-half of the things which his commentators have put into it with their literary essays.

